But in Indiana a conveyance by one spouse, made during the life of the other, has no force, even as against the spouse who makes it. Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391 (1871); Jones v. Chandler, 40 Ind. 588 (1872) (where an execution against the husband was perpetually restrained); McConnell v. Martin, 52 Ind. 434 (1876).

A subsequent purchaser from both spouses can take advantage of this invalidity. Chandler v. Cheney, and Jones v. Chandler, supra.

Nor is such a conveyance of any force in Michigan. Vinton v. Beamer, 55 Mich. 559 (1895),—where there were other circumstances sufficient to support the decision; Naylor v. Minock, 96 Mich. 182 (1893),—where, though the spouse who had made the conveyance and survived was the wife, yet it was made since the married women's acts, and there was nothing peculiar to the wife in the grounds given for its validity as a transfer. But the court 30 L. R. A.

held, for reasons peculiar to the wife, that it could not operate by estoppel (namely, that the capacity to convey was derived from a statute authorizing her to convey any property which she had at the time of the conveyance), thus leaving open the question whether such a conveyance by the husband could operate by estoppel.

An estoppel binds privies as well as parties, and would therefore bind a subsequent donee of the husband and wife. So the converse holds in this state, viz., that whatever defeats the interest of the one defeats that of the other. Manwaring v. Powell, 40 Mich. 371 (1879).

In Illinois such a conveyance made before the married women's acts seems to have had no force. In Marlier v. Saunders, 10 Ill. 124, 125 (1868), the court declared that one spouse alone could convey "no interest whatever," even though the other spouse, being the wife, had concurred, but without using the formalities necessary to bind her. But it does not appear that the wife was dead when the question was decided, so the question of survivorship can hardly have arisen.

In Almond v. Bonnell, 76 Ill. 536 (1875), an execution against the husband was held to pass no title whatever.

In North Carolina (where, however, there was a statute invalidating the husband's disposition of his wife's land and this was construed as including entirety land), the court, speaking with special reference to a sale under an execution against the husband, said, in Bruce v. Nicholson, 109 N. C. 205 (1891): "It seems that the estate is not that of the husband or the wife, but belongs to that third person recognized by law—the husband and the wife. It requires the co-operation of both to dispose of it effectually." This opinion was founded on the statements of text-writers. The decision was that a judgment lien against the husband could not be enforced against the entirety estate. Both spouses were still alive.

This decision was followed in Gray v. Bailey (N. C.) 23 S. E. Rep. 318 (1895), holding a conveyance by all its common-law incidents, . . . and gives to each party equal rights so long as the question of survivorship is in abeyance, thereby conforming to the intention of the new legislation to take away the husband's right jure uxoris in his wife's property, and to enable the wife to have and enjoy 'whatever estate she gets by any conveyance made to her, or to her and others jointly, and does not enlarge or diminish that estate.' "

Our conclusion is that, Mrs. Polk having survived her husband and become the sole owner of the land, her mortgage deed is valid and binding as to the undivided one-half interest in said land conveyed by her as security for the notes executed by her husband. The court erred, therefore, in not sustaining the demurrer to that extent.

The decree is reversed, with an order that the demurrer be sustained to the answer so far as it undertakes to set up a defense to the mortgage executed by Mrs. Polk for said undivided half interest; otherwise, the decree is affirmed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Olive O. ROBINSON'S APPEAL.

(.....Mc.....)

1. The rule of the common law creating estates by entirety is irreconcilable with both the letter and spirit of the statutes giving married women separate and independent property rights.

2. A tenancy by the entirety is not created by a will giving the residuary estate to a daughter and her husband in "equal shares and proportions and so to their respective heirs and assigns forever," where the statutes give married women separate and independent property rights.

3. A moiety of a residuary estate descends to testator's heirs on the death, during his life, of one of the persons to whom the residue is given in equal shares.

A PPEAL by Olive O. Robinson from a decree of the Probate Court for Androscoggin County ignoring her claim to a portion of the property in the distribution of the estate of Charles P. McKenny, deceased. Affirmed.

the husband alone while the wife was living to be ineffectual against a sale after her death to satisfy the lien of a judgment against him in case he survived the wife.

In Pennsylvania such a conveyance of an entirety estate acquired since the married women's act has no force. McCurdy v. Canning, 64 Pa. 41 (1870).

A purchaser under a sale made after the wife's death, to satisfy a judgment entered against the husband during the life of both spouses (in a state where one spouse alone can convey an entirety estate conditionally on his surviving, and where a judgment binds a debtor's land from the time of entering it), takes priority over a mortgage by both spouses, made after the judgment was entered but before execution was sued on it. Fiepek v. Zillbaver, 117 Pa. 218 (1887).

An enactment that a purchaser under a foreclosure sale shall take whatever interest the mortgagee had at the time of the mortgage, means that he shall take whatever interest the mortgagor could then dispose of; and, consequently, does not aid the purchaser under a sale to foreclose a mortgage made by one of the spouses in the lifetime of the other, in a state where such a mortgage is not valid. Naylor v. Minock, 96 Mich. 122 (1893).

The principle of the exception established in O'Connor v. McMahon, 54 Hun, 66 (1889), to the rule that a husband can convey for the period of the joint lifetime, does not apply after the wife's death.

One of the spouses may convey or release the entirety estate to the other, even if in a state where a conveyance by one during the life of the other to any other person would not be valid, if the other spouse accepts the conveyance. Keyart v. Kepler, 118 Ind. 34 (1888).

3. Whether a conveyance by the husband, made before the wife's death, was valid for the period of the joint lifetime.

A disposition of an entirety estate, made by the husband during his wife's lifetime, appears to have been held in former centuries valid as regards the period of the joint lifetime.

He could by feoffment discontinue his wife's estate or the entirety estate until the statute of Hen. VIII., which was held in Greneley's Case, 8 Coke, 71b (1610), to prevent discontinuance of entirety estates also.

It is said, in 39 Hen. VI., 45B, that she could disagree before.

It is stated in Brooke, Releases, pl. 81, citing 29 Hen. VIII., that his alienation was good against her during his life.

It was said in Mallow v. May, F. Moore, 636 (1598), that he could surrender a life estate held by entreties, subject to her right to disagree after his death.

It is laid down in Co. Litt. 188a, that he can transfer a share which they (by entreties) hold jointly with a third person, but it is inferable from Coke's subsequent observations that she might, after his death, disagree and thus revive the joint tenancy.

On principle, it would seem that if the husband's conveyance was not good against him during the joint lifetime it could not become so afterwards, for he had no remainder and a limitation of a freehold to commence in futuro is void in a common-law conveyance. And it is difficult to see how it could be invalidated during his life, for he could not evict his own donee, and his wife could not sue without joining him.

A husband's interest in an entirety estate is not alienable to an assignee for creditors even after a divorce obtained after adjudication in bankruptcy. Re Benson, 16 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 377 (1873).

A disposition by or under a husband of an entirety estate in a state where he could without his wife's concurrence dispose of the estate conditionally on his surviving her, is also valid against both during the joint lifetime, except when the married women's acts are held to change this rule.

Whether made by him. Georgia, C. & N. R. Co. v. Scott, 38 S. C. 34 and 40 (1892); Den, Wyckoff, v. Gardner, 20 N. J. L. 558, 45 Am. Dec. 388 (1846) (in which there were other grounds sufficient for the decision); Barber v. Harris, 15 Wend. 515 (1836) (in which, however, the wife was not a party); Cole-

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mrs. N. Morrill and J. A. Morrill, for appellant:

Judger Robinson was not "connected with the testator by blood,"—not a blood relation; hence it would seem settled that his son, Merton W. Robinson, cannot take his share of the residuary estate under Rev. Stat. chap. 74, § 10.

Elliot v. Fessenden, 88 Me. 197, 18 L. R. A. 37.

The words "and so to their respective heirs and assigns forever" are ineffectual to pass the property to a minor son, being words of limitation only and descriptive of an absolute property or fee in the legatees.

Keniston v. Adams, 80 Me. 290; Bryson v. Holbrook, 159 Mass. 280.

The residuary clause created a tenancy by the entirety, and Mrs. Robinson is entitled to the entire residuary estate by right of survivorship.

At common law a devise or grant to a husband and wife created a tenancy by the entirety and the survivor took the whole, and this rule has been adopted in this state, notwithstanding Rev. Stat. chap. 73, § 7.

Harding v. Springer, 14 Me. 407, 31 Am. Dec. 61.

In those states where the greatest advances have been made by statute and by judicial decision in abolishing joint tenancies, tenancy by the entirety has been generally preserved, notwithstanding acts enlarging the rights of married women.

Pray v. Stebbins, 141 Mass. 219, 55 Am. Rep.

462; Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361; Rogers v. Benson, 5 Johns. Ch. 431; Marburg v. Cole, 49 Md. 402, 36 Am. Rep. 266, note, 269; Buttlar v. Rosenblath, 42 N. J. Eq. 651, 59 Am. Rep. 52; Carrer v. Smith, 90 Ind. 222, 46 Am. Rep. 210; Hulett v. Inlow, 57 Ind. 412, 26 Am. Rep. 64, note; Baker v. Stewart, 40 Kan. 442, 2 L. R. A. 484; Harrison v. Ray, 108 N. C. 215, 11 L. R. A. 722.

If we may assume that it was the intention of the testator to create a tenancy in common by the residuary clause of his will, and that the words "in equal shares and proportions" were intended to make certain that intention, still that intention must be governed by "the fundamental laws which establish and secure the rights of property."

Ramaddell v. Ramaddell, 21 Me. 293.

An estate by entirety is not founded upon the notion of a joint tenancy, but upon the marital relation and upon the legal theory of the absolute oneness of husband and wife.

And the same principle is involved in Miller v. Miller, Meigs, 484, 38 Am. Dec. 157 (1838).

And in Topping v. Sadler, 5 Jones, L. 159, 360 (1858), the court thought it self-evident that he must have rights as high over entirety property as over his wife's estate.

And in Jackson, Suffern, v. McConnell, 19 Wend. 170 (1839), the dictum that he cannot alienate is explained as meaning that he cannot bind his wife if she survive.

And this holds, though the money with which the estate was purchased was the wife's. Ames v. Norman, supra.

But this rule does not hold where the husband lives apart from his wife, and commits the entirety property to her; nor can he in that case transfer the crops which she has sown. O'Connor v. McMahon, 54 Hun, 66 (1889). See also supra, III. c. 80 L. R. A.

Nor does it apply where a statute is in force invalidating his conveyance of his wife's land, for this is construed as extending to entirety land. Bruce v. Nicholson, 109 N. C. 206 (1891).

Nor does it apply as regards sales under execution in Vermont, where a statute exempting the husband's life interest in the wife's property from his debts is construed as extending to entirety property. Corinth v. Emery, 63 Vt. 506 (1891).

And even as exempting his share therein. Ibid.

And a similar statute produces a similar effect in Tennessee. COLLIER MFG. CO. v. COLLIER (Tenn.) post, 315, overruling dictum in Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 683, 70 Am. Dec. 269 (1857).

But in Missouri such statute is held inapplicable to an entirety estate. Hall v. Stephens, 65 Mo. 670, 27 Am. Rep. 302 (1877).

In Virginia a limitation of property settled by the wife's family to trustees to permit the spouses to take the profits was held (contrary to Kip v. Kip, 38 N. J. Eq. 212 (1880), and to the English cases) to be an active trust, and therefore to preserve the property from the husband's creditors. Scott v. Gibbon, 5 Munf. 86 (1816); Roanes v. Archer, 4 Leigh, 560 (1838).

And the homestead laws exempting the property from the husband's creditors extend to entirety estates falling otherwise within their provision. Bennett v. Child, 19 Wis. 362, 38 Am. Dec. 662 (1865); Jackson v. Shelton, 39 Tenn. 92 (1860). See supra, V. f.

But a disposition, by or under the husband, of an entirety estate, acquired since the married women's acts, would seem in several states to possess no validity against his wife's share, but to be valid against his own. It was the intention of the testator to give the residuary estate to Mr. and Mrs. Robinson collectively, and not to give it to them in case Mr. Robinson lived, but to give it differently in case he died.

Mann v. Hyde, 71 Mich. 278.

Whitehouse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the decree of a probate court.

The executor of the will of Charles P. McKenny filed a petition under the provisions of Rev. Stat. chap. 65, § 27, as amended by chapter 49 of the Laws of 1891, asking for an order of distribution which would protect him in paying out the residue of the estate in his hands. This involved a construction of the following residuary clause in the will:

"The residue and remainder of all my estate of which I may die seised and possessed, both real and personal, not herein otherwise disposed of, I give, bequeath, and devise the same to my son-in-law, Judyer Robinson, and my daughter, Olive H. Robinson, wife of the said Judyer Robinson, in equal shares and proportions, and so to their respective heirs and assigns forever."

Judyer Robinson died before the death of the testator, leaving a minor son and a wife, who is the appellant, and the same person called Olive H. Robinson in the will.

The decree of the judge of probate required one half of the residuary estate to be paid to the appellant, and the other half to be distributed among the heirs of the testator, and this decree was affirmed by the justice presiding in the supreme court of probate. The case comes to this court on exceptions to that ruling.

It is the opinion of the court that the ruling was correct, and that the exceptions must be overruled.

It is contended by the learned counsel for the appellant that the residuary clause created a tenancy by the entirety, and that Olive O. Robinson is entitled to the entire residuary estate by right of survivorship. It is not controverted that the language employed by the testator must be construed as creating a tenancy in common, if Judyer Robinson and Olive O. Robinson had not been husband and wife. Stetson v. Eastman, 84 Me. 366. But it is argued that the rule of the common law by which a devise or grant to husband and wife constituted them tenants by the entirety, the survivor taking the whole, has never been changed in this state by the aboli-

But in Massachusetts such statutes do not affect entirety estates. The husband's lease is valid against both during their joint lives. Pray v. Stebbins, 141 Mass. 219, 55 Am. Rep. 462 (1866).

On the other hand, such a disposition has no force against even his own share during the joint lifetime, or against his right by survivorship, in Illinois. Almond v. Bonnell, 76 Ill. 536 (1873); Mariner v. Saunders, 10 Ill. 124 (1866).

Nor in North Carolina. Bruce v. Nicholson, 108 N. C. 303 (1891); Gray v. Bailey (N. C.) 23 S. E. Rep. 215 (1895).

Nor in Pennsylvania. McCurdy v. Canning, 64 Pa. 39 (1870).

The same is held in Tennessee, see COLL MFG. CO. v. COLLIER, post, 515.

Nor does it seem to be in force against his share during the joint lifetime when he lives apart from his wife, who is in possession of the property. O'Connor v. McMahon, 54 Hun, 66 (1890).

A sale on execution against the husband was held entirely inoperative in the above cases of Almond v. Bonnell, McCurdy v. Canning, and COLL MFG. CO. v. COLLIER.

This is on the ground that the wife's possession would be disturbed by any possession of a stranger purchasing under the execution; but this does not seem to agree with the doctrine of HILES v. FISHER, where a purchaser on foreclosure is allowed the use of an undivided half of the land.

And a disposition by or under the husband in those states where he cannot without his wife's concurrence dispose of the entirety estate conditionally on his surviving, is also without force, even during the joint lifetime. Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 291 (1871); Hulett v. Inlow, 57 Ind. 412, 26 Am. Rep. 64 (1877); Vinton v. Heamer, 55 Mich. 559 (1895); McConnell v. Martin, 62 Ind. 424 (1876); Morrison v. Seybold, 92 Ind. 296 (1883) (where the disposition was a sale to satisfy a lien for taxes; see especially top of p. 302.

And even in New Jersey it was held, on general grounds (irrespective of the facts that the entirety estate in that case was for life and was subject to a clause against encumbering it), that a judgment against the husband could not affect the entirety estate. Thomas v. DeBaum, 14 N. J. Eq. 37 (1861).

So, condemnation of the property is ineffectual as against the wife unless she is made a party. Grosser v. Rochester, 148 N. Y. 235 (1895).

But this rule does not prevent the creditors of the husband from causing to be sold an estate conveyed to him and his wife by entireties instead of to him alone for the purpose of defeating them, if bought with the husband's moneys. Newlove v. Callaghan, 86 Mich. 301 (1891), affirming Id. 297; admitted. Morrison v. Seybold, supra.

As to homestead exemptions from encumbrances, see supra, V. 2.

XI. The effect of divorce on entirety property.

a. Generally.

The effect of a divorce is not altered by a subsequent alteration of the law. Whitesell v. Mills, 6 Ind. 229 (1865).

Remarriage of one spouse after an invalid divorce, with knowledge of the facts which made it so, was held, in Marvin v. Foster (Minn.) 63 N.W. Rep. 484 (1894), to estop him from claiming against the other spouse any estate or interest which he would not have been entitled to claim if the divorce had been valid.

b. Nullification.

Nullification of marriage, on account of some cause existing at the time of the marriage places the parties in the position of never having been married. Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 683, 70 Am. Dec. 269 (1857) (dictum).

tion of joint tenancies or the legislation enlarging the rights of married women respecting the ownership of property. It is accordingly contended that if the words, "in equal shares and proportions," found in the residuary clause, were advisedly employed for the purpose of making certain the intention of the testator to create a tenancy in common, this intention, however clearly expressed, cannot be allowed to prevail against the early rule of the common law that husband and wife, being regarded as one person in law, are not competent to take, either as joint tenants or as tenants in common, under any form of grant or devise in fee made to them during coverture.

We are unable to concur in this view. The rule of the common law undoubtedly existed as claimed by the appellant. It is thus stated in 2 Bl. Com. 181: "If an estate in fee be given to a man and his wife, they are neither properly joint tenants nor tenants in common; for, husband and wife being considered as one person in law, they cannot take the estate by moieties, but both are seised of the entirety, per tout et non per my. The consequence of which is that neither the husband nor the wife can dispose of any part without the assent of the other, but the whole must remain to the survivor." And it is true that prior to the act of 1844, chap. 117, and subsequent legislation in this state securing to the wife the enjoyment of her separate estate, this common-law rule was recognized by our court. Greenlaw v. Greenlaw, 18 Me. 186; Harding v. Springer, 14 Me. 407, 31 Am. Dec. 61. But it is worthy of remark that no recognition of it or reference to it can be found in the cases reported in this state since the act of 1844, entitled "An Act to Secure to Married Women Their Rights in Property."

A tenancy by entirety is sui generis. The right of survivorship gives it an apparent resemblance to joint tenancy, but, as already seen, it differs from a joint tenancy in important particulars. All the authorities agree that it had its origin in the marital relation, and was founded upon the legal fiction of the absolute oneness of husband and wife. At the common law the legal existence of the wife was merged in that of her husband. Her legal identity was suspended, or held in abeyance, during the existence of the marriage relation. Substantially all her property was vested in the husband during coverture, and her legal position was little better than that of a menial to her husband. Being but one person, in the eye of the law, it was considered that they could not consistently have separate and conflicting property rights. Hence the rule that property conveyed to them during coverture should be held as an estate by entirety, with the right of survivorship.

But the universal tendency of modern leg-

It precludes the offspring of the marriage from inheriting. 7 Hen. IV. 15.

It passes an entirety estate to whichever of the spouses does not sue as plaintiff for the nullification, or, in other words, suing for nullification and obtaining a decree cuts off the right of the party doing so to the entirety estate.

Even though the estate was originally the property of the other spouse, and was brought into settlement by him, 8 Edw. I., cited in Fitz. Ab. Ass. 415 (year and folio of 8 Edw. I. not specified).

And though the spouse to whom the estate thus passed had consented to the suit.

At least if the estate had been given by her father, 19 Lib. Ass. 2, cited in Fitz. Ab. Ass. 83; Anonymous, Kellw. 104. Fitzherbert also cites a case in 13 Edw. III., which, however, appears from Brooke, Ab. to have decided nothing. In these cases the suit was moved by the husband. The estate in the former case was in tail, and in the latter in frankmarriage, but nothing seems to have turned on these circumstances. The case in 12 Lib. Ass. 22, is not pertinent, but merely decides that collateral heirs of the husband could not claim an estate in frankmarriage.

But the rule that the spouse who sues for nullification loses the estate does not hold against one to whom the husband had conveyed it, except to the extent of a half share. Anonymous, Brooke, N. C. 175.

In Ames v. Norman, supra, however, it was said that such a donee would retain all that he could have retained if the marriage had not been nullified.

Nullification of marriage entitles the husband to emblements for crops sown by him on the wife's land (Oland's Case, 5 Coke, 116a (1592)) and therefore presumably on entirety land.

c. Dissolution.

Dissolution of marriage for a cause occurring after its celebration changes the entirety estates, as 80 L. R. A.

from the date of dissolution, into an estate in common, or (it seems) into a joint tenancy according as it would have been the one or the other if the parties had not married. Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 696, 70 Am. Dec. 269 (1887) (dictum); Donegan v. Donegan (Ala.) 15 So. Rep. 823 (1894) (where it is not clear whether the divorce was a dissolution or a nullification); Stelz v. Shreck, 128 N. Y. 263, 13 L. R. A. 325 (1891) (expressly disapproving, at p. 263, the case of Re Lewis's Appeal, 85 Mich. 340 (1891)) (where it had been held in Michigan that the entirety estate remains notwithstanding the dissolution); Harter v. Wallner, 80 Ill. 197 (1875); Russell v. Russell, 122 Mo. 235 (1894); Hopson v. Fowlkes, 92 Tenn. 697, 702, 23 L. R. A. 805 (1896); Thornley v. Thornley [1893] 2 Ch. 229; Lash v. Lash, 58 Ind. 526 (1877).

Even though the divorce was granted in one jurisdiction and the land was situated in another. Harding v. Alden, 9 Me. 140, 23 Am. Dec. 549 (1832); Barber v. Root, 10 Mass. 260 (1813).

Except in those instances in which divorce by a foreign court is not recognized by the courts of the state where the property is situated. Id.

But of course adultery, or other grounds for divorce, does not itself affect the entirety estate. Stelz v. Shreck, supra.

The dissolution of the marriage on account of the wife's adultery was held in Lodge v. Hamilton, 2 Serg. & R. 491 (1816), not to deprive her of her right by survivorship to a recognizance given to her and her husband as a security for her share of the price of real estate which had been disposed of in a partition suit.

The same conclusion might have been reached on the ground that the money was subject to a trust for reinvestment in the purchase of realty. See supra, VII. a, citing Milday v. Quicke, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 553, 46 L. J. Ch. 667, 25 Week. Rep. 788 (1877).

The rule that the entirety estate becomes joint or common on a dissolution does not operate against a purchaser from the husband of an interest which the purchaser could have retained if the islation has been to abrogate this theoretical unity of husband and wife; to recognize and maintain the legal identity of the wife, and secure to her a distinct and separate right to the acquisition and enjoyment of property. By the law of this state, "a married woman of any age may own in her own right real and personal estate acquired by descent, gift, or purchase; and may manage, sell, convey and devise the same by will without the joinder or assent of her husband." Since the act of 1844, above named, a husband by marriage acquires no right to any property of his wife. "She may receive the wages of her personal labor, not performed for her own family, maintain an action therefor in her own name, and hold them in her own right against her husband or any other person." She is liable for her debts and torts, and her property may be taken on execution therefor, as if she were sole. She may prosecute and defend suits at law or in equity in her own name without the joinder of her husband, for the preservation and protection of her property and personal rights, as if unmarried. Rev. Stat. chap. 61.

It is manifest that these statutes have wrought great modifications and radical changes in the relative property rights of husband and wife. In contemplation of law, they are no longer one person, and their interests in property are no longer identical, but separate and independent. Under these statutes the wife is invested with greater privileges, and weighted with greater responsibilities and liabilities, than before. The rule of the common law creating estates by entirety is irreconcilable with both the letter and the spirit of these statutes. It never rested upon a rational or substantial groundwork. It had its origin in feudal institutions and social conditions which were superseded centuries ago by the more enlightened principles of a progressive civilization. It is now repugnant to the American idea of the enjoyment and devolution of property, and to the true theory of the marriage relation. "The reason of the law," says Lord Coke, "is the life of the law, and cessante ratione lex ipse cessat." The fictitious basis of this rule having been removed, the rule itself must fail. To declare that there is no authority in the court to effectuate a clearly expressed and unmistakable intention of a grantor or testator, against such an antiquated and exploded dogma, would be a poor tribute to the creative power of the law, and the original conceptions of justice in modern courts. The common law would ill deserve its familiar panegyric as the "perfection of human reason," if it did not expand with the progress of society, and develop with new ideas of right and justice. "Considering the influence of manners upon law," says Chancellor Kent, "and the force of opinion which is silently and almost insensibly conducting the course of business and the practice of our courts, it is impossible that the fabric of our jurisprudence should not exhibit deep traces of the progress of society, as well as of the footsteps of time."

These views are sanctioned by approved text-writers and courts of the highest remarriage had not been dissolved. Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 683, 70 Am. Dec. 299 (1857). Harrer v. Wallner, supra, is favorable to the same view.

So, in Beach v. Hollister, 8 Hun, 519, 5 Thomp. & C. 668 (1875), an execution creditor of the husband was held not precluded from continuing, after the dissolution, a levy begun before, nor, it seems, from making after the dissolution a levy by force of a judgment recovered before; but on the latter point the report is not clear.

There do not appear to be any other authorities as regards the rights of a purchaser from the husband of an entirety estate; but the estate of a purchaser from the husband of his life interest in the wife's property was held to be divested or terminated by the dissolution in Boyd v. Rain, 28 Ala. 332, 65 Am. Dec. 349 (1856); Gould v. Webster, 1 Tyler (Vt.) 409 (1802). And see Lynch v. Rotan, 39 Ill. 18, 19 (1865); and, as to the husband's creditor's, Townsend v. Griffin, 4 Harr. (Del.) 443 (1843); as to a lease by him, Gould v. Webster, supra.

But the contrary was held in Aiken v. Suttle, 4 Lea, 108 (1879), where strong reasons were given and many authorities cited, and in Jennings v. Montague, 3 Gratt. 350 (1845).

An enactment that the wife shall, upon divorce, be restored to all her lands and tenements, terminates the interest of a purchaser from her husband of land held in her right. Kruger v. Day, 2 Pick. 316 (1824).

In Jenney v. Gray, 5 Ohio St. 45 (1855), there was an enactment that dispositions of the wife's estate made by the husband should be void against her, and consequently the question could hardly arise.

d. Separation without dissolution of marriage.

A judicial separation or divorce a mensa et thoro does not affect entirety estates or generally the property rights of the parties. As regards the former no authority has been found.

Of course a separation by consent has no effect on property rights unless so agreed. Gonsolis v. Douchouquette, 1 Mo. 666 (1826).

XII. Partition between tenants by entirety.

Partition of an entirety estate cannot be compelled by one of the parties, nor obtained by judicial process (Miller v. Miller, 9 Abb. Pr. N. S. 444 (1871); Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391 (1871) (dictum)), except in states where it has been authorized by the legislature.

But either of them may have partition of land of which they are ordinary joint tenants. Wurz v. Wurz, 27 Abb. N. C. 58 (1891).

And, after dissolution, one may compel it. Russell v. Russell, 122 Mo. 235 (1894); Harrer v. Wallner, 80 Ill. 197 (1875).

And, in Illinois, a partition may be sought in the same suit by which the dissolution is sought. Harrer v. Wallner, supra.

But not so in Indiana. Alexander v. Alexander (Ind.) 40 N. E. Rep 55 (1895).

XIII. Adverse possession and the statute of limitations.

The limitation period does not begin to run against the wife holding by entirety until she becomes entitled to sue alone; that is, until her husband's death. Harrer v. Wallner, 80 Ill. 203 (1875).

Or on a dissolution of the marriage. Hopson v. Fowkes, 92 Tenn. 704, 23 L. R. A. 805 (1893).

Nor is he barred until she is. Johnson v. Edwards, 109 N. C. 466.

And this is so notwithstanding the married women's acts (Harrer v. Wallner, supra), except it may be presumed where they contain a provision authorizing her to sue.

The title of a donee from the husband before the married women's acts is not adverse to the wife until his death. Miller v. Miller, Meigs, 484, 33 Am. Dec. 157 (1838). But no doubt a dissolution of the marriage would make it so. H. W. B. M.

spectability in England as well as in this country.

In his Treatise on Estates, Mr. Preston makes the confident assertion, based upon his own cultivated reason, rather than upon reported cases at that time, that "in point of fact, and agreeable to natural reason, free from artificial deductions, the husband and wife are distinct and individual persons, and accordingly, when lands are granted to them as tenants in common, thereby treating them without any respect to their social union, they will hold by moieties, as other distinct and individual persons would do." 1 Preston, Estates, 182. This is cited as authority for the following statement in 4 Kent, Com. 411: "It is said, however, to be now understood that husband and wife may, by express words, be made tenants in common by a gift to them during coverture."

In his note to 2 Bl. Com. 181, Judge Sharswood says: "But when an estate is conveyed to a man and woman who are not married, together, and who afterwards intermarry, as they took originally by moieties, they will continue to hold by moieties after the marriage. There is nothing, therefore, in the relations of husband and wife, which prevents them from being tenants in common. There are great opinions in favor of the position that husband and wife may, by express words, be made tenants in common." So, in 1 Washb. Real Prop. 444, the author says, "It is always competent, however, to make husband and wife tenants in common by proper words in the deed or devise by which they take, indicating such an intention."

In Clark v. Clark, 56 N. H. 105, it was held that a statute in that state enlarging the rights of married women practically abolished tenancies by entirety between husband and wife; and the legal unity of husband and wife, as respects the holding of property and making of contracts by the wife, was obliterated.

In Cooper v. Cooper, 76 Ill. 57, it was held that under the married woman's law of 1861 in that state—an act having a scope and purpose similar to our own above cited—"no reason can be perceived, and none is suggested, why a married woman should not hold property thus acquired in fee, and as a tenant in common with her husband, precisely as she might with any other person."

In Hoffman v. Stigers, 28 Iowa, 307, the court says: "If no contrary intent is expressed in the conveyance to them, or the instrument under which they hold, the husband and wife take as tenants in common, and not in entirety. At common law, they were so far, so completely, so essentially one, that they could not take by moieties."

But the doctrine always stood upon what was little more than the merest fiction, and, as this, by our legislation, has measurably given way to theories and doctrines more in accord with the true and actual relation of husband and wife, the rule itself must be abandoned." See also Wilson v. Fleming, 18 Ohio, 68; Whittlesey v. Fuller, 11 Conn. 337; Re Dixon (Byram v. Tull) L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 806; Warrington v. Warrington, 2 Hare, 54.

Under the residuary clause in the case at bar, the appellant took only a moiety of the residue of the estate. As Judyer Robinson died before the testator, the devise and bequest to him lapsed, and the moiety of the residue, which he would have taken if he had survived, descended to the heirs of the testator.

Exceptions overruled.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

Before Woods, Jenkins, and Showalter, circuit judges.

Statement by Jenkins, Circuit Judge:

This was a libel in personam, exhibited in the Court below by the appellee against the owner of the steamer Robert Holland, claiming damages for the death of Erik Anderson, in a collision between the schooner William Aldrich and the barge Parana, which barge, with the barge Stevenson, was at the time in tow of the steamer Robert Holland. The collision is asserted to have been caused by the fault of the Robert Holland. The collision occurred at about 5 A. M. of the morning of November 1, 1891, under the following circumstances: The Aldrich, a three-masted schooner of 20 tons burden and laden with lumber, was proceeding on a voyage from Nahma, Mich., bound for the port of Milwaukee, Wis., having three jibs, a foresail, and a mainsail set, and with mizzen furled. The wind was northwest, and fresh. The vessel was on a course S. by W. 4 W., and was abreast of, and some 6 miles distant from, Pilot Island and from the Wisconsin shore, and about a like distance north of Canna Island light. The steamer Holland, having the barges Stevenson and Parana in tow astern, and in the order mentioned, all being light, was upon a voyage from the port of Chicago to Ashland, on Lake Superior. Her course was N. N. E. The barge Stevenson carried a foresail and staysail, and the Parana a foresail only. The combined length of the tow was about 1,900 feet. The Holland had the usual green and red lights in proper position, and also properly exhibited a white light, indicating a tow. The barges had their side lights properly placed, screened, and burning brightly. The proper signals upon the Aldrich were also set and burning. The schooner's lookout reported the white light of the steamer about a point on the lee bow of the schooner, and distant some 15 miles, and afterwards saw and reported the steamer's red light distant about 5 miles, and afterwards, when the steamer was about 4 mile away, he reported the steamer's green light over the port or lee bow. Each vessel claims to have kept her course. The Holland claimed that if no change had occurred in the course of either vessel, she would have passed to the windward of the schooner; that, when about 100 feet away from the schooner, the Holland's wheel was put to starboard, changing her course to the windward a point and a half, and she claims to have passed the schooner some 500 feet to windward, and that the latter suddenly came up into the wind and struck the tow line between the barges, and then drove on to the Parana. The schooner was struck on her port bow between the stem and cathead, her bows were carried away, and she filled with water. Anderson, who at the time was off watch, and asleep in the fore-castle, was drowned. The schooner claimed that, seeing the red light of the steamer, it was supposed the latter would pass to leeward; that such was, in fact, the purpose of the steamer; that she had crossed the point of intersection of the courses of the two vessels, when her course was changed in an attempt to pass to windward, which, so far as the steamer was concerned, was accomplished, but that the manœuver was not resorted to in time to make it effectual as to the tow; that, when the collision was seen to be inevitable, the schooner, to ease the blow, or to escape, if possible, the stern of the barge Parana, put her wheel up to enable the schooner to fall off, but that the effort was ineffectual. It was claimed by the Holland that the Aldrich, instead of putting her wheel up, put it down, and luffed up into the wind. The combined speed of the vessels was about 15 miles an hour. The libellant claimed to be entitled to recover of the libelee under the provisions of sections 4255 and 4256 of the Revised Statutes of the state of Wisconsin, which are as follows:

"Sec. 4255. Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by a wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who, or the corporation which, would have been liable if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured; provided, that such action shall be brought for a death caused in this state, and in some court established by the Constitution and laws of the same.

"Sec. 4256. Every such action shall be brought by, and in the name of, the personal representative of such deceased person, and the amount recovered shall belong and be paid over to the husband or widow of such deceased person, if such relative survive him or her; but if no husband or widow survive the deceased, the amount recovered shall be paid over to his or her lineal descendants, and to his or her lineal ancestors in default of such descendants; and in every such action the jury may give such damages, not exceeding $5,000, as they shall deem fair and just in reference to the pecuniary injury resulting from such death, to the relatives of the deceased specified in this section."

The court below pronounced for the libellant (The Robert Holland, 59 Fed. Rep. 200; Nickerson v. Bigelow, 62 Fed. Rep. 900), and the owner of the Holland appealed.

Mr. Charles E. Kremer for appellant.
Messrs. Frank M. Hoyt and George D. Van Dyke for appellees.

Jenkins, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is determined that, at the common law, no civil action would lie for an injury resulting in death (Mobile L. Ins. Co. v. Brame, 95 U. S. 754, 24 L. ed. 590), and that, in the absence of an act of Congress, or a statute of a state, giving a right of action therefor, no suit will lie in the admiralty for personal injury causing death through negligence on the high seas, or on waters navigable from the sea (The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 199, 80 L. ed. 858; The Alaska, 180 U. S. 201, 32 L. ed. 938). It is also settled that, if a state statute gives a right of action touching a subject of maritime nature, the admiralty can administer the law by a proceeding in rem, if the statute grants a lien, or in personam, no lien being granted. The Corsair, 145 U. S. 385, 347, 86 L. ed. 727, 781. It is also the law that, if the negligent act causing death occur within the jurisdiction of a state, the law of such state governing such action is applicable. American S. B. Co. v. Chace, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 523, 21 L. ed. 869; Sherlock v. Alling, 98 U. S. 99, 23 L. ed. 819; The Transfer No. 4, 20 U. S. App. 570, 9 O. C. A. 521, 61 Fed. Rep. 864, affirming The City of Norwalk, 55 Fed. Rep. 99. In the first of these cases the negligent act causing death occurred upon the waters of Narragansett bay, within the jaws of the headlands, and so within the territory of the state; in the second, upon the Ohio river, above the line of low-water mark, and within the territorial jurisdiction of the state of Indiana; in the last, upon the East river, just above Blackwell's island, and within the territorial jurisdiction of the state of New York. In Re Humboldt Lumber Mfrs. Assn. 60 Fed. Rep. 428, the negligent injury causing death occurred on the high seas on Humboldt bar, off the entrance to Humboldt bay, and within 2 miles of the shore. The court applied the doctrine "that the sea, within a belt or zone of 8 miles from the shore, as distinguished from the rest of the open sea, formed part of the realm," and held that the statute of California giving a right of action for negligent injury causing death was applicable.

It will be observed that in none of the cases to which we have referred did the negligent injury occur upon the high seas beyond the 8 mile belt or limit, and that is true of all the cases which have come under our notice. The Corsair, supra; The Oregon, 45 Fed. Rep. 63; Killian v. Hyde, 68 Fed. Rep. 172; The Victory, 68 Fed. Rep. 682. The statute only takes cognizance of torts within the jurisdiction of the state, and has no extraterritorial effect. It is urged that the collision and negligent injury here took place upon the waters of Lake Michigan, and without the belt limit of 8 miles, and that therefore, within the decision in United States v. Rodgers, 150 U. S. 249, 87 L. ed. 1071, it occurred upon the high seas, and without the territorial jurisdiction of the 30 L. R. A. state of Wisconsin. The question is thus sharply presented whether the locus in quo lies within the territorial waters and within the jurisdiction of the state of Wisconsin.

The precise point decided in United States v. Rodgers, was that a district court of the United States had jurisdiction to entertain the trial of one for a crime committed on an American vessel on the waters of the Detroit river, beyond the boundary line between the United States and the dominion of Canada, and within the waters of the province of Ontario. Jurisdiction was held, under sections 5346 and 780, Rev. Stat., upon the ground that the locus in quo was on a river within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of a state of the Union. It was ruled that, by the statute, Congress intended to include "the open, uninclosed waters of the lakes under the designation of high seas," with respect to the offenses enumerated in the statute; and the locus in quo being within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States (The Genesee Chief, 58 U. S. 12 How. 448, 13 L. ed. 1058), it was competent for Congress to provide for the punishment of offenses committed upon an American vessel within a foreign jurisdiction.

The question still remains open and undecided by the supreme court whether the jurisdiction of a state bordering upon one of the Great Lakes extends beyond low-water mark; whether the doctrine of a 8-mile belt, recognized in the case of oceans, may be applied to the Great Lakes; and whether state jurisdiction, with respect to such lakes, is coextensive with the boundary line of the state, when one of its lines is declared to be a line running through the middle of the lake. We think it must be conceded that Lake Michigan is not a "high sea," in the sense that it is "open and uninclosed, and not under the exclusive control of any one nation or people, but is the free highway of adjoining nations or people," to use the language employed by Mr. Justice Gray. This lake lies wholly within the territory of, and as respects foreign nations is under the exclusive dominion of, the government of the United States. If we may indulge the expression, it is not "no man's land." It is not by nature free to the commerce of the world. It is so free solely by the grace of this government. It is included within the territorial boundaries of four states. The organic law of the territory of Michigan, enacted in 1805, made its westerly boundary a line drawn from the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan, through the middle of the lake, to its northern extremity. 2 Stat. at L. 309. This line was confirmed and established upon the admission of the state of Michigan into the Union in 1836. 5 Stat. at L. 49. The act provided that the state of Michigan should "have jurisdiction over all the territory included within" the boundaries described in the act. The organic law of the territory of Wisconsin, enacted in 1836, established its eastern boundary "by a line drawn from the northeast corner of the state of Illinois through the middle of Lake Michigan to a point in the middle of said lake, and opposite the main channel of Green bay," etc. 5 Stat. at L. 10. The same line, substantially, was established by the enabling act for the admission of the state of Wisconsin into the Union, passed in 1846. 9 Stat. at L. 56.

It is said that, while the geographical limits of the state extend beyond the place of collision, its territorial limit, its right of sovereignty, its power to enact and enforce laws, does not extend further than the point of navigability, or, at the most, beyond a 3-mile belt or zone. We think the vice of the contention lies in the application of international law to the subject in hand. As between nations, the territorial limit of sovereignty with respect to the high seas anciently extended no further than to low-water mark. In later days, "to make good the assertion of the jurisdiction over the foreigner therein," the character of territory was given to the 3 mile zone. This, as we think, ought not to be applied to a lake which is not the common boundary of nations, and which is within the exclusive jurisdiction of one nation,—to a body of water that is not by nature open to the commerce of the world. It has never, so far as we are able to say, been applied by any nation, except with respect to its external littoral waters. Lake Michigan is a high sea, within the provisions of the act under consideration in United States v. Rodgers, but it is not an open sea, nor a boundary line between nations. The government of the United States had the sole jurisdiction over this body of water. It saw fit to give to the different states, founded out of the surrounding territory, jurisdiction over its waters, subject to its paramount right in the regulation of commerce and navigation. The Northwest Territory was ceded by the state of Virginia, and accepted by the United States in trust, for the purpose only of the creation of states, and the vesting in them over the whole of this territory of the sovereignty that formerly pertained to the granting state. Shively v. Bowlby, 153 U. S. 1, 26, 88 L. ed. 331, 341.

In the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 887, 86 L. ed. 1018, and in the case of Shively v. Bowlby, 153 U. S. 1, 88 L. ed. 331, it is said to be the settled law of this country that "ownership of, and dominion and sovereignty over, lands covered by tide waters or navigable lakes, within the limits of the several states, belong to the respective states within which they are found, with the consequent right to use or dispose of any portion thereof, when that can be without substantial impairment of the interest of the public in such waters, and subject to the paramount right of Congress to control their navigation, so far as may be necessary for the regulation of commerce." In the latter case it is said (page 58, 153 U. S., and page 332, 88 L. ed.) that, upon admission of states into the Union, the "administration and disposition of the sovereign rights in navigable waters, and in the soil under them," passed to the control of the states within whose boundaries such waters were included. See also Mann v. Tacoma Lund Co. 158 U. S. 273, 286, 38 L. ed. 714, 718.

The grant to the United States, in the Constitution, of all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, does not extend to a cession of the waters in which those cases may arise, or of general jurisdiction over them. Congress may pass all laws which are necessary for giving the most complete effect to the exercise of the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction granted to the government of the Union, but the general jurisdiction over the place, subject to this grant, adheres to the territory, as a portion of territory not yet given away, and the residuary power of legislation will still remain in the state. United States v. Bevans, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 336, 4 L. ed. 404. We are therefore of opinion that the surrounding states, within the limits prescribed in their respective organic acts, have sovereign rights in and over the navigable waters of Lake Michigan, subject to the paramount right of the Federal government to regulate navigation and commerce between the states and with foreign nations. The right of the state to legislate and to enforce its laws is plenary, within the boundaries prescribed, limited and controlled only by the paramount law of the nation. There does not necessarily result any conflict. Both jurisdictions can coexist in the same plane in complete harmony.

Legislation of the character of that under consideration is not open to the objection that state laws cannot extend or restrict the jurisdiction of the admiralty court. As suggested by Mr. Justice Clifford, in American S. B. Co. v. Chase, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 522, 21 L. ed. 369: "The practical effect allowed to the state statute is to take the case out of the operation of the common-law maxim that personal actions die with the person."

And, as well observed by Judge Lacombe, in The Transfer No. 4, supra: "The admiralty courts, before the passage of the statute, exercised jurisdiction over precisely such claims for damages, when brought in his lifetime by the person injured, and there seems no sound reason why they should not exercise like jurisdiction when the tort is committed in a locality where the municipal law preserves the right to redress beyond the life of the injured person. It is not logically an enlargement of jurisdiction so as to cover a general subject not cognizable before, but a mere increase of the varieties of the cases embraced within that subject."

This jurisdiction of the admiralty court, with respect to subjects maritime, to enforce new remedies granted by state laws, is fully recognized by the supreme court. Thus, Mr. Justice Brown, delivering the opinion of that court in The Corsair, supra, observes: "A maritime lien is said by writers upon maritime law to be the foundation of every proceeding in rem in the admiralty. In much the larger class of cases, the lien is given by the general admiralty law, but in other instances, such, for example, as insurance, pilotage, wharfage, and materials furnished in the home port of the vessel, the lien is given, if at all, by the local law. As we are to look, then, to the local law in this instance for the right to take cognizance of this class of cases, we are bound to inquire whether the local law gives a lien upon the offending thing. If it merely gives a right of action in personam for a cause of action of a maritime nature, the district court may administer the law by proceedings in personam, as was done with a claim for half-pilotage dues under the law of New York, in the case of Ex parte McNiel, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 236, 20 L. ed. 624, but unless a lien be given by the local law, there is no lien to enforce by proceedings in rem in the court of admiralty.

We think the clear result of the authorities to be that the sovereignty of the state of Wisconsin extends to the middle of the lake, and that its laws, so far as they do not conflict with the laws of the United States passed in the regulation of commerce and of navigation, are operative within its prescribed boundary. Such state legislation upon subjects of a maritime nature has been generally recognized in the admiralty (The J. E. Rum- ball, 148 U. S. 1, 37 L. ed. 245; The Lottava- nna, 68 U. S. 21 Wall. 558, 22 L. ed. 654; The America, 1 Low. Dec. 170, Fed. Cas. No. 280; The Marion, 1 Story, C. C. 68, Fed. Cas. No. 9,087; The California, 1 Sawy. 408, Fed. Cas. No. 2,313; The Glenavon, 7 Fed. Rep. 604; The B. F. Woodruff, 1d. 108; The Julia L. Sherrard, 14 Fed. Rep. 500; The Two Marys, 10 Fed. Rep. 919, 16 Fed. Rep. 607; The Shady Side, 20 Fed. Rep. 731; Woodruff v. One Covered Sloop, 20 Fed. Rep. 900), and we perceive no reason to deny operation of the law invoked in this case. It is not, in our judgment, like the case of the law of a state intended to be operative upon the high seas, which belong to no one nation and to no one people, but to all nations and to all peoples. In the absence of legislation by Congress denying a right of recovery for death occurring through negligent injury upon the waters of Lake Michigan, we perceive no reason for the refusal of an admiralty court to give effect to the beneficent provisions of this law within the limits of the state.

A question has arisen, not suggested by the appellant upon the argument, whether the proviso of the act of the legislature of the state of Wisconsin, that the action for damages occasioned by negligent injury causing death should be "brought for a death caused in this state and in some courts established by the Constitution and laws of the same," is a condition or limitation upon the right granted, so that the right can only be asserted and enforced by and through the courts of the state, and that suit therefore cannot be maintained in a Federal court. We are of opinion that the question must be resolved in the negative. The legislature of a state cannot confer jurisdiction of any sort upon a Federal court. Such tribunal derives its jurisdiction from the Constitution of the United States, not by grant from the legislature of a state. We enforce a right created by the state because the right given touches a subject within the constitutional jurisdiction of the Federal court. We think it not competent for a state to so restrict a general right that one entitled to invoke the jurisdiction of a Federal court in the prosecution or defense of a suit may not assert the right so granted in a Federal court, or that the state may in any way restrict the exercise of the jurisdiction of a Federal court to administer the law of the state between persons who come within its jurisdiction. The proviso of the act in question, if it was designed to and in so far as it restricts the enforcement of the right to a state court, is, in our judgment, inoperative and void. The judicial power of the United States, lodged in the Federal courts, extends, by the very terms of the Constitution, to all classes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The subject-matter of the right here asserted was within such jurisdiction. The statute, as said by Judge Lacombe, in The Transfer No. 4, supra, created a mere addition to the variety of cases embraced within that jurisdiction, so far as it comprehends deaths caused by negligent injury upon navigable waters within the state. It does not, as well held by Judge Brown, in The City of Norfolk, 55 Fed. Rep. 98, create a new cause of action. "It does, indeed, create a new right and liability; but it does not create a single one of the elements that make up the fundamental cause of action,—that is, the essential grounds of the demand. All these elements exist independently of the statute, and are not in the least affected by it. It no more creates the wrong, or the damage, than it creates the negligence or the death, nor does it, as in the pilotage and double wharfage cases, add anything to the damages sustained. It authorizes no recovery except for 'the pecuniary damages' already existing. It is apparent, therefore, that, as suggested by Mr. Justice Clifford, in American S. B. Co. v. Chase, 55 U. S. 16 Wall. 532, 20 L. ed. 272, 'the statute does no more than take the case out of the operation of the common-law maxim that an action for death dies with the person.'"

A civil right of action, acquired under the laws of a state where the injury was inflicted, or a civil liability incurred, the action being transitory, may be enforced in the courts of any other state in which the party may be found, according to the course of procedure of the latter (Dennick v. Central R. Co., 108 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 430; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cox, 145 U. S. 508, 604, 36 L. ed. 329, 333; Huntington v. At- trill, 146 U. S. 657, 670, 36 L. ed. 1123, 1125; Northern P. R. Co. v. Bahrick, 184 U. S. 190, 198, 38 L. ed. 958, 960), and this although a like wrong or liability would not be actionable in the state where the suit is brought. It is also settled that, whenever a state statute gives a right, the same may be enforced in a Federal court whenever the citizenship of the parties or the nature of the subject will permit. In Ross Ins. Co. v. Moss, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 443, 22 L. ed. 365, the state of Wisconsin, having the right to determine the conditions upon which it would permit foreign corporations to transact business within its territory (Dodge v. Continental Ins. Co., 94 U. S. 835, 24 L. ed. 148), provided that any foreign fire insurance company should, as a condition of being permitted to do business within the state, appoint an attorney within the state upon whom process of law could be served, with an agreement of the company that it would not remove the suit for trial into the Federal court. It was held that an agreement of the company executed in pursuance of the provisions of the statute was void as against public policy, and that the provision of the statute was in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. The chief justice and Mr. Justice Davis dissented, upon the ground that the state could rightly exclude foreign corporations altogether from doing business within the state, and had therefore the right to impose such restrictions and conditions upon the company, in permitting its admission to the state, as it saw fit, and that the company accepted the permission with the conditions attached, and was bound thereby. This reasoning, however, was not accepted by the court. The decision has been often approved. Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. supra; Kern v. Huideloper, 103 U. S. 486, 492, 26 L. ed. 854, 857; Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 80 L. ed. 915; Southern P. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 207, 86 L. ed. 942, 945; Goldrey v. Morning News, 156 U. S. 518, 523, 89 L. ed. 517, 519. Mr. Justice Blatchford, in Barron v. Burnside, speaking for the court, says that the supreme court "has uniformly asserted that no conditions can be imposed by the state which are repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States." We consider the question foreclosed, and no longer open to discussion. No condition imposed upon a right granted by a state, which prevents one from availing himself of his constitutional prerogative of appeal to the courts of the United States, can be upheld. Such condition conflicts with the Federal Constitution, and is nugatory and void. In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Whitton, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 270, 20 L. ed. 571, an administrator, under letters of administration granted by the state of Wisconsin, but who was in fact a resident of the state of Illinois, brought suit against the railway company, a corporation of the state of Wisconsin, in a state court, to enforce a claim under the statute under consideration for negligent injury of the company causing the death of his intestate within the state of Wisconsin. He subsequently, under the provisions of the Federal statute, removed the suit into the Federal court. It was there objected that the right to sue in such case existed by virtue of the statute only, and that the right by the statute was given only on a condition that the suit be brought in a Wisconsin court. The contention was, however, overruled by the supreme court by the unanimous opinion of the judges, and it is there said (page 286, 20 L. ed. 576): "In all cases where a general right is thus conferred, it can be enforced in any Federal court within the state having jurisdiction of the parties. It cannot be withdrawn from the cognizance of such Federal court by any provision of state legislation that it shall only be enforced in a state court. The statutes of nearly every state provide for the institution of numerous suits, such as for partition, foreclosure, and the recovery of real property in particular courts and in the counties where the land is situated, yet it never has been pretended that limitations of this character could affect, in any respect, the jurisdiction of the Federal court over such suits where the citizenship of one of the parties was otherwise sufficient. Whenever a general rule as to property or personal rights, or injuries to either, is established by state legislation, its enforcement by a Federal court in a case between proper parties is a matter of course, and the jurisdiction of the court in such case is not subject to state limitation." See also Ellis v. Davis, 109 U. S. 486, 497, 498, 27 L. ed. 1006, 1010; Davis v. James, 2 Fed. Rep. 618; Holmes v. Oregon & O. R. Co. 5 Fed. Rep. 75; Mineral Range R. Co. v. Detroit & L. S. Copper Co. 25 Fed. Rep. 515.

It is sought to distinguish the Whitton Case from the present in this: that that suit was originally brought in a state court, and removed to a Federal court, while the case in hand was originally brought in a Federal court; and it is said that the former case was a compliance with the statute. We are unable to assent to the suggestion. The fact stated was given no significance in the Whitton Case. It was determined upon the broad principle stated. We cannot give to the word "brought," as used in the statute, so restricted a meaning. If the statute sought to limit the right of action to the courts of the state, it contemplated that the right given should be enforced by them and by them only. It would not be satisfied by the commencement of a suit in the state court, and its immediate removal to a Federal court. A like contention was urged in Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 869, 876, 877, 24 L. ed. 853, 854, 855, and was adversely disposed of. The jurisdiction exercised upon the removal is original. Removal is only an indirect mode by which the Federal court acquires original jurisdiction. Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 813, 887, 25 L. ed. 667, 676.

With respect to fault in the collision here, we are satisfied with the conclusion of the district judge. It was the duty of the Holland to keep out of the way of the Aldrich. Considering that she had under charge a long and unwieldy tow, it was her duty to avoid dangerous proximity to the approaching vessel. Being thus bound to keep out of the way, the burden is cast upon her to prove that the collision was due to the fault of the other vessel. This duty has not been discharged. We are satisfied, from a careful consideration of the evidence, which, as usual in such cases, is quite conflicting, that the Holland first designed to pass to leeward of the Aldrich, and, in pursuance of that intention, passed the point of intersection of the courses of the two vessels, and then changed her purpose with a view to pass to windward. Otherwise, her green light would not have been exhibited to the lookout upon the schooner over the port bow. The change of course of the schooner was after the steamer had passed her to windward, and at a time when the collision was inevitable. It is probable that the Aldrich then swung up into the wind, because she was struck on the port bow between the stern and the cathead. The wheelman of the Aldrich insists that he put her wheel up. We think that in this he must be mistaken. The error was, however, in the presence of imminent danger, and is not such a fault as would preclude a recovery by the schooner. "Where one ship has by wrong maneuvers, placed another ship in a position of extreme danger, that other ship will not be held to blame if she has done something wrong, and has not been maneuvered with perfect skill and presence of mind." The Byrwell Castle, L. R. 4 Prob. Div. 219; The Elizabeth Jones, 112 U. S. 514, 526, 28 L. ed. 812, 816; The Maggie J. Smith, 128 U. S. 849, 855, 81 L. ed. 175, 178.

It is further claimed that the Aldrich was in violation of the regulations in that she exhibited no torch light. We need not consider whether the regulation with respect to torch lights was in force at this time, or had been repealed by the legislation claimed, or was applicable to the situation. The position and course of the schooner were distinctly apparent to the Holland. Her lights were burning and seen by the lookout of the Holland. A torch would not have disclosed anything that was not known without it to those navigating the Holland. Its absence in no way contributed to or induced this collision, and, if the exhibition of a torch be required by the regulations, is not a fault availing to defeat a recovery.

Showalter, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

The statute of Wisconsin, upon which the adjudication in the court below was predicated, gives to the administrator a right of recovery in case his suit is "brought for a death caused in this state and in some court established by the Constitution and laws of the same." Lord Campbell's act, as commonly re-enacted in the American states, gives a right of recovery to the administrator, for the benefit of specified persons, in cases where the deceased, if he had survived, could have maintained an action for the injuries which caused his death. Such enactments, being in derogation of the common law, are strictly construed. The right of recovery attaches only within the form of the statute. The fund recovered is a trust for the specified beneficiaries, not assets of the estate. Unless it appear that there are persons to be benefited answering the statutory description, the suit cannot be maintained; nor can there be any recovery in a case where the deceased left no estate, since, in that event, a probate court has no jurisdiction to appoint an administrator. Perry v. St. Joseph & W. R. Co. 29 Kan. 420. At common law any person may bring an action against any other person. These statutes do not give the right to bring suit. They give to the plaintiff a right of recovery in cases where at common law the judgment would have gone against him. But the formal conditions on which the statutory right goes must be met; otherwise, the common law determines the judgment against the plaintiff. Under the Wisconsin statute, the right of recovery arises within two limitations, one of which, at least, is exceptional: First, the suit must have been brought for a death caused in Wisconsin; second, the suit must have been brought in one of the courts of that state. There is no legislative sanction in Wisconsin for any recovery by the plaintiff administrator other than within the lines as here named. The state of Wisconsin has not, by this statute, restricted a general right, or any right whatever, or made any restriction of any kind. To restrict a right is one thing; to create or grant a right within specified boundaries is another. In the former case, the common law is displaced by the restriction; in the latter, by the right. Where a right which did not exist at common law is given by statute, and the same statute specifies the court in which it is to be enforced, such right does not attach to the litigant in any other court. The specification of the particular tribunal marks, in such case, the scope of the right. This rule of statutory construction, I take it, is beyond dispute. Dudley v. Mayhew, 8 N. Y. 9; Chandler v. Hanna, 78 Ala. 290; Dickinson v. Van Wormer, 89 Mich. 141; Janney v. Buell, 55 Ala. 408; Phillips v. Ash, 68 Ala. 414; St. Pancras v. Batterbury, 2 C. B. N. S. 477; Hollister v. Hollister Bank, 3 Keyes, 245; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. 342.

The court, being such a one as is specified in the act, does not adjudge a recovery in favor of the plaintiff because anything has been added to its judicial power, but because the statute gives the right to the plaintiff. Nor does a court, other than as named in the statute, dismiss the suit for want of jurisdiction. It adjudges against the plaintiff, or permits him to dismiss, because he is unable to make out a cause of action. The question here is one of statutory construction, and it concerns the recovery adjudicated in favor of this appellee, rather than the jurisdiction of the district court to hear and determine whether or not a right of recovery was made out by him. The word "jurisdiction" is used somewhat untechnically in the first of the following quotations from section 899 of Sutherland on Statutory Construction: "When a right is solely and exclusively of legislative creation, when it does not derive existence from the common law or from the principles of equity, jurisdiction may be limited to particular tribunals, and new specific remedies provided for its enforcement. Then the jurisdiction can be exercised and the remedy pursued only as the statute provides." "When a right is given by statute and a specific remedy provided, or a new power and also the means of executing it are therein granted, the power can be executed and the right vindicated in no other way than that prescribed by the act."

The suit in question here was brought in the district court of the United States. Assuming for that court everything conceivable in the way of judicial power or jurisdiction, was there any law giving to this appellee a right to the recovery adjudged to him by that court? I insist that the statute of Wisconsin does not authorize the recovery, that said adjudication is without legislative sanction, is not within the statute, and is not to be vindicated any more than if it had been made in a court of Illinois or of England.

Lord Campbell's act, as re-enacted, in Illinois, for instance, contains no such limitation as that under discussion. The courts hold that the recovery may be had on such a statute in the Federal court if the citizenship be appropriate or in the courts of any state where the defendant can be found. But the recovery given by the Wisconsin statute arises within the limitation that the suit must be brought in some one of the courts of that state. If a suit intended to enforce the recovery given in that statute be brought in a foreign court, the plaintiff cannot succeed, because the Wisconsin statute fails to give him the right of recovery and by the common law the action does not survive. If, on the other hand, the suit is brought in a Wisconsin court, and be there prosecuted, or be thence removed under the Federal statute to the circuit court of the United States and be there carried on to a conclusion, the plaintiff, his case being otherwise good, will recover a judgment against the defendant. This result will not follow, as already said, because anything has been added to the jurisdiction of either the state or Federal court, but because all the conditions, including the requirement that the suit must have been brought in one of the courts of Wisconsin, have been met and the statute has thus become effective to give the recovery; because, in short, the plaintiff makes out his case.

If the legislature of Wisconsin had seen fit, the right of recovery might have been given in suits brought in certain specified courts of that state, in which event the plaintiff could not have made out a right to have judgment in his favor in any other court of the state; and this, without question, would have been the construction put upon the statute by the courts of Wisconsin. The limitation fixed in the statute is, as already stated, that the right of recovery shall arise in case the suit "be brought in some court established by the Constitution and laws of" Wisconsin. This language should be construed, if construction were needed, in connection with and in subordination to the Federal statute giving to a litigant the right to remove a suit brought in the state court to the circuit court of the United States. A suit brought in the state court, and afterwards removed to the circuit court of the United States, does not lose its identity in process of removal. The latter court takes up the proceeding where the former left off, and such proceeding continues to be a suit which was brought in the state court, and so falls within the express terms of the condition. If the recovery were given on the condition that the suit should be not only brought but thereafter carried on in a court of the state without being removed to a Federal court, the plaintiff would necessarily fail in every suit so removed. The legislative intent to give him the recovery would be wanting after the removal. As to any defendant entitled to remove, the state statute, being to that extent supplanted by Federal legislation, would be ineffective. But this exceptional result does not follow from the condition as written. I am not able to concur in a construction which would narrow the scope of the statute as here suggested, nor in the conclusion, reached in the prevailing opinion, that the condition under discussion is void. The logic whereby we may put into the words of the condition a meaning which they do not express, and then declare the condition void as the result of such construction, appears to me anomalous.

Where a statute creates a right of recovery,—declares a right which did not exist at common law,—but does not limit the scope of that right by specifying the court wherein, or the method of proceeding whereby, it may be enforced, such statutory recovery may be had in any court of general jurisdiction. This proposition is included in the following from the section in Sutherland above mentioned: "If a new right is created by statute and it is silent as to the mode of its enforcement, or as to the form of redress in case of invasion, then the proprietor of that right may resort to the common law or the existing general statutory proceeding for remedial process."

Where a cause of action arises at common law or in equity, the remedy in the Federal courts cannot be taken away or abridged by state legislation. And where, as said, a right is created by a state statute, without limitation as to the tribunal in which it can be asserted, such right, the suit being otherwise within the judicial power of the United States, will be enforced in a Federal court. But I know of no instance, other than the case at bar, in which a Federal court has insisted upon extending a right created by a state statute beyond the lines of such right as marked in the grant. In this respect, the decision before us for review, so far as I can find, is without precedent. The cases cited in the prevailing opinion do not, nor does any one of them, touch the question. In Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 445, 23 L. ed. 865, a statute of Wisconsin declared that a corporation of another state should not do business in Wisconsin without agreeing with the state that it would not remove to the circuit court of the United States any suit in which it might be made defendant, brought in a Wisconsin court. If the legislature of Wisconsin had declared that a foreign insurance company doing business in that state should not remove to the Federal court a suit which, under the Federal law, was removable, the sense and effect of the statute would have been the same. Such foreign corporation could not have become subject to such a regulation without coming into the state, and it could evade the same by departing from the state. The enactment as here paraphrased amounts to no more than a declaration that the foreign company shall not do business in Wisconsin unless it will agree as demanded. The common formula in the books is that a foreign corporation, coming into a state to do business, thereby agrees to all state laws touching foreign corporations. The disguise of an express agreement with the state so exacted by the state, does not change the character of the enactment. But, and this is the point to be noted, in Home Ins. Co. v. Morse the matter litigated was a cause of action at common law, a suit on a contract. The right asserted by Morse and contested by the company was not brought into existence by statute and within such lines that it could not attach to a litigant in an original suit in a Federal court. In Home Ins. Co. v. Morse the question was whether or not the suit could be removed to the Federal court under the Federal statute. Here the question is, Had the libellant a right of recovery? In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Whitton, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 270, 20 L. ed. 571, the suit was brought in a court of Wisconsin to enforce the right given by the very statute here in question. Said suit was afterwards removed to the circuit court of the United States, and that court ruled that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. This decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The question whether or not, in an original suit, not brought in a Wisconsin court, but in a circuit court of the United States, a recovery by plaintiff would be authorized by the statute here in question, was not before the Supreme Court of the United States, and apparently not even thought of by the learned writer of the opinion in that case.

The decision in the case at bar goes on the theory, either that the proviso here under discussion invades the judicial power of the United States as declared in the Constitution, or that said proviso conflicts with the Federal statutes specifying the jurisdiction to be exercised by the courts of the United States, and is, hence, void. If there were in this appellee a right of recovery at common law, and a state statute restricted the remedy for enforcing that right to the courts of the state, such statute would be void as in conflict with the law of the United States. If there were here a state statute which created a new right, without limitation as to the tribunal for enforcing it, such new right could be enforced as well in a Federal court as in any other. But here no restriction has been put upon the remedy for the enforcement of any right existing at common law, nor has the state created a new right which is general as respects the remedy. The same power which created the right in question, in so doing fixed the limits to which such right might extend or within which it could arise. By a rule of statutory construction, never disregarded till now, and against which it is impossible to frame a coherent objection, the right of recovery here does not attach to this appellee.

state, because the right given touches a subject within the constitutional jurisdiction of the Federal court."

But here the right is not given. If the assumed right were given, if it could be found within the bounds of the statute, if the court could create the right, such right would indeed touch or concern a subject-matter within the cognizance of the district court of the United States. I quote again from the opinion: "We think it not competent for a state to so restrict a general right that one entitled to invoke the jurisdiction of a Federal court in the prosecution or defense of a suit may not assert the right so granted in a Federal court, or that the state may in any way restrict the exercise of the jurisdiction of a Federal court to administer the law of the state between persons who come within its jurisdiction."

But here the right of recovery is not within the statute. Do we "administer the law of the state" by declaring such law void? If the statute had given the recovery in some one of the state courts, and the suit should be brought in another of the state courts, the law of the state would be that plaintiff could not recover; and it is the law of Wisconsin in the case before us that appellee cannot recover. Referring, further, to the sentence last quoted, there is here no "right so granted," nor has the state restricted "a general right." If the meaning be that the state of Wisconsin had no power to grant the right, within bounds as specified in the statute, I cannot assent to the proposition. A state may grant a restricted right. The selfsame power which creates a right may specify, and thereby fix, the bounds of the grant. The authority, for illustration, which created what is known as a patent right, to wit, the Congress of the United States, declared in effect that the right so created is enforceable only in a Federal court. In other words, the grant of a patent monopoly is, as respects the remedy for its enforcement, a restricted grant. The right to recover would not belong to a patentee in a suit for infringement prosecuted in a state court. This is true, regardless of the question whether or not, in a patent case, a state court would have jurisdiction; and such, in substance, was the ruling of the court of appeals of New York in Dudley v. Mayhew, above cited.

On my understanding of the matter, the legislature of Wisconsin has not given to this appellee a right of recovery in this case. Therefore, I do not concur in the judgment of affirmance.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

Samuel I. MYERS, Piff. in Err.,

v.

Frank HOLBORN.

(.....N. J.)

1. M., a practicing physician, promised H. to attend his wife at her confinement. Instead of doing so, however, he sent P., another physician, in his stead, who, by his unskillfulness, caused the death of the child. The shock from the child's death was such as to seriously affect the health of the mother, thereby depriving H. of her society and services, and causing him to incur expenses to which he would not otherwise have been put. Held, that P., being engaged in a distinct and independent occupation of his own, was not the servant or agent of M. in this matter, and that therefore M. was not liable for his unskillful or negligent acts.

2. No action will lie, in this state, for an injury caused by the death of a human being, except that which is given by the act of March 3, 1848 (Rev. p. 294), to the personal representatives of the decedent, for the purpose of recovering, for the benefit of the widow and next of kin, the pecuniary loss which they have suffered by such death.

3. The case of Grosso v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 50 N. J. L. 317, approved.

(November 10, 1895.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hudson County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for breach by defendant of his contract to attend plaintiff's wife during her sickness by reason of which plaintiff alleged that he was deprived of her society and put to great expense. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Collins & Corbin, for plaintiff in error:

Where one desiring to employ another to perform a service in his stead is obliged by law to employ a licensed person (as, of course, is the case with physicians in New Jersey), he is not responsible for the negligent, or defective, or improper execution of the work. The relation of master and servant does not exist.

Wood, Mast. & S. p. 600.

The fact that Dr. Poole was accepted on defendant's implied or express recommendation would not create a liability.

Hitchcock v. Burgett, 38 Mich. 501.

Mr. William H. Speer, Jr., for defendant in error.

Gummere, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error brings up for review a judgment of the Hudson circuit court rendered in favor of Holborn, the plaintiff below, and against Myers, the defendant below.

*Headnotes by GUMMERE, J.

NOTE.—The above case, which counsel writes was considered to be res integra in the state in which it arose, is apparently without precedent in any other forum.

As to authority of agent to employ for employee 30 L. R. A.

The principal facts which were proved at the trial of the cause are as follows: The defendant, a practicing physician of the city of Bayonne, promised the plaintiff, who resided in that city, to attend his wife professionally during her confinement. A short time before that event took place he left the city for a three-days' vacation; having first visited the wife of the plaintiff, and made an examination of her condition, from which he concluded, as he informed her, that his services would not be needed for a few days. Before his return, however, she was confined. The plaintiff, when his wife's travail came on, telephoned to the house of the defendant for him to come at once; and in response to this message one Dr. P. arrived, stating that Dr. Myers was out of town, and that he represented him, and proceeded to take charge of the case, and to deliver the plaintiff's wife of her child, without any objection being made. It was not suggested that his treatment of the wife was unskillful, but evidence was offered to show that after the birth of the child he improperly severed the umbilical cord so close to its body that it was impossible afterwards to tie it, and that the child consequently died, in a short time, of umbilical hemorrhage. The shock caused by her child's death under these circumstances, it was testified, so affected the mother as to seriously injure her health, and render her an invalid for many months, thereby depriving the plaintiff of her services and companionship, and making it necessary for him to incur expenses which he would not otherwise have been called upon to meet; and this suit was brought to recover compensation for such loss of services and companionship, and for such expenses, on the theory that Dr. P. was the agent and representative in this matter of the defendant, and that therefore he was legally liable for these results of Dr. P.'s unskillfulness. The trial judge adopted this theory, advanced on behalf of the plaintiff, in his charge to the jury, and so instructed them. In this, it seems to me, there was an error. Dr. P. and the defendant were each of them practicing physicians of this state, having no business connection with one another, except that Dr. P. was attending the patients of the latter while he was temporarily absent. Even if it be admitted, therefore, that Dr. P. was employed by the defendant to attend upon the wife of the plaintiff, that fact did not render the defendant liable for his neglect or want of skill in the performance of this service, for an examination of the authorities will show that a party employing a person who follows a distinct and independent occupation of his own is not responsible for the negligent or improper acts of the other. Laughter v. Painter, 5 Barn. & C. 547; Milligan v. Wedge, 4 Perry & D. 714; De Forrest

v. Wright, 2 Mich. 363; Wood, Mast. & S. § 811.

But even if I had reached the conclusion that Dr. P. was the agent of the defendant, in his attendance upon the wife of the plaintiff, I should nevertheless consider that there could be no recovery in this case for the losses sustained by the plaintiff. He does not complain that his wife was unskillfully treated by Dr. P., and that he thereby lost her services and companionship, and incurred expenses on that account to which he would not otherwise have been put. His claim is that such unskillfulness caused the death of his child, and that the shock of its death caused the sickness of the mother, with the consequent deprivation of her services and society, and the increase of his expenses. The gravamen of the action, it will be perceived, is the death of the child; and the injury sustained by the father, for which damages are sought to be recovered, is the result of that death. Since the decision of the supreme court in the case of Grosso v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 50 N. J. L. 317, it has been considered as settled law in this state that no action will lie for an injury caused by the death of a human being, with the exception of that provided by the act of March 8, 1848 (Rev. p. 294), which permits a recovery by the personal representatives of the decedent, for the benefit of the widow and next of kin, of the pecuniary loss resulting to them from such death. The decision in that case was rendered after a careful and exhaustive consideration, and the views expressed by Magie, J., in delivering the opinion of the court must be accepted as a correct exposition of the law on that subject.

The judgment of the Circuit Court should be reversed.

GIRARD FIRE & MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY of Philadelphia, Reopt.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. Action on a policy insuring plaintiffs on their building "against all direct loss or damage by fire." The policy further provided that if the building fell, "except as a result of fire," the insurance on the building should immediately cease. There was evidence tending to prove that a building adjacent to the one insured (the wall between them being a partition wall) caught fire and was partially consumed and as the direct result of such fire fell, carrying down with it the partition wall and a part of the insured building. Held, that, if such were the facts, the fall of the insured building was "the result of fire" and "a direct loss or damage by fire," although no part of it ignited or was consumed by fire.

2. The word "direct," in the policy, construed as meaning "immediate" or "proximate" as distinguished from "remote."

3. The policy provided that "if fire occur the insured shall give immediate notice of any loss thereby in writing to the company." Held, that a failure to give such notice for nearly sixty days after the fire constituted, as a matter of law, a breach of this provision.

4. The local agents of the insurance company, who issued the policy, had authority to accept applications for insurance, to fix the rate of insurance, fill up, countersign, and issue the policies "which they received from the company signed by its general officers," and collect the premiums.

*Headnotes by MITCHELL, J.

5. There was no evidence that they were clothed with any apparent authority other or greater than their actual authority. Held, that it was not within the scope of their authority to accept or waive notice of loss; following former decisions.

6. After the policy was dead and all liability on it had ceased by reason of plaintiffs' failure to give notice of loss, they transmitted proofs of loss to the general managers of the company, who retained the proofs but notified the plaintiffs that they "denied any liability under the policy on the part of the company." Held, no waiver of plaintiffs' failure to give notice of loss.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County denying their motion for a new trial after verdict in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Merrick & Merrick, for appellants:

If the insurer acquired the knowledge of the fire immediately after its occurrence, courts will not be very particular as to the manner in which the knowledge was acquired.

Roumage v. Mechanics' F. Ins. Co. 18 N. J. L. 110.

If Seeley & Co. were the general agents of respondent, and appellants had no knowledge of any limitation upon their powers, then notice to Seeley & Co. was notice to respondent.

NOTE.—The above case is said by counsel to be the only one that covers the precise point in regard to notice although there are many cases in respect to proofs of loss.

Direct loss or damage by fire means loss or damage occurring directly from fire as the destroying agency, in contradistinction to a remoteness of a fire as such agency.

California Ins. Co. v. Union Compress Co. 133 U. S. 415, 33 L. ed. 737.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought on a policy issued by the defendant to the plaintiff Ermentrout insuring him to the amount of $1,000 for one year, "against all direct loss or damage by fire," on his brick, iron roof, grain warehouse building and bins therein, including foundations and all permanent fixtures, etc."

The only other provisions of the policy involved on this appeal are as follows:

"If a building or any part thereof fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance by this policy on such building or its contents shall immediately cease.

If fire occur the insured shall give immediate notice of any loss thereby in writing to this company."

"The sum for which this company is liable pursuant to this policy shall be payable sixty days after due notice, ascertainment, estimate, and satisfactory proof of the loss have been received by this company in accordance with the terms of this policy."

When the plaintiff rested the defendant moved to dismiss the action for the reason that plaintiff had failed to establish his cause of action in that, (1) it did not appear that the loss or damage was the direct result of fire; (2) that it did appear that the plaintiffs had not given immediate notice of the loss in writing to the company.

The judge granted the motion, although placing his decision exclusively on the last ground. Of course, if the action should have been dismissed on either ground the ruling of the court must be affirmed.

1. The insured building was adjacent to another used as a feed mill, the wall between them being a partition wall. There is no claim that any part of the insured building was actually ignited or consumed by fire. The fire was confined to the adjacent feed mill, which fell, carrying down with it the partition wall and a part of the elevator insured, and the question to which both the examination and cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses seem to have been directed was whether the fall caused the fire or the fire caused the fall. While the evidence offered by plaintiffs was not of the most convincing or satisfactory character, yet we think it was such that the jury might have found either way on the question. We think that as the evidence stood when plaintiffs rested it would have justified the jury in finding that the feed mill had caught fire before it fell and that the fall was caused by the partial consumption of the feed mill and the weakening of the partition wall by the fire. If such were the facts, then we think the falling of the insured building was a "direct loss or damage by fire" within the meaning of the policy.

The provision that if the building fell, "except as the result of fire," the insurance thereon shall cease, was introduced into the policy by the insurer for its own benefit, and under a familiar rule must be construed, in case of ambiguity, most strongly against it. We think it has reference only to cases where the building might fall from some other cause than fire, as for example defective construction, the withdrawal of necessary support, storm, flood, or other like cause, and fire thereafter ensued. But it was not intended to exclude cases where fire was the immediate or proximate cause of the fall.

To render the fire the immediate or proximate cause of the loss or damage it is not necessary that any part of the insured property actually ignited or was consumed by fire. This is so well settled that the citation of authorities in support of the proposition is unnecessary. The question is, Was fire the efficient and proximate cause of the loss or damage? Thus, in one case where a house protected by a policy of insurance against damage by fire was injured by the falling of part of the wall of an adjacent house in consequence of fire in the latter house it was held that the fire was the proximate cause of the loss, and that the insurers were liable, although the house insured had never been on fire. Johnston v. West of Scotland Ins. Co. 7 Cases Ct. of Sess. cases (Scotch) 52.

The word "direct" in the policy means merely "immediate" or "proximate" as distinguished from "remote."

Counsel for defendant cites in support of a contrary view some language used by way of illustration in California Ins. Co. v. Union Compress Co. 133 U. S. 387-415, 33 L. ed. 730-737, in which the court names "destruction through the falling of burning walls" as an instance of remoteness of agency. The question was not before the court, for in that case the insured property was physically burned by the direct action of fire. If the court meant what counsel claims we cannot avoid the conclusion that the illustration was, to say the least of it, an unfortunate one.

2. Seeley & Co., who issued the policy, were the local agents of the defendant with authority "to receive proposals for insurance within the county of Hennepin, and to receive premiums thereon, and to give receipts and issue policies therefor."

It also appeared that these agents had authority to accept applications for insurance, fix the premium or rate of insurance, and fill up, countersign, and issue policies thereon which they received from the company signed by its president and secretary. So far as appeared from the evidence, this was the extent of their actual authority, and there was no evidence tending to show that their apparent authority was other or greater than their actual authority.

The only evidence of the giving of notice of loss, except the sending of proofs of loss to the general managers of the defendant at Chicago on or after October 9 (received by them on or about October 28), was to the effect that within a day or two after the loss one of the plaintiffs verbally notified Seeley & Co. that "the fire had destroyed the building." Although probably not material, it does not appear that he requested Seeley & Co. to give or forward the notice to the company or that they promised to do so or made any reply to the plaintiff.

As the loss occurred on the 12th of August it is clear, under the authorities, that as a matter of law the time for giving notice of loss had expired before the proofs of loss were sent to Chicago.

It is also settled law that where the policy requires notice of loss to be given to the insurer within a specified time such notice is a condition precedent to the right of action on the policy.

Hence for their right of recovery on the policy the plaintiffs rely on the verbal notice given to Seeley & Co. If Seeley & Co. were the proper parties to whom to give this notice,—in other words, if it was within the scope of their authority to receive notice of loss,—we would not feel any doubt but that if, when they received verbal notice, they made no objection to its form, they would be deemed to have waived the omission to give it in writing. But it is self evident that if they had no authority to receive such notice then they could waive nothing in the matter.

Upon this state of facts it was not within the scope of the authority of Seeley & Co. to receive or waive notice of loss, and hence notice to them was not notice to the company. Even if there could be any doubt of the correctness of this proposition as a new question it has been too long and too well settled in this state to be now considered open. Boutin v. Hekla F. Ins. Co. 36 Minn. 453; Shapiro v. Western Home Ins. Co. 51 Minn. 239; Shapiro v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. (Minn.) 63 N. W. Rep. 614.

But we think the rule is correct upon both principle and authority. It is in accordance with the general principles of the law of agency. It is elementary that a principal is only liable for acts done by his agent within the scope of the authority, actual or apparent, with which the principal has clothed him; that it rests entirely with the principal to determine the extent of the authority which he will give to his agent; also that every person dealing with an assumed agent is bound, at his peril, to ascertain the nature and extent of the agent's authority. In insurance cases courts frequently inaccurately 80 L. R. A.

classify agents as "local" and "general." But the extent of the territory which is to be the field of his agency is no test of the extent of an agent's authority within that field.

His field of operations may include the whole United States and yet his powers be special and limited. On the other hand, his field of operations may be confined to a single county or city, and yet his authority within that field be unlimited. In the present case there is no question of apparent; as distinguished from actual authority. The question is simply one of actual authority, expressed or implied. Authority to act in the matter of a loss under the policy after it has occurred is not expressly given. All the authority expressed relates to the making of the contract of insurance. It is a fundamental principle in the law of agency that a delegation of power, unless its extent be otherwise expressly limited, carries with it, as a necessary incident, the power to do all those things which are reasonably necessary to carry into effect the main power expressly conferred. But it is equally fundamental that the power implied shall not be greater than that fairly and legitimately warranted by the facts,—in other words, an implied agency is not to be extended by construction beyond the obvious purpose for which the agency was created. We do not think that mere authority to make a contract of insurance carries with it implied authority to act in the matter of a loss under the policy after it has occurred. If the implied authority extends to accepting notice of the loss it would logically follow that it also extends to proof of loss and even to the adjustment of the loss—a length to which no court has ever gone. The rule which we have adopted is also in accordance with the general current of the authorities. Lohnes v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 121 Mass. 439; Smith v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 60 Vt. 682, 1 L. R. A. 216; Bush v. Westchester F. Ins. Co. 63 N. Y. 581.

Occasional statements in some of the textbooks seem to announce a different rule; but they are not borne out by the authorities cited in their support. For example, in Wood on Fire Insurance, vol. 2, section 419, it is stated that "where an agent is entrusted with policies signed in blank, and is authorized to issue them upon the application of parties seeking insurance, he is thereby clothed with apparent authority to bind the party in reference to any condition of the contract, whether precedent or subsequent, and may waive notice or proofs of loss, and may bind the company by his admissions in respect thereto."

Upon an examination of the large number of authorities cited in support of the text, it will be found that not one of them tends to support the author's proposition as to proofs of loss, unless it be the vis prius decision in Ido v. Phenix Ins. Co. 2 Biss. 333, in which the question is not discussed, no authorities cited, and the statement of facts is so meager that it cannot be ascertained what the evidence was as to the actual or apparent authority of the agent.

Most, if not all, of the other cases may be classified as follows: First, cases holding whether the local law gives a lien upon the offending thing. If it merely gives a right of action in personam for a cause of action of a maritime nature, the district court may administer the law by proceedings in personam, as was done with a claim for half-pilotage dues under the law of New York, in the case of Ex parte McNiel, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 236, 20 L. ed. 624, but unless a lien be given by the local law, there is no lien to enforce by proceedings in rem in the court of admiralty."

We think the clear result of the authorities to be that the sovereignty of the state of Wisconsin extends to the middle of the lake, and that its laws, so far as they do not conflict with the laws of the United States passed in the regulation of commerce and of navigation, are operative within its prescribed boundary. Such state legislation upon subjects of a maritime nature has been generally recognized in the admiralty (The J. E. Rumbell, 148 U. S. 1, 37 L. ed. 845; The Lottawanna, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 558, 23 L. ed. 654; The America, 1 Low. Dec. 176, Fed. Cas. No. 289; The Marion, 1 Story, O. C. 68, Fed. Cas. No. 9,087; The California, 1 Sawy. 468, Fed. Cas. No. 2,812; The Glenearne, 7 Fed. Rep. 604; The B. F. Woolsey, Id. 108; The Julia L. Sherwood, 14 Fed. Rep. 590; The Two Marys, 10 Fed. Rep. 919, 16 Fed. Rep. 697; The Shady Side, 23 Fed. Rep. 731; Woodruff v. One Covered Scow, 30 Fed. Rep. 269), and we perceive no reason to deny operation of the law invoked in this case. It is not, in our judgment, like the case of the law of a state intended to be operative upon the high seas, which belong to no one nation and to no one people, but to all nations and to all peoples. In the absence of legislation by Congress denying a right of recovery for death occurring through negligent injury upon the waters of Lake Michigan, we perceive no reason for the refusal of an admiralty court to give effect to the beneficent provisions of this law within the limits of the state.

A question has arisen, not suggested by the appellant upon the argument, whether the proviso of the act of the legislature of the state of Wisconsin, that the action for damages occasioned by negligent injury causing death should be "brought for a death caused in this state and in some courts established by the Constitution and laws of the same," is a condition or limitation upon the right granted, so that the right can only be asserted and enforced by and through the courts of the state, and that suit therefore cannot be maintained in a Federal court. We are of opinion that the question must be resolved in the negative. The legislature of a state cannot confer jurisdiction of any sort upon a Federal court. Such tribunal derives its jurisdiction from the Constitution of the United States, not by grant from the legislature of a state. We enforce a right created by the state because the right given touches a subject within the constitutional jurisdiction of the Federal court. We think it not competent for a state to so restrict a general right that one entitled to invoke the jurisdiction of a Federal court in the prosecution or defense of a suit may not assert the right so granted in a Federal court, or that the state may in any way restrict the exercise of the jurisdiction of a Federal court to administer the law of the state between persons who come within its jurisdiction. The proviso of the act in question, if it was designed to and in so far as it restricts the enforcement of the right to a state court, is, in our judgment, inoperative and void. The judicial power of the United States, lodged in the Federal courts, extends, by the very terms of the Constitution, to all classes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The subject-matter of the right here asserted was within such jurisdiction. The statute, as said by Judge Lacombe, in The Transfer No. 4, supra, created a mere addition to the variety of cases embraced within that jurisdiction, so far as it comprehends deaths caused by negligent injury upon navigable waters within the state. It does not, as well held by Judge Brown, in The City of Norwalk, 55 Fed. Rep. 98, create a new cause of action. "It does, indeed, create a new right and liability; but it does not create a single one of the elements that make up the fundamental cause of action,—that is, the essential grounds of the demand. All these elements exist independently of the statute, and are not in the least affected by it. It no more creates the wrong, or the damage, than it creates the negligence or the death; nor does it, as in the pilotage and double wharfage cases, add anything to the damages sustained. It authorizes no recovery except for 'the pecuniary damages' already existing. It is apparent, therefore, that, as suggested by Mr. Justice Clifford, in American S. B. Co. v. Chace, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 532, 20 L. ed. 372, 'the statute does no more than take the case out of the operation of the common-law maxim that an action for death dies with the person.'"

A civil right of action, acquired under the laws of a state where the injury was inflicted, or a civil liability incurred, the action being transitory, may be enforced in the courts of any other state in which the party may be found, according to the course of procedure of the latter (Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cox, 145 U. S. 593, 604, 36 L. ed. 829, 833; Huntington v. At-trill, 146 U. S. 657, 670, 36 L. ed. 1123, 1128; Northern P. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190, 198, 38 L. ed. 958, 960), and this although a like wrong or liability would not be actionable in the state where the suit is brought. It is also settled that, whenever a state statute gives a right, the same may be enforced in a Federal court whenever the citizenship of the parties or the nature of the subject will permit. In Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 445, 23 L. ed. 365, the state of Wisconsin, having the right to determine the conditions upon which it would permit foreign corporations to transact business within its territory (Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 91 U. S. 535, 24 L. ed. 148), provided that any foreign fire insurance company should, as a condition of being permitted to do business within the state, appoint an attorney within the state upon whom process of law could be served, with an agreement of the company that it would not remove the suit for trial into the Federal court. It was held that an agreement of the company executed in pursuance of the provisions of the statute was void as against public policy, and that the provision of the statute was in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. The chief justice and Mr. Justice Davis dissented, upon the ground that the state could rightly exclude foreign corporations altogether from doing business within the state, and had therefore the right to impose such restrictions and conditions upon the company, in permitting its admission to the state, as it saw fit, and that the company accepted the permission with the conditions attached, and was bound thereby. This reasoning, however, was not accepted by the court. The decision has been often approved. Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. supra; Kern v. Huidekoper, 103 U. S. 485, 492, 26 L. ed. 354, 357; Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 30 L. ed. 915; Southern P. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 207, 36 L. ed. 942, 945; Goldley v. Morning News, 156 U. S. 518, 523, 39 L. ed. 517, 519. Mr. Justice Blatchford, in Barron v. Burnside, speaking for the court, says that the supreme court "has uniformly asserted that no conditions can be imposed by the state which are repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States." We consider the question foreclosed, and no longer open to discussion. No condition imposed upon a right granted by a state, which prevents one from availing himself of his constitutional prerogative of appeal to the courts of the United States, can be upheld. Such condition conflicts with the Federal Constitution, and is nugatory and void. In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Whitton, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 270, 30 L. ed. 571, an administrator, under letters of administration granted by the state of Wisconsin, but who was in fact a resident of the state of Illinois, brought suit against the railway company, a corporation of the state of Wisconsin, in a state court, to enforce a claim under the statute under consideration for negligent injury of the company causing the death of his intestate within the state of Wisconsin. He subsequently, under the provisions of the Federal statute, removed the suit into the Federal court. It was there objected that the right to sue in such case existed by virtue of the statute only, and that the right by the statute was given only on a condition that the suit be brought in a Wisconsin court. The contention was, however, overruled by the supreme court by the unanimous opinion of the judges, and it is there said (page 286, 30 L. ed. 576): "In all cases where a general right is thus conferred, it can be enforced in any Federal court within the state having jurisdiction of the parties. It cannot be withdrawn from the cognizance of such Federal court by any provision of state legislation that it shall only be enforced in a state court. The statutes of nearly every state provide for the institution of numerous suits, such as for partition, foreclosure, and the recovery of real property in particular courts and in the counties where the land is situated, yet it never has been pretended that limitations of this character could affect, in any respect, the jurisdiction of the Federal court over such suits where the citizenship of one of the parties was otherwise sufficient. Whenever a general rule as to property or personal rights, or injuries to either, is established by state legislation, its enforcement by a Federal court in a case between proper parties is a matter of course, and the jurisdiction of the court in such case is not subject to state limitation." See also Ellis v. Davis, 109 U. S. 485, 497, 498, 27 L. ed. 1006, 1010; Davis v. James, 2 Fed. Rep. 618; Holmes v. Oregon & O. R. Co. 5 Fed. Rep. 75; Mineral Range R. Co. v. Detroit & L. S. Copper Co. 25 Fed. Rep. 515.

It is sought to distinguish the Whitton Case from the present in this: that that suit was originally brought in a state court, and removed to a Federal court, while the case in hand was originally brought in a Federal court; and it is said that the former case was a compliance with the statute. We are unable to assent to the suggestion. The fact stated was given no significance in the Whitton Case. It was determined upon the broad principle stated. We cannot give to the word "brought," as used in the statute, so restricted a meaning. If the statute sought to limit the right of action to the courts of the state, it contemplated that the right given should be enforced by them and by them only. It would not be satisfied by the commencement of a suit in the state court, and its immediate removal to a Federal court. A like contention was urged in Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 369, 376, 377, 24 L. ed. 853, 854, 855, and was adversely disposed of. The jurisdiction exercised upon the removal is original. Removal is only an indirect mode by which the Federal court acquires original jurisdiction. Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 387, 25 L. ed. 667, 676.

With respect to fault in the collision here, we are satisfied with the conclusion of the district judge. It was the duty of the Holland to keep out of the way of the Aldrich. Considering that she had under charge a long and unwieldy tow, it was her duty to avoid dangerous proximity to the approaching vessel. Being thus bound to keep out of the way, the burden is cast upon her to prove that the collision was due to the fault of the other vessel. This duty has not been discharged. We are satisfied, from a careful consideration of the evidence, which, as usual in such cases, is quite conflicting, that the Holland first designed to pass to leeward of the Aldrich, and, in pursuance of that intention, passed the point of intersection of the courses of the two vessels, and then changed her purpose with a view to pass to windward. Otherwise, her green light would not have been exhibited to the lookout upon the schooner over the port bow. The change of course of the schooner was after the steamer had passed her to windward, and at a time when the collision was inevitable. It is probable that the Aldrich then swung up into the wind, because she was struck on the port bow between the stern and the cathead. The wheelman of the Aldrich insists that ment, be expedient, with a view to preventing a multiplicity of suits and costs. And also to commence and prosecute any and all such proceedings at law and in equity as may, within the judgment of our said attorneys, be necessary and proper for the purpose of collecting and realizing any and all sums of money which may become due to us, for premiums or otherwise, on account of any insurance, agreement, or policy made or entered into by us, by virtue hereof, or for the protection, establishment, or enforcement of any and all our rights in the premises, and, in their discretion, to compound, compromise, settle, withdraw, and discontinue the same. And also to do and perform for us, and in our names, every other act and thing in relation to any insurance or policy made by them by virtue hereof; hereby giving and granting unto our said attorneys full power and authority to do all and every needful and proper act and thing, and in and about the premises above specified, which we could do personally, and ratifying all that they may lawfully do, or cause to be done, by virtue hereof. Provided, always, and the power and authority hereby given and granted to our said attorneys are upon this express condition, that in no event or contingency shall the liability of any underwriter exceed the amount of the subscription by such underwriter on any one risk, and in no event or contingency shall any underwriter be liable for any part of the sum subscribed by any other underwriter, or which shall make us liable or affect us any otherwise than by a several and individual liability, or the amount insured or subscribed by us or in our names. The cost of office rent, printing, stationery, and other incidental expenses, postages, and commissions, shall be covered and paid by the said attorneys; they receiving in payment in lieu thereof 25 % commissions on the amount of premiums received, the costs and expenses of litigation excepted. And, in consideration of the premises, we do hereby covenant and agree, to and with the said attorneys, and each of them, and to and with each and every person and party to whom any policy of insurance shall be issued in our name by virtue of this power, or with whom any other agreement shall be made and entered into by our said attorneys in our name by virtue of the power and authority hereby granted, that we will, in all things, fully and faithfully carry out, execute, and fulfil the same, and do and perform everything to which our said attorneys shall by virtue hereof bind us, and pay or cause to be paid over to them, the said attorneys, on demand, any sum or sums of money that may be due by each of us, respectively, upon claims for losses incurred at any time over and above the provisions made herein; having this day, each of us, for himself only, deposited into the hands of the said attorneys, subject to the control of the finance committee, the sum of $500 as a guaranty fund: provided, also, that if, by reason of a fire, several risks insured under policies issued pursuant to the power and authority hereby given and granted to our attorneys are involved in such fire, no one of the underwriters shall upon such policies, collectively, become liable for more than five times the maximum amount which, under the said power of attorney, the said Whipple & Co. shall be authorized to subscribe for each of said underwriters on any one policy. In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our names, at the city of New York, this _____ day of _____, in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety."

The license was refused and the plaintiffs then instituted this proceeding to which the auditor demurred on the following grounds:

"(1) Because the petitioners fail to allege that they have filed with the auditor a certified copy of the charter or deed of settlement of the insurance company which seeks to obtain from the auditor permission to transact business in the state of Alabama, but, on the contrary, admit and aver that the association in behalf of which the application is made is an unincorporated concern, without any charter or deed of settlement. (2) Because the petitioners fail to allege that they have filed with the auditor a statement exhibiting the following facts and items in relation to the business condition on the 31st day of December, 1894, of the concern for which they are seeking to obtain permission to transact business in the state of Alabama, viz.: they fail to allege the amount of the capital stock of the company, and how much of the same has been paid up in cash. (3) Because the petitioners fail to show that they have filed with the state auditor a statement as required by section 1200 of the Code of 1886, subscribed under oath by the president and secretary, or other chief officers or managers, of the South & North American Lloyds, but, on the contrary, disclose that the said South & North American Lloyds have no president, secretary, or other chief officers or managers. (4) Because the facts averred in the petition disclose that the concern in behalf of which the petitioners are moving is not such an insurance company as the auditor is authorized and empowered to license, under the laws of Alabama. (5) Because the facts averred in the petition fail to disclose that the South & North American Lloyds is such an insurance company as the state auditor is authorized and empowered to license, under the laws of the state of Alabama."

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas Jones and Charles P. Jones for appellants.

Mr. William C. Fitts, Attorney General, for appellee:

The true rule is contained in the majority opinion in the case of Com. v. Vrooman, 164 Pa. 306, 25 L. R. A. 250. This is known as the pioneer case upon the subject of "Lloyds" and the ground therein taken by the majority of the court is thoroughly sound.

See also Com. v. Reinohl, 3 Pa. 287, 25 L. R. A. 247; Noble v. Mitchell, 100 Ala. 519, 25 L. R. A. 238, 239, and notes.

For a good demonstration of the actual practical workings of this mode of insurance, see State v. Stone, 118 Mo. 333, 25 L. R. A. 243.

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants applied to the auditor for license to engage in the fire insurance business within the state of Alabama. License having been refused by the auditor, they petitioned the city court for mandamus to compel the issuance of the license. The court sustained a demurrer to the petition, and from this ruling appellants appeal to this court. The petition and grounds of demurrer require a consideration of the character in which appellants propose to do an insurance business, as well as the meaning and extent of the statutes of this state regulating the insurance business within its limits. According to the showing made by the petition, the business was to be carried on in the manner of the ancient Lloyds. The respective liabilities and limitations of liability of the individual members to each other, and the rights, interests, and privileges defined and reserved to each other, and the limitation upon their respective liability fixed and declared in the policies of insurance to be issued in accordance with the instrument of organization as shown by Exhibit A to the petition,—which exhibit is in the statement of facts by the reporter,—are such that the business of insurance thus carried on may be included within the scope of the term "company," "association," or "individuals." Each underwriter is individually liable for a fixed amount, but not for the whole, or for any part of another underwriter's liability, yet all act together to effect the contract of insurance. In the former respect it is an individual undertaking, which becomes binding by the separate action of all. In the latter respect the policy is also the contract of a "company" or "association." It is not a partnership, in a legal sense, and in no sense can it be considered a corporation. It is an association or company of individuals organized to do an insurance business upon certain stipulations and conditions, evidenced by their written agreement. It is generally conceded—and in this conclusion we concur—that each state has ample power to regulate the business of insurance within its boundary. Whether a state has the authority, under the power to regulate, to exclude all individuals, companies, partnerships, organizations, and associations of persons from engaging in the business of fire insurance, and permit or empower corporations to monopolize the business, we need not consider. We have no statute which requires the consideration of this question. It seems there is a statute of this kind in Pennsylvania. Com. v. Vrooman, 164 Pa. 306, 25 L. R. A. 250.

The petitioners are nonresidents of Alabama, and are citizens of the state of New York; and the question we feel bound to determine, under the constitutional provisions of the United States and of this state, is whether, if the petitioners were citizens of the state of Alabama, seeking to engage in the fire insurance business upon the same terms and conditions as petitioners, there is any statute or principle of public policy to prohibit them, and whether there are any statutory regulations for engaging in the business applicable, and, if so, what do they require? Code 1886, pt. 1, chap. 5, title 12, art. 2, includes all the statutory provisions regulating fire insurance material in this connection. The caption to this article is as follows: "Fire, Inland, and Marine Insurance Companies Not Incorporated by This State." Trace these provisions back through the Codes of 1876 and 1867, and to the legislative enactments from which they were respectively codified, and it is evident they were intended to apply to and govern foreign corporations engaged in fire insurance in this state. The sections of the Code of 1886 originally codified from the act of February 24, 1860 (see Acts 1859-60, p. 118), and the act of March 8, 1875 (Acts 1874-75, p. 142), fairly interpreted, require this construction. Section 1200 of the Code of 1886, with its subdivisions, was taken from the Act of 8th of March, 1875, supra, and was enacted originally purely to regulate the business of foreign corporations doing business in this state. This was our conclusion in the case of Noble v. Mitchell, 100 Ala. 519, 25 L. R. A. 238, and notes. Under this view of the law, and which we think is undoubtedly correct, the sections of the Code of 1886 invoked by appellee can have no application to the petitioner. No such terms or conditions were imposed upon domestic corporations chartered by the legislature during the long period that corporations were chartered by the legislature.

On the 28th of February, 1867, the legislature enacted two separate acts in relation to fire insurance. The first is on page 85, and the last on page 105, of the Acts of 1866-67. These statutes have not been codified. By the first of these acts (page 85), it is provided "that all insurance companies doing business as such in the state of Alabama, whether chartered by the state, or admitted from other states, shall have an actual capital, fully paid up in cash, of not less than $1,000, no portion of which shall be represented by stock notes, or loans on the stock of said company or companies as collateral." It is further provided, in section 2, "that all insurance companies doing business in the state, both foreign and domestic, shall be required to make annual sworn statements to the auditor of their assets, condition, business of the previous year, in premiums, losses, and expenses, in the state, and as a whole." It will be observed that this act applies wholly and solely to insurance companies, domestic and foreign; and, construing the two sections together, we are of opinion that the act applies only to chartered companies. This conclusion would seem to follow from the caption and the body of the act. It says all insurance companies, "whether chartered by the state or admitted from other states." This construction places the act beyond the objection that it is discriminating legislation. If we were to hold that it applied to companies not incorporated, a burden would be placed upon companies not imposed upon an individual engaged in the same business. We do not doubt that an individual, in this state, may engage in and carry on a fire insurance business. There is nothing in such a contract that is unlawful, or against public policy. This proposition requires neither argument nor authority to support it. Where, then, is the constitutional authority for the legislature to impose a burden upon two or more persons who may prefer to associate together as a partnership or company to engage in the insurance business, and exempt the individual from such burden? We are constrained to the conclusion that the act cited includes only chartered companies, and has no application to the case made by the petition.

"An Act to Require All Insurance Companies Not Organized Under the Laws of This State, to Pay a Uniform License Tax of One Hundred Dollars Per Annum into the State Treasury for the Privilege of Doing Business in This State.

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of Alabama, that from and after the passage of this act, each and every insurance company not organized under the laws of this state, whether doing business as a fire, marine, or inland insurance company, and every life insurance company doing business upon any plan, whether mutual, co-operative assessment, or otherwise, and every accident or guarantee company, and every other style or class of insurance company, engaged in any business of insurance of any kind whatsoever, shall, before doing any business of insurance in this state, pay into the state treasury the sum of $100 per annum for the privilege of carrying on such business in the state of Alabama.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to apply to any secret or benevolent society, such as Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Knights of Honor, Iron Hall, or orders of like kind.

"Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, that all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be and the same are hereby repealed."

It is clear that this act refers only to foreign incorporated insurance companies. Its caption shows that only foreign insurance companies are to be embraced in the act. To apply the body to domestic corporations would render the act obnoxious to section 2, article 4, of the Constitution, which declares that "each law shall contain but one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title," etc. To apply the act to companies organized in other states, not incorporated, would impose upon citizens of other states a tax not imposed upon citizens of this state, engaged in the same kind of business, and it exempts individuals altogether. We are of opinion that this act applies only to foreign corporations, and does not apply to petitioners.

Our conclusion is (1) that there is no statute law in this state, nor principle of public policy, which prohibits the citizens of this state, acting as individuals, associations, partnerships, or companies, from engaging in the business of fire insurance without first being incorporated, and that the citizens of each of the United States are entitled to like "privileges and immunities;" (2) that the state has the right to adopt all needful rules and regulations which are reasonable to regulate the business of fire insurance in this state; (3) that the statutory regulations which are in force in this state apply to and govern only those companies or associations which have been incorporated either by authority of this state, or some foreign state or country; (4) that petitioners are citizens of New York, not incorporated, and are entitled to engage in the fire insurance business with the same privileges and immunities as unincorporated citizens of this state; (5) that there is no law which requires that they shall be licensed to do business in this state, and that the auditor has no authority to issue such license.

It follows, although from different principles, that the city court did not err in refusing to grant the writ of mandamus.

Affirmed.

B. F. LYNIP, Reapt.

(.....Nev.....)

1. A judgment that one of the parties to an election contest is the duly elected officer, and that he is entitled to the office on performing necessary acts, is not a judgment in which an election has been "annulled and set aside," within Gen. Stat. § 1569, requiring the appeal in such case to be taken within thirty days.

(September 27, 1895.)

APPEAL by contestee from a judgment of the District Court for Humboldt County in favor of contestant in a proceeding brought to contest the right of contestee to the office of District Attorney for Humboldt County. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Meers, Thomas E. Haydon and R. M. Clarke for appellant.

Mr. David S. Truman, for respondent:

After the judgment of the court is rendered against contestee the strong presumption is, which if left without an appeal within thirty days becomes conclusive, that he is not the legally elected officer to the office which is being contested.

Steel v. Steel, 1 Nev. 27.

The intention in contested election laws is that it is a summary remedy to speedily determine who are the duly elected officers of the people.

Webster v. Byrnes, 34 Cal. 277; Keller v. Chapman, Id. 635.

When the office becomes vacant the contestee has lost his rights to appeal, or move, or do anything in the action, as the vacating of the office by his failure to act within the statutory period extinguishes his rights because he has brought no suit or action, and is only before the court by his attempted appeal.

Minor v. Kidder, 43 Cal. 229; Royall v. Thomas, 28 Gratt. 180, 26 Am. Rep. 388; Virginia & T. R. Co. v. Ormsby County Comrs. 5 Nev. 341; Gilletts v. Sharp, 7 Nev. 245; Saunders v. Haynes, 18 Cal. 145; Gerrard v. Gallagher, 11 Nev. 886.

Where the statute gives a special right or remedy, it must be followed and the proceedings in contested election cases are substantially different from any common-law remedy.

Thorpe v. Schooling, 7 Nev. 15; Arnold v. Stevenson, 2 Nev. 234; State v. Washoe County Comrs. 6 Nev. 108; Torreyson v. State Board of Examiners, 7 Nev. 19; Dorsey v. Barry, 24 Cal. 449; People v. Rosborough, 29 Cal. 416.

The position that this is a "case" within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of this state is erroneous.

Dorsey v. Barry, supra; Hayne, New Trial & Appeal, § 172.

There should be a diminution of the record in this case by striking out the statement on motion for a new trial and everything but the judgment roll.

Hayne, New Trial & Appeal, § 5; Dorsey v. Barry, supra; Casgraves v. Howland, 24 Cal. 457.

When our legislature adopted the California law and did not make any provision for a new trial being had in these special proceedings, there can be no doubt of the intention of the legislature of this state, and that was, that there should be no new trial had.

McLane v. Abrams, 2 Nev. 199; State v. Robey, 8 Nev. 312; Williams v. Glasgow, 1 Nev. 583; State v. Parkinson, 5 Nev. 24; Gould v. Wise, 18 Nev. 254.

If it were permissible to leave the strip containing the number upon it on the ballot, when there is a like number on the stub, it would render this an unconstitutional act.

Williams v. Stein, 88 Ind. 89, 10 Am. Rep. 97.

Belknap, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an election contest. The parties were candidates for the office of district attorney for Humboldt county at the general election of November, 1894. According to the official returns, Gen. Buckner received the highest number of votes, and a certificate of 30 L. R. A.

his election was issued. Thereafter a contest was inaugurated by respondent, Lynip, and such proceedings had as resulted in a judgment of the district court in his favor, and against Buckner. A motion for a new trial was made in the district court by appellant, and denied by that court; and from the judgment, and the order denying the motion for new trial, this appeal is taken. Respondent moves in this court to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that it was not taken within the time required by the statutes of the state for an appeal to be taken in election contests. The motion is made upon the provisions of section 46 of the Act relating to elections (Gen. Stat. § 1569), which reads as follows: "1569. Sec. 46. Whenever an election shall be annulled and set aside by the judgment of the district court, and no appeal has been taken therefrom within thirty days, such certificate, if any has been issued, shall thereby be rendered void, and the office become vacant." The judgment was rendered February 20, 1895. The motion for new trial was denied upon the 11th day of May,—more than thirty days thereafter. The judgment was to the effect that Lynip was the duly elected district attorney of the county, and, upon his doing the acts required by the statutes to be done in such cases, was entitled to the office, etc. This judgment is not one in which an election has been annulled and set aside. The result of the election has been reversed in this: that Lynip, who was shown by the returns to the board of county commissioners to have been defeated, was declared elected by the judgment of the district court. But the election itself has neither been annulled nor set aside, but, on the contrary, it has been upheld. If it had been annulled, the statute declares, the office becomes vacant, and, if there is a vacancy, it must be filled as required by law. We do not understand counsel to admit that a vacancy does exist, but if the provisions above quoted are applicable to this case, and the election has been annulled, a vacancy in the office must be the result.

Our attention has been called to the meaning of the words "annulled and set aside," as employed in section 1561, Gen. Stat. The section is as follows: "1561. Sec. 88. When any election held for an office exercised in and for a county is contested on account of any malconduct on the part of the board of inspectors of any precinct, or any member thereof, the election shall not be annulled and set aside upon any proof thereof, unless the rejection of the vote of such precinct shall change the result as to such office in the remaining vote of the county." This provision is unimportant to the matter in hand. It states a principle applicable to all election contests; that is to say, that the person officially declared elected shall not be disturbed by vain and fruitless contests, and, unless a different result of the election can be reached, his election shall not be contested.

Respondent also moves the court to strike out all of the record in the case, except the judgment roll, upon the ground that the district court had no jurisdiction of the case after the entry of the judgment. The statute relating to elections (sections 1524 et seq., Gen. Stat.) confers original jurisdiction upon district courts in this class of cases (sec. 1568), and provides that a certified copy of the judgment of the supreme court may be used as proof in certain cases; but, with these exceptions, it is silent upon the subject. Nothing is said, in direct terms, upon the subject of new trials or appeals; and, under these circumstances, we must look elsewhere for the mode of procedure. The civil practice act was adopted long before the passage of the act relating to elections. It provides a mode for review upon motion for new trial or appeal in all cases tried by district courts, and, in enacting the election law, it was unnecessary to provide for any further mode of procedure than the practice act furnished. The decisions from California to which we have been referred are inapplicable to our statute concerning contested elections.

The motions are denied.

Bigelow, Ch. J., and Bonfield, J., concur.

On the Merits.

Bigelow, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The contestant and contestee, whom, for convenience, we shall call plaintiff and defendant, were rival candidates for the office of district attorney of Humboldt county at the election of 1894. Upon the returns, as canvassed by the board of county commissioners, the defendant had a majority of five votes; but, upon the trial of this contest in the district court, it was found that the plaintiff had received three more votes than his opponent, and he was accordingly declared elected. From this judgment, and an order refusing a new trial, defendant appeals.

In Rebel Creek precinct, in that county, it appears that defendant received fifteen votes; the plaintiff, one; and another candidate (H. Warren), twelve. The court rejected all the votes of that precinct, cast under the following circumstances: The ballots were printed, as required by law, with a strip on the left side, intended for a stub, separated from the ballot proper by a perforated line, and with a like strip on the right side, also separated by a perforated line. Upon each of these strips the number of the ticket was printed. By some accident the binding of the stubs into book form had become broken, permitting the ballots to separate into loose sheets. When a voter applied for a blank ballot, the entire sheet was given him by the inspectors, including the stub, which should have been separated from the ballot, and retained by the inspectors. When the ballot was returned to them for deposit in the ballot box, the inspectors removed the strip intended for a stub, but failed to remove the other strip. It is not charged that this was done by the inspectors fraudulently or intentionally, and the evidence is clear and uncontradicted that it was the result of a mistake upon their part; they, and apparently every one connected with the election, supposing that they had removed everything from the ballot that the law required to be removed. It does not appear when the mistake was discovered, but certainly not until after the polls had closed. Our statute, adopting what is popularly known as the "Australian Ballot Law" (Stat. 1891, chap. 40, § 11), provides that the secretary of state shall furnish to the county clerks the paper on which the ballots are to be printed, which is to be watermarked with a design to be chosen by the secretary. The ballots are to be printed under the direction of the county clerks. They are to contain the names of all candidates whose nomination has been certified and filed according to the provisions of the act, and no other name. The names are to be arranged under the designation of the office, and the political designation of each candidate is to be printed opposite his name. When a ballot is handed to a voter, the number of the ballot is to be written on the registry list, opposite his name. He must prepare his ballot by marking with a black lead pencil a cross or X after the name of the person for whom he intends to vote. Upon handing the ballot to the inspector, that officer "shall separate the strip bearing the number from the ballot, and shall deposit the ballot in the ballot box." Sections 24 and 26 of the Act, read as follows:

"Sec. 24. No ballot shall be deposited in the ballot box unless the watermark, as hereinbefore provided, appears thereon, and unless the slip containing the number of the ballot has been removed therefrom by the inspector."

"Sec. 26. In counting the votes any ballot not bearing the watermark as provided in this act shall not be counted, but such ballot must be preserved and returned with the other ballots. When a voter marks more names than there are persons to be elected to an office, or if for any reason it is impossible to determine the voter's choice for any office, his vote for such office shall not be counted. Any ballot upon which appear names, words, or marks written or printed, except as in this act provided, shall not be counted."

Any officer wilfully neglecting or refusing to perform any duty devolved upon him by the act is, upon conviction, to be imprisoned in the state's prison for from one to five years.

It will be noticed that the statute does not expressly direct that a ballot upon which this strip has been left shall not be counted, but these ballots were rejected upon the ground that they came within the latter part of section 26, which inhibits the counting of ballots "upon which appear names, words, or marks written or printed, except as in this act provided;" and this is the point to be determined upon the appeal, so far as they are concerned. It is, perhaps, a close question, and one upon which courts and judges may easily disagree. It is to be observed that the voters of this precinct were themselves in no wise in fault. They possessed every qualification for voting, and had complied with every requirement of the law as to registration, marking their ballots, etc.; and it is earnestly pressed upon us by defendant's counsel that if this law is to be construed as preventing the counting of their votes, either for the wilful fraud or innocent mistake of the inspectors in not removing the slip, it is unconstitutional, within the principles of Stinson v. Sweeney, 17 Nev. 309; Davies v. McKesby, 5 Nev. 389; Clayton v. Harris, 7 Nev. 64, and similar cases. See also Moyer v. Van De Vanter (Wash.) 29 L. R. A. 670 (recently decided). As we are, however, of the opinion that that is not the correct interpretation of the act, it is unnecessary to consider this argument any further than as it throws light on the proper construction of the statute. It seems to us that ballots cast under the circumstances existing here should not be rejected, and we will now state, as briefly as possible, the reasons upon which our conclusion is based:

The right of voting, and, of course, of having the vote counted, is one of most transcendent importance,—the highest under our form of government. "That one entitled to vote shall not be deprived of the privilege by the action of the authorities is a fundamental principle." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 775. We need not go outside the decisions just cited from our own court, to show how jealously this right is guarded. But while the legislature cannot directly deprive the elector of this privilege, section 6, article 2, of the Constitution specially authorizes it to enact laws for the registration of electors, to preserve the purity of elections, and to regulate the manner of holding and making returns of the same. Such laws will necessarily sometimes have the effect of preventing the elector from voting. For instance, a law for the registration of voters, to be effectual, must provide that one not registered shall not vote; and, to guard the purity of the elections, it may require him to mark his ballot in a certain way, and to comply with many other conditions. But in all these matters the voter had the privilege of voting, by a compliance with the law, and his failure to do so is somewhat owing to his own negligence or misfortune. Whether he can also be deprived of it through the fraud, negligence, or mistake of others would involve the constitutional question suggested, and upon which we find it unnecessary to pass in this case. At least, this great constitutional right is not to be taken from him upon any doubtful construction of a statute. Assuming the constitutionality of the law, before it should be construed to work his disfranchisement it must be clear that, under the circumstances then existing, the legislature intended such to be the case. The spirit in which such laws are to be construed is well stated by Andrews, Ch. J., in Talcott v. Philbrick, 59 Conn. 485, 10 L. R. A. 150, as follows: "All statutes tending to limit the exercise of the elective franchise by the citizen should be liberally construed in his favor, and unless a ballot comes within the letter of the prohibition against a particular kind of a ballot, it should be counted. A great constitutional privilege—the highest under the government—is not to be taken away on a mere technicality, but the most liberal intentment should be made in support of the elector's action whenever the application of the common-sense rules which are applied in other cases will enable the courts to understand and render it effectual." "All statutes tending to limit the citizen in his exercise of this right should be liberally construed in his favor. Unless the ticket comes within the letter of the prohibition, it should be counted." Owens v. State, 64 Tex. 500, 509. To the same effect are State v. Saxon, 30 Fla. 668, 18 L. R. A. 721; State v. Phillips, 63 Tex. 890, 51 Am. Rep. 646; Boyd v. Mills, 58 Kan. 594, 25 L. R. A. 486; Kellogg v. Hickman, 12 Colo. 256; Bowers v. Smith, 111 Mo. 61, 16 L. R. A. 764; Parvin v. Wimberg, 180 Ind. 561, 15 L. R. A. 775; State v. Russell, 84 Neb. 116, 15 L. R. A. 740; Stackpole v. Hallahan (Mont.) 28 L. R. A. 503. Laws are also to be construed according to their spirit and meaning, and not merely according to their letter. "It is a familiar canon of construction that a thing which is within the intention of the makers of a statute is as much within the statute as if it were within the letter, and a thing which is within the letter of the statute is not within the statute, unless it be within the intention of the makers." Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 5 L. R. A. 840. "It is one of the great maxims of interpretation to keep always in view the general scope, object, and purpose of the law, rather than its mere letter." Rutledge v. Crawford, 91 Cal. 583, 18 L. R. A. 761. "A rigid and literal reading would, in many cases, defeat the very object of the statute, and would exemplify the maxim that 'the letter killeth, while the spirit keepeth alive.' Every statute ought to be expounded, not according to the letter, but according to the meaning. . . . And the intention is to govern, although such construction may not, in all respects, agree with the letter of the statute." The reason and object of a statute are a clue to its meaning, and the spirit of the law and the intention of its makers are diligently to be sought after, and the letter must bend to these. Tracy v. Troy & B. R. Co. 38 N. Y. 433, 437, 98 Am. Dec. 54. This meaning is undoubtedly to be ascertained from the language of the act, viewed in the light of the circumstances under which it is used. If plain and unambiguous, it must be construed as it reads, no matter how unreasonable its operation may be. But as it is not to be presumed that the legislature intended to enact an unreasonable or unjust law, where such would be the result of its operation, if construed in a certain way, and the language is not positive and direct to that effect, it is the duty of the courts to cast about to see if it is not susceptible of some other construction, and in doing this they should consider, not only the language used in some particular section, but the whole scope and purpose of the act, and adopt, if possible, such a construction as will harmonize the various sections with this purpose, and with the demands of justice.

What were the object and purpose of the enactment of the Australian ballot law, the essential features of which have now been adopted by nearly every state in the Union? This question has often been answered by the courts, and sometimes in language that we shall not attempt to improve upon. In one case the supreme court of Connecticut said: "The object of the Statute of 1889 is obvious. It is to secure an honest vote, correctly expressing public sentiment, by preventing fraud, corruption, and intimidation." After speaking of certain provisions of the Connecticut law, the court resumed: "This would seem to effectually preclude any opportunity for fraud or imposition,—corruption, by making it impossible for any one who would bribe or otherwise corrupt a voter to know that the required vote was actually deposited; intimidation by giving to each voter an opportunity to select and prepare his ballot, and to deposit it free from observation, and in such manner that no one but himself can possibly know how he votes unless he chooses to disclose it." Talcott v. Philbrick, 59 Conn. 472, 478, 10 L. R. A. 150. In another case it was said: "A study of the statute upon the subject of elections leaves no doubt that its purpose is to secure a fair expression of the will of the electors of the state, by secret ballot, uninfluenced by bribery, corruption, or fraud. The disfranchisement of whole precincts by reason of an honest mistake on the part of election officers is inconsistent with this purpose." Parvin v. Wimberg, 130 Ind. 571, 15 L. R. A. 775. And again: "The evident intent of this provision was to provide against voters marking the individual ballot which they cast, in such manner as to distinguish it." Lindstrom v. Manistee County Canvassers, 94 Mich. 471, 19 L. R. A. 171.

This being the object of the law, it should be so construed as to remedy the evil against which its provisions are directed, and, at the same time, not to disfranchise voters further than is necessary to attain that object. It would be almost the work of omniscience to enact a law in such language that it would not, under any circumstances, do more nor less than was intended by the lawmaker. Even words most carefully chosen will, in some unanticipated situation, overrun that intention, and in others fall short of it. It is the duty of the courts to keep that intention, once it is ascertained, steadily in view, and to endeavor to apply the law where it was intended to apply, and to except those cases where it was not. It being, then, the purpose of the law to effectually prohibit and prevent intimidation and vote buying, all its provisions were enacted with that end in view. Where it is forbidden to count ballots containing names, words, or marks other than those provided for in the act, notwithstanding the generality of the language, only such as tend to distinguish the ballots were intended, and such as were, or may have been, placed upon the ticket for that purpose. For instance, all nominations for state offices are to be filed in the office of the secretary of state, and he is to certify them to the various county clerks. It certainly never was intended that if he should, either by inadvertence or design, certify the name of a person who had not been nominated, and which was therefore wrongfully printed upon the ballot, this should invalidate, and require the rejection of, every vote cast in the state; and yet this would be the result of a strict adherence to the letter of the law, for it would be a name on the ballot not provided for by the act. The same may be said of the wrongful printing of a name on the ballots by order of the county clerk, or the insertion by the printer of a word or mark not provided for by the law, and which would be on all tickets alike. This would in no manner tend to distinguish one ballot from another, and could not be used for a fraudulent purpose. Such a word or mark would not be within the spirit of the law, although within its letter; and in such case the law should be liberally construed in favor of the voter, and not so as to disfranchise a whole county. This simply illustrates the proposition that there are situations in which the legislature could not have intended that ballots with forbidden words or marks upon them should not be counted. They are instances of where the language has overrun the intention. But in the case we have to deal with here the marks upon the ballots (admitting that marks upon the strip attached to the ballot are marks upon the ballot itself, as is doubtless within the intention, if not the letter, of the law), although not placed thereon intentionally, nor with the voters' knowledge or consent, are such as to identify the ballots. Does this alter the case? Under the circumstances existing here, could this fact have been used for the purposes of intimidation or bribery? It is not possible to intimidate a man into voting for men or measures against his will, unless he has reason to believe that if he does not so vote it will become known to the intimidator. Here the voter knew that if the law was complied with no one could ever ascertain how he had voted. It is not shown that any knew that it was not being complied with, and in fact the fair inference from the testimony is that it was not known to any one until after the polls had closed. All supposed that the slips were being removed, and it follows that none could have been intimidated by the fact that they were left on the ballots. But the principal reason for forbidding these distinguishing marks was undoubtedly to defeat bribery. It was believed that the vote buyer would not invest money in the purchase of votes if there was no way by which he could ascertain whether the voter had voted as agreed. The only way in which this could be done by means of marks would be by some mark being placed upon the ballot which had been agreed upon between them; and it must be done either by the voter himself, or by some one else with his knowledge and consent. It is clear that this slip was left on the ballots accidentally, and not for any such purpose as that; and therefore it is not within the spirit or meaning of the law, so far as corruption is concerned. By the blunder of the inspectors, the strips and numbers were left upon the ballots, whereby it was possible to ascertain just how each one had voted. This was done unintentionally, and without the voters' knowledge. Consequently, as we have tried to show, it could not have been made the means of intimidation, nor the agent of corruption. But by reason of it, without being at all in fault themselves, the voters have incurred all the odium and disadvantage of having the knowledge of how they voted made public. What reason can there be for adding to their punishment that of disfranchisement? To so hold would be like piling Ossa upon Pelion, and, it would seem, was clearly not intended by the law. To hold that it was, would be not to liberally construe the act in favor of the voter, but strictly against him.

In addition to what we have said of the scope and spirit of the ballot law, we think there is that in the letter of the act which strengthens our conclusion very much. By section 24, already quoted, it is provided that no ballot shall be placed in the ballot box upon which the watermark does not appear, nor from which the slip has not been removed. But, while section 26 provides that ballots found in the box not bearing this watermark shall not be counted, it says nothing about the slip being left on. Considering the juxtaposition of those terms in section 24, it is hardly probable that the omission to mention the slip in section 26 was accidental. If not, it clearly indicates an intention that leaving the slip on should not cause the rejection of the ballot. There is reason, too, why such a distinction should be made. If a citizen votes a ballot not bearing the watermark, he is somewhat in fault himself; and, besides, there could be but one purpose for substituting such a ballot for one that was genuine, and that would be fraud. On the other hand, the slip is to be removed by the inspector after the ticket is surrendered to him, and with this the voter has nothing to do; and very often, as in this case, it might be left on the ballot by oversight or accident. In this connection we quote from the recent decision by the supreme court of Washington, already mentioned. Speaking of the decisions that have been rendered under the ballot laws of the different states, the court said: "These cases cannot all be harmonized, but the general trend thereof has been to recognize a clear distinction between those things required of the individual voter and those imposed upon election officers. There is a disposition to hold the former valid and mandatory; but where there has been a substantial compliance with the law on the part of the individual voter, and it is made to appear that there has been in fact an honest expression of the popular will, there is a well-defined tendency to sustain the same, although there may have been a failure to comply with some of the specific provisions of the law upon the part of the election officers, or some of them." Moyer v. Van De Vanter (Wash.) 29 L. R. A. 670. In that case the law required the inspector, or one of the judges, to write his initials on the ballot before it was delivered to the voter, and directed that any ballot not bearing those initials should be void, and not be counted. But it was held that the law was unconstitutional, and, where the officials had failed to so mark any of the ballots of a precinct, that they should still be counted. There are decisions conflicting with the views we have expressed, but we believe the greater in number, and the better-considered cases, support our conclusions. We have examined them all, but it would be an endless and unprofitable task to review them, and we shall not attempt it. Our conclusion concerning these ballots renders it unnecessary to pass upon the other ballots objected to by appellant.

Judgment and order refusing a new trial reversed, and cause remanded.

Bonnifield, J., concur.

Belknap, J., dissenting:

The law of 1891 directs that the number of each ballot shall be the same as that of the corresponding stub (sec. 12, chap. 40), and that the number of the ballot shall be written upon the registry list, opposite the name of the voter receiving it (sec. 19, chap. 40). After preparing the ballot, it must be delivered to the inspector, who shall separate the strip bearing the number from the ballot, and deposit the ballot in the ballot box. Section 20, chap. 40. At Rebel Creek precinct, the inspector, through ignorance of the law, and not wilfully, neglected to separate the strip bearing the number from the ballot. The entire vote of the precinct was cast in this way. The act of the inspector was in direct disobedience to the requirements of the law, which, in section 20, chapter 40, declares that the strip and number shall be destroyed before the ballot is cast; and by section 24, chapter 40, that no ballot shall be deposited in the ballot box unless the slip containing the number of the ballot has been removed by the inspector. I refer to these provisions, not as authorizing the canvassers to throw out the ballots, but as illustrating the intention of the legislature in passing the statute providing for a secret ballot. The prohibition against counting ballots is contained in the twenty-sixth section of the act, as follows: "Sec. 26. In counting the votes any ballot not bearing the watermark as provided in this act, shall not be counted, but such ballot must be preserved and returned with the other ballots. When a voter marks more names than there are persons to be elected to any office, or if for any reason it is impossible to determine the voter's choice for any office, his vote for such office shall not be counted. Any ballot upon which appear names, words, or marks, written or printed, except as in this act provided, shall not be counted." Under the last sentence of this section these ballots should not be counted. The purpose of the act, as expressed in its title, is "An Act Relating to Elections and to More Fully Secure the Secrecy of the Ballot." No act of the inspectors was so well calculated to expose the vote and defeat the intention of the legislature as their neglect to destroy the number on the slip. Any person, upon inspection of the registry list, could have ascertained the vote of each elector. I admit that if my views are to be adopted the voters of the precinct at that election will be disfranchised, but I am confronted with what I think are clear and imperative provisions of law, incapable of judicial construction. Under the English law of 1872, the presiding officer at the polling station marked upon the face of the ballot given to each the number of the voter appearing on the burgess roll, which would enable any one, upon inspection, to identify the way in which the party had voted. It was held that these ballots were void, and should not have been counted; but the error did not affect the result of the election; the prevailing candidate having been elected, irrespective of the contested ballots. Woodward v. Sarsons, L. R. 10 C. P. 733. In West v. Ross, 53 Mo. 850, the law of Missouri required the ballots to be numbered, and provided that any ballot not numbered should not be counted. The judges of election, through inadvertence, neglected to number any of the ballots; but the court held that the statute was mandatory, and all of the ballots were rejected. The court said: "This case may be a hard case and doubtless is; but the legislative enactment is clear, and although it may deprive a portion of the citizens of the county of their right to be heard in the election of a clerk at one election, it is better that they should suffer this temporary privation, than that the courts should habituate themselves to disregard or ignore the plain law of the land in order to provide for hard cases." In the present case the legislature has provided and required that the ballots shall be numbered, and then provides in express terms that no ballot not numbered shall be counted. Can we say that such ballots shall be counted without an attempt at judicial legislation? I think not, and it would be a misapplication of terms to say that such a statute is only directory." For these reasons I dissent from the judgment.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Henry C. GRIGGS, Reept.,

v.

Moses DOCTER et al., Appts.

1. Creditors who, having instituted garnishment proceedings in a foreign state to reach wages exempt by the law of the debtor's domicile, dismiss that garnishment, but take judgment, issue execution, and reach the wages by garnishment on the execution after the issuance by the courts of such domicile of an order restraining them from collecting any exempt wages by "said garnishee proceedings,"—may be compelled to refund to the debtor the exempt amount reached, with interest.

2. A clause in a judgment restraining creditors from prosecuting garnish-

NOTE.—Injunctions against judgments in garnishment proceedings.

I. Necessity of making defense at law.

II. Injunctions for errors and irregularities.

III. Void judgments.

IV. Fraud and mistake.

V. Payment.

VI. Set-off.

VII. Injunctions in behalf of creditors.

The case of GRIGGS v. DOCTER holds that where an interlocutory order was made against proceedings by garnishment in a foreign state to subject exempt earnings, and both parties resided in the state where the injunction was granted, and the defendants released their garnishment proceedings but took judgment in their main action, and upon execution issued further garnishment, the interlocutory injunction extends to such subsequent garnishment proceedings.

For an injunction against attachment proceedings of exempt earnings, see note to Thorndike v. Thorndike (II), 21 L. R. A. 72.

It is generally held that relief will not be granted in equity against judgments in garnishment where there has been a failure to make a defense at law, and this on the ground that equity will not aid a party who has been negligent in asserting his legal rights, and that judgments at law in garnishment cases are erroneous, is not sufficient ground for interference by injunction. So, injunctions will be refused where there is an adequate remedy at law. On the other hand, equity will usually interfere and enjoin judgments in garnishment proceedings that are obtained by fraud or mistake, where complainant has not been guilty of negligence, or the judgments are void, or are paid, or there is an equitable defense, or where the party has been diligent in making his defense and there is no adequate remedy at law, or where there is an equitable or new defense discovered since the judgment.

I. Necessity of making defense at law.

It is the duty of the garnishee to act promptly in making his defense, either when sued by his original creditor, or when sued in garnishment; and an injunction will not be granted when there was a failure on the part of the garnishee to make a defense at law which is not excused, and this on the ground that the party who is negligent in asserting his rights at law is not entitled to the aid of a court of equity. Paynter v. Evans, 7 B. Mon. 420; Carroll v. Parkes, 1 Bax. 200; Yarborough v. Thompson, 3 Smedes & M. 201; Danaher v. Prentiss, 22 Wis. 811; Sanders v. Fisher, 11 Ala. 812.

Especially where the bill of complaint does not show that the complainant had no effects in his possession belonging to the creditor, and therefore fails to show that the judgment is unjust. Hair v. Lowe, 19 Ala. 224.

Where a sale under a judgment was advertised for November, 1871, and in October a garnishment was served against the debtor, and he could have answered in March, 1872, that his property had been sold, and that he owed nothing or that he owed the balance, the failure to defend will prevent an injunction against proceedings under garnishment. Carr v. Lee, 44 Ga. 376.

And the negligence of a garnishee in permitting a judgment of garnishment, and also a judgment against him in favor of his creditor in another action, to be taken without filing a bill of interpleader, prevents an injunction against the judgment. Yarborough v. Thompson, 3 Smedes & M. 201, 41 Am. Dec. 623.

Where complainant as garnishee was served ment proceedings against their debtor in another state to reach exempt wages "so long as plaintiff remains a resident of this state." If incorrect, is rendered harmless by a subsequent clause limiting the operation of the judgment to earnings which are exempt.

(January 8, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to enjoin garnishment proceedings which had been instituted in another state to reach wages which plaintiff claimed to be exempt. Affirmed.

Statement by Winslow, J. :

Action in equity to enjoin the prosecution of garnishment proceedings in the state of Iowa. The plaintiff is a married man, with a family dependent upon him, residing in this state, and is in the employ of the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company. The defendants, who are also residents of Wisconsin, brought action against him in Iowa, and garnished his exempt earnings in the hands of the railway company. Pending these proceedings this action was commenced in the circuit court of Milwaukee county, and an interlocutory injunctive order was granted and served on the defend-with process at the suit of two different attaching creditors, and, failing to disclose the fact of service in the other cases, two judgments were obtained against him for the same debt, an injunction was refused. Houston v. Wolcott, 7 Iowa, 178.

So, the injunction will not be granted where the garnishee, having notice, failed to make a defense that the creditor had assigned the debt against him. Field v. McKinney, 60 Miss. 763; Haseltine v. Brickley, 16 Gratt. 116; Richmond Enquirer Co. v. Robinson, 24 Gratt. 543.

And a garnishee cannot have a judgment against him enjoined on the ground that he owed the debt to another party, but was prevented from making a defense by a misunderstanding between himself and his attorney, and negligence of his attorney. Nevins v. McKee, 61 Tex. 412.

So, a garnishee allowing a judgment to be taken against him after he had paid out the money to the judgment debtor cannot have an injunction against proceedings on the judgment, where no excuse is offered for failure to defend. Stroup v. Sullivan, 2 Ga. 275, 46 Am. Dec. 390; Sanders v. Fisher, 11 Ala. 812.

So, a garnishee who does not answer cannot enjoin the judgment by showing that proof was not heard as to his liability, where the record of the case shows that it was. Braden v. Reitzenberger, 18 W. Va. 286.

And the mistake of a garnishee in not showing that the debt he owed is not yet due, will not be relieved against by injunction, on the ground of negligence. Alleman v. Kight, 19 W. Va. 201.

So, a mistake of law made by a garnishee in not moving for a stay of proceedings in one suit until another for the same debt was terminated will prevent him from enjoining a judgment, and is not ground for relief. Danaher v. Prentiss, 22 Wis. 811.

The failure of a married woman to appear and defend as garnishee will prevent an injunction in her favor, against the judgment of condemnation in attachment, as a married woman is under no disability. Ahern v. Fink, 64 Md. 161.

And a judgment of a circuit court holding a garnishee liable on a claim against a husband where he had given the wife of the husband his note is final and conclusive, and will not be enjoined on the ground that the note belongs to the wife. (The injunction was refused for failure to defend.) Lyday v. Duple, 17 Md. 188.

A garnishee will not be entitled to an injunction against proceedings upon an execution against him for the same debt in favor of another creditor, where he has adequate remedy by interpleader and does not tender the amount into court. Hastings v. Cropper, 3 Del. Ch. 165.

But an injunction will be granted a judgment debtor on an interpleader setting up that he has been garnished by creditors of the plaintiff at law. Henderson v. Garrett, 35 Miss. 554.

And a judgment debtor may be held as garnishee of the judgment creditor, in favor of a creditor of the judgment creditor, where the two actions are in the same court; and in such a case injunction will lie in favor of the judgment debtor to restrain the collection of the judgment pending the garnishment proceedings. Keith v. Harris, 9 Kan. 395.

II. Injunctions for errors and irregularities.

The general rule is that injunctions are not granted against judgments for irregularities in the proceedings of garnishment, and are not usually granted on account of erroneous rulings or decisions, as relief may generally be at law.

So, a garnishee summoned by a wrong name, appearing and allowing a judgment against him by his true name, cannot thereafter have the execution enjoined where there is no allegation that he does not owe the debt. Williams v. Hitzig, 38 Ind. 303.

And that a garnishee did not understand the English language or the purport of process served on him is not sufficient to enjoin the judgment. Windwart v. Allen, 13 Md. 193.

And a judgment against the garnishee will not be enjoined for an irregularity of insufficiency of the bond relating to his creditor, who is a party to the same suit. Field v. McKinney, 60 Miss. 763.

And irregularity in rendering a judgment against a garnishee without attachment proceedings against the debtor will not authorize an injunction against proceedings on the judgment by the garnishee, where no defense was made, and there was a remedy by appeal. Earl v. Mathoney, 60 Ind. 203.

So, irregularity in rendering a judgment by default against a corporation contrary to statute will not authorize an injunction against the same. Boyd v. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. 17 Md. 195, 79 Am. Dec. 646.

And that an erroneous judgment was rendered on insufficient evidence will not authorize an injunction. Braden v. Reitzenberger, 18 W. Va. 286; Smith v. Bank of Holmes County (Miss.) 18 So. Rep. 847.

And that the rulings on evidence were erroneous, and that the garnishee's attorney was sick at the time of trial, and the new attorney was unable to do the case justice, was not sufficient to entitle an injunction. (It did not appear what had been done on a motion for a new trial, although there were two judgments against the garnishee for the same debt.) Gibson v. Cohen, 35 Ga. 750.

And errors in a judgment in refusing a defense of a garnishee, and a bill of interpleader, will not be grounds for an injunction. Danaher v. Prentiss, 22 Wis. 811.

But in Dobbins v. Wybrants, 3 Tex. 457, it was said that a garnishee liable in judgment of garnishment may obtain an injunction against a judgment in favor of the original creditor against him for the debt, where he pleaded that the garnishing creditors should be made parties, and pleaded the garnishment in discharge of the debt, which plea ants, restraining them from collecting any of the exempt wages of the plaintiff by said garnishee proceedings during the pendency of this action. Thereupon the defendants released their garnishment proceedings in Iowa, but took judgment in the main action, and issued execution thereon, and garnished the railway company on the execution. The railway company was adjudged by the Iowa court to pay $86 (which appeared by their answer to be the amount of their indebtedness to the plaintiff), and the same was applied on the defendants' judgment against the plaintiff. Of this amount $60 was exempt under the laws of Wisconsin. Afterwards this action was tried. There is no bill of exceptions. The court made findings in accordance with the facts as above stated, and also found that the Iowa suit and garnishment proceedings were prosecuted with intent to evade the exemption laws of Wisconsin, and that the said $60 was levied upon and taken by the defendants in disregard of the injunctive order, knowing it to be exempt, and knowing that such taking was contrary to the injunctive order. Judgwas refused. See also Freeman v. Miller, and case following, infra, IV.

III. Void judgments.

If the judgment against the garnishee is void for want of jurisdiction, an injunction is generally granted against proceedings thereunder, but if only voidable, or there is adequate remedy in the court rendering judgment, an injunction will not be granted.

So, an injunction was allowed against the enforcement of a judgment on a scil. fa. against a garnishee where the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction of the person of the garnishee and the judgment was void. Rice v. American Nat. Bank, 3 Colo. App. 81.

And the same was held where a final judgment could not be rendered by a justice of the peace under Kan. Justice Code, § 44, which only provides for an order against the garnishee which cannot be enforced by an execution. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Reid, 34 Kan. 410.

So, a judgment in garnishment and levy of execution will be relieved against as a cloud on title, where it was shown that no summons or notice in garnishment was ever served, and that the garnishee did not owe the debtor anything, and had no knowledge of the suit in time to defend. Cobbe v. Wright, 34 Neb. 771.

And where the notice to the garnishee was to appear at the pending term, instead of at the next term, as required by statute, and the garnishee appeared at the pending term, but the court had temporarily adjourned, and the garnishee, believing that it had adjourned for the term, made no defense,—judgment rendered at that term was void for want of jurisdiction, and will be enjoined where the garnishee was not indebted. Padden v. Moore, 58 Iowa, 708.

A judgment of a justice was enjoined where the debt was not due, as the justice had no power to enter judgment. Kapp v. Teel, 33 Tex. 811.

So, an injunction will be granted against the execution of a judgment of a justice of the peace in garnishment that is void for want of jurisdiction on account of venue, where no appeal could be taken, as it would be a waiver, and the constable could not be looked upon for protection because he had no authority to look beyond the execution. And defense to the merits does not have to be shown. Bornschein v. Finck, 13 Mo. App. 120.

But a garnishee cannot obtain an injunction against the judgment rendered against him on the ground that he was a member of the city council of Baltimore, and in discharge of his duties, at the time of service, as a judgment against a privileged person is voidable, not void. Peters v. League, 13 Md. 58, 71 Am. Dec. 622.

And a garnishee is not entitled to an injunction against proceedings upon an execution for the same debt issued in the name of another person, where, by the terms of the statute, the garnishee is discharged by lapse of time, although it may be necessary to obtain an order from the superior court for his discharge. Hastings v. Cropper, 3 Del. Ch. 165.

IV. Fraud and mistake.

Injunctions will be granted against judgments obtained against the garnishee through fraud or mistake, where he has a good defense to the same.

So, a garnishee may obtain an injunction against a judgment where an agreement was made at the time, which was entered, releasing him from all personal liability, and it was only intended to hold him for what assets he might have belonging to the debtor. Newman v. Stuart, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 78.

So, where several writs of garnishment against the same defendants were sued out for different plaintiffs at the same term, and it was agreed that an answer need only be filed in one case, and when the one filed fully purged defendants of all liability, it was agreed that no further proceedings would be taken, an injunction was granted against a subsequent judgment taken by default on the ground of surprise or fraud. Pelham v. Moreland, 11 Ark. 443.

And a garnishee may obtain an injunction against a judgment of a justice of the peace, where he was prevented from making a defense by the statement made by the justice, and there is a good defense to the action. Watkins v. Gray, 5 Mo. App. 562.

After judgment in garnishment subjecting a bond to the payment of a nonresident's debts, the obligor on such bond may obtain an injunction against a judgment obtained in another case on a forged assignment of the bond, where the action is for the use of the assignee, thereby preventing a defense at law. Jameson v. Deshields, 3 Gratt. 4.

And where a defendant pleaded that he was not indebted to A, but was indebted to B, whom he had fully paid by reason of a garnishment, and judgment was rendered against him in favor of A, such judgment may be enjoined where it is shown that it is not prosecuted by A, or by attorneys employed by him, and he disavows any connection with the suit,—as it would be grossly inequitable to enforce this judgment and compel payment twice, and the judgment was attempted to be enforced for the benefit of the party who had been paid by garnishment. Marchman v. Sewell, 33 Ga. 653.

Where a garnishee made full answers to the inquiries propounded to him by the officer, who wrote out the same and certified them to the court, a judgment taken for failure to answer interrogatories as to effects in his possession will be enjoined where such interrogatories were not propounded, and he was not aware of the judgment until after the term, and owed nothing. Freeman v. Miller, 58 Tex. 372.

So, where a garnishee gave a certificate to the sheriff showing that he was indebted to the defendant when in fact he was not, and the mistake was not discovered until after judgment, he is entitled to an injunction against the same, although he had applied to the court at law for relief, which had been refused, presumably because too late. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Gates, 10 Or. 514.

ment for the plaintiff was rendered—First, perpetually enjoining the defendants from prosecuting any proceeding against the plaintiff outside this state, so long as the plaintiff remains a resident of this state, whereby the earnings of the plaintiff which are exempt under the laws of this state shall be garnished or levied upon in payment of any judgment against the plaintiff; second, for the recovery of the $60, with interest, realized by the defendant upon the Iowa garnishment proceedings; third, for the costs of the action. The defendants appeal.

Messrs. Bloodgood, Bloodgood, & Kemper for appellants.

Messrs. Henderson & Williams for respondent.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There being no bill of exceptions, the only question presented is whether the pleadings and findings sustain the judgment. Wille v. Bartle, 88 Wis. 424. This question must be answered in the affirmative. The pleadings and findings show, without dispute

So, an injunction was granted against a judgment of condemnation against a garnishee, rendered by a justice in attachment on a judgment more than three years prior to the issuing of the attachment, where the judgment was rendered by mistake, it having been agreed that no judgment should be entered until the decision of another case. Weikel v. Cate, 58 Md. 105.

And where complainant, the maker of a note, had no notice of the indorsement until after judgment was rendered against him as garnishee, and a judgment was also obtained against him by the indorsee, he was entitled to an injunction. McKinney v. Kuhn, 59 Miss. 186.

V. Payment.

A garnishee is generally entitled to an injunction against proceedings under a judgment where he has paid the same, but is not entitled to an injunction on the ground of payment by one not a party or privy.

So, a garnishee is entitled to an injunction against a judgment obtained against him by a nonresident plaintiff who had agreed on a valuable consideration to pay the debt due from the garnishee to the defendant; and as such defense is not available in law, it is sufficient to entitle to an injunction. Matthews v. Robinson, 33 Ala. 320.

Where garnishees were sued by their creditors, and about the same time were garnished in another state and there admitted the indebtedness, and paid the debt to the garnishing creditors after judgment was taken in the original suit, and the garnishing creditors brought a suit against the original creditors, who pleaded such payment by the garnishee in defense of the action against them,—an injunction was granted. (The recovery and payment in the garnishment might have been pleaded in the original action, but that action had proceeded to judgment, and no plea could be interposed, and there is no other remedy except injunction.) Allen v. Watt, 79 Ill. 224.

Where the judgment creditor of the vendor of land garnished the purchaser for the amount of purchase money yet due, and afterwards levied the judgment on the land, he will be enjoined from enforcing the judgment obtained under the garnishment, as he cannot deny the title and at the same time take the fruits of the sale. Gunn v. Thornton, 49 Ga. 380.

But a purchaser cannot enjoin the collection of a decree against him for the debt, on the ground that there has been a judgment of garnishment also rendered against him, where he does not allege such judgment has been satisfied. Dunham v. Collier, 1 G. Greene, 54.

Where an attachment was levied on land, and three persons were garnished also, the fact that $1,000 was paid to release the land from attachment by a trustee for creditors will not entitle the garnishee to enjoin the judgment against them, as it is not a satisfaction of their debt, and they did not pay it, but it was paid by a stranger to the attachment suit for a surrender of a right. Hill v. Cotten, 54 Miss. 551.

And a garnishee cannot enjoin a judgment against him on the ground that the debtor is entitled to credits on the debt. Alleman v. Kight, 19 W. Va. 201.

Where a defendant obtains an injunction on the ground that he has been garnished, and the defendant in the injunction suit shows that the garnishment has been discharged, the injunction should be modified so as to permit the collection of the judgment. Steiner v. Scholze (Ala.) 18 So. Rep. 79.

VI. Set-off.

A garnishee is entitled to an injunction against a judgment in garnishment where at the time of such judgment he has a claim of unliquidated damages against his creditor who is insolvent and nonresident, as the rights of the garnisher do not rise above or extend beyond those of his debtor; as insolvency or nonresidence in Illinois is sufficient ground for equitable interference. North Chicago Rolling Mill Co. v. St. Louis Ore. & S. Co. 158 U.S. 506, 38 L. ed. 505.

Where a creditor obtained a judgment and execution which was replevied, and then in a court which had no jurisdiction collected by garnishment money due the surety, which judgment was reversed, an injunction in the creditor's behalf was allowed in order to maintain in his favor the set-off of his judgment on the replevin bond in the other court against the order to refund the money garnished. Smith v. Bohon, 12 Bush, 448.

VII. Injunctions in behalf of creditors.

Where attachments have been issued against a debtor and garnishment served on the garnishee, the attaching creditors, in order to preserve their priority, are entitled to an injunction against the levy upon, or execution sale of, goods in the hands of the assignee by other creditors. Northfield Knife Co. v. Shapleigh, 24 Neb. 635.

But a creditor having a writ of garnishment pending in the Federal court cannot maintain a suit of injunction in a state court against a judgment or order of sale obtained against such garnishee by his creditor, as such garnishee must make his defense in the garnishment if he wishes to prevent the judgment against him, and the creditor by garnishment cannot invoke the aid of injunction in another case against another judgment. Arthur v. Batte, 42 Tex. 159.

That the complainant was prevented from paying debts, for which judgment was obtained by reason of a garnishment which the defendant had sued out against a person who held assets of complainant, is not sufficient to entitle an injunction against a judgment; for if the garnishment was sued out wrongfully, he has a complete remedy by a suit on the garnishment bond, and if it was sued out rightfully, he is not entitled to an injunction. Way v. Brown, 30 Ga. 806. L. T.

or exception, that the defendants, in order to evade the exemption laws of the state, commenced garnishment proceedings in a foreign state in order to subject the exempt earnings of a resident of this state to their claims as creditors, and, in defiance of the interlocutory order of the court, actually appropriated $60 of the plaintiff's exempt wages to the payment of their debt. Why the court should not have administered the relief which it did administer, we are at a loss to perceive. The jurisdiction of equity in actions of this nature is well established. High, Inj. 2d ed. § 106. It is said that the judgment is erroneous, because it enjoins the defendants so long as the plaintiff remains a resident of this state, whereas it should be limited to such time as the plaintiff, being a resident of this state, provides for the entire support of a family within the state. If there is anything in this point, the objection is obviated by the subsequent words of the judgment, which limit the operation of the injunction to those earnings which are exempt. That part of the judgment which adjudges the recovery of the $60 which the defendants collected by their garnishment in the Iowa court, in disobedience to the preliminary injunctive order, was eminently proper. A court of equity would hardly deserve that name if it turned the plaintiff out of court with a bare injunction, and commanded him to seek his remedy by another action for the moneys thus wrongfully converted in contempt of an order of the court made in this very action.

Judgment affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

John J. REIMERS et al., Plfs. in Err.,

SEATCO MANUFACTURING COMPANY

(70 Fed. Rep. 573.)

1. A nonresident creditor cannot have his property in a debt seized in a state to which the debtor may resort merely for the purpose of doing business through agents, when the claim arose on a contract not to be performed within the state, and the debtor does not reside therein.
2. A debt has no situs for the purpose of garnishment in a state of which the plaintiff, defendant, and garnishee are all non-residents, although the garnishee is a foreign corporation which by general provisions of a state statute is subject to garnishment in the state because it assumes to do business there.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan to review a judgment dismissing a garnishment proceeding to reach property of the Seatco Manufacturing Company which was alleged to be in the possession of the Michigan-Peninsular Car Company. Affirmed.

Before Taft and Lurton, Circuit Judges, and Severens, District Judge.

Statement by Taft, Circuit Judge:

John J. Reimers, doing business as John J. Reimers & Co., is a citizen and resident of Chicago, Ill. The Seatco Manufacturing Company is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Washington. The Michigan-Peninsular Car Company is a corporation of the state of Illinois, having an office and doing business in the state of Michigan, at Detroit. This was an action by Reimers against the Seatco Manufacturing Company to recover upon an express contract the sum of $2,864.64. The suit was begun in the circuit court of Wayne county, Mich., by the affidavit and writ of garnishment filed and served by the sheriff upon the Michigan-Peninsular Car Company. The affidavit averred that the latter company was indebted to the Seatco Manufacturing Company, and had credits of that company in its hands. True copies of the summons, affidavit in garnishment, and writ of garnishment, with return of the service upon the writ, were served upon the Seatco Company at its office in Bucoda, in the state of Washington. The Michigan-Peninsular Car Company filed a disclosure under the garnishee statute of Michigan, in which it admitted that it was indebted in the sum of $3,135.06 to the Seatco Company; that this indebtedness was created by the purchase from the Seatco Company of certain lumber shipped from Washington; and that the purchase price of the lumber was to be paid by the garnishee defendant to the principal defendant in Bucoda, Wash. The Michigan-Peninsular Car Company moved to quash the writ of garnishment. This motion was overruled in the Wayne circuit court. Thereupon the Seatco Company appeared specially, and moved to set aside the service and process on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction over it or the debt. Before the motion was passed on, the same defendant appeared specially, and filed a petition for removal of the cause to the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan. The order of removal was granted and thereupon in the court below the motion to quash the writ and dismiss the suit for want of jurisdiction was heard. The motion was granted, the writ was quashed, and the suit dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The learned judge who presided in the court below reached this conclusion upon two grounds: First, that the debt sought to be attached was not within the jurisdiction of the Michigan courts, because the creditor, the debtor, and the plaintiff were all nonresidents of Michigan; and, second, that the requirements of the garnishee statute of Michigan as to process in such cases had not been complied with.

NOTE.—As to garnishment of debt to nonresident, see note to Illinois C. R. Co. v. Smith (Miss.) 19 L. R. A. 577; also Wyeth Hardware & Mfg. Co. v. Lang (Mo.) 27 L. R. A. 651, and cases cited in footnote thereto.

Messrs. Bowen, Douglas, & Whiting, for plaintiffs in error:

An ordinary mercantile debt is due everywhere, in whatever country the debtor may be found.

The debts in respect to the liability of the debtor follow him and are subject to the jurisdiction of the law of his domicile, or the place where his property is situated.

The debt may be garnished wherever the debtor may be found.

Local laws may fix the situs of the debt at the domicile of the debtor, and under such laws he may be effectually garnished by a nonresident, and compulsory payment will protect the debtor everywhere against a suit for the recovery of the same debt by a creditor.

It is within the power of the legislature to make any foreign corporation wishing to do business within the state subject to the service and binding force of the garnishee process, exactly as it might require it, as a condition precedent to its doing business in the state, to be subject to summons in a civil action.

Taft, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this suit is whether, in a suit brought by a resident and citizen of Illinois against a resident and citizen of the state of Washington in the state of Michigan, a court of the latter state can acquire jurisdiction in rem to pronounce judgment against the nonresident defendant to the extent of a debt owed to the defendant by a corporation resident and citizen of Illinois doing business in Michigan, and liable by the laws of Michigan to the service of process in garnishment in that state. The question of jurisdiction is raised by the defendant against whom such a judgment is sought. It may be conceded that under the statutes of Michigan a corporation of another state which assumes to do business in Michigan subjects itself, through its agents in that state, to service of process by garnishment. But this does not determine the question whether a creditor of such a corporation is affected by this fact so that the debt owing is given a locality and situs within the state lines of Michigan such as to permit the courts of Michigan, under general principles of international law and the Constitution of the United States, to seize the debt. The debt was not payable in Michigan, but in Washington. We conceive it to be well settled by authority that while, generally speaking, the situs of a debt is constructively with the creditor to whom it belongs, it is within the competence of the sovereign of the residence of the debtor, by reason of its control over its own residents, to pass laws subjecting the debt to seizure within its territorial sovereignty. We also conceive it to be well settled that, even if the debtor is not a resident of the sovereignty under which garnishment is attempted, such sovereignty still may subject the debt to its process and constructive seizure if the debtor is personally within the service of its process and the debt is payable within its territory. In either of the cases above mentioned, if a judgment is rendered against a garnishee for the debt thus constructively seized in favor of the plaintiff, the satisfaction of the judgment will be pro tanto a bar to a recovery against the garnishee on the original debt in any jurisdiction where the creditor seeks to recover it. But we are of opinion that a nonresident creditor cannot have his property in the debt seized in a state to which the debtor may resort, not for purposes of residence, but merely for the purpose of doing business through agents, when the claim arose on a contract not to be performed within the state, and the debtor does not reside therein. But it is said that, if the debtor is a corporation, and seeks to do business outside of the state of its incorporation, the state to which it may send its agents for this purpose may impose any requirement whatever as a condition precedent to its doing business there, and, therefore, that it may require it to submit to judgment in garnishment for a debt owing by it to a nonresident, on the suit of a nonresident, though payable in another state. The right of a state to impose conditions upon foreign corporations doing business therein is not unlimited. In Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 59 U. S. 18 How. 404, 15 L. ed. 451, Mr. Justice Curtis, speaking for the supreme court, said: "A corporation created by Indiana can transact business in Ohio only with the consent, express or implied, of the latter state. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274. This consent may be accompanied by such conditions as Ohio may think fit to impose; and these conditions must be deemed valid and effectual by other states, and by this court, provided they are not repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States, or inconsistent with those rules of public law which secure the jurisdiction and authority of each state from encroachment by all others, or that principle of natural justice which forbids condemnation without opportunity for defense."

In Southern P. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 36 L. ed. 943, it was held that the law which permitted a nonresident corporation to do business within its territory on condition that it should forfeit such permit if it removed a suit brought against it into the court of the United States held within the state was unconstitutional and void, and could give no validity and effect to any agreement or action of the corporation in obedience to its provisions, because it thereby was compelled to surrender a right and privilege secured to it by the Constitution and laws of the United States; citing Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 445, 23 L. ed. 865, and Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 30 L. ed. 915. If, as we have already found, the debt to be garnished was not brought within the state by presence of the debtor corporation through its agent, then a condition that the corporation must be subject to garnishment process as if the debt were within the state's jurisdiction would have one of two results: It would either subject the corporation to the probability of a double recovery for the same debt, or it would compel the creditor, a nonresident, whose person and property are both out of the jurisdiction of the state, to submit to a judgment against him, rendered without notice of any kind to him. Either result would seem to be inconsistent with the rules of public law securing the jurisdiction and authority of each state from encroachment by all the others, and with that principle of natural justice forbidding condemnation without opportunity for defense. At all events, there is nothing in the garnishee statute of Michigan expressly requiring a foreign corporation to submit to a judgment in garnishment in such a case. And the mere provision that such a corporation shall be generally subject to garnishment is not to be interpreted as imposing a liability, power to impose which is rendered doubtful by the considerations already stated. It is easy to conceive of many cases where a foreign corporation may be garnished, in which, by all the rules of public law, the debt thus sought to be seized is within the territorial jurisdiction of the state in which process is issued. Such cases may well satisfy the provision of the Michigan law for garnishment against foreign corporations. The latest case on the subject, and one which has close application to the case at bar, is that of Douglas v. Phenix Ins. Co. 138 N. Y. 209, 30 L. R. A. 118. The action there was upon a policy of fire insurance issued by the defendant, a domestic corporation, and a plea in abatement was entered stating, in substance, that it was carrying on business and maintained an agency in the state of Massachusetts; that in pursuance to the laws in that state it had an attorney upon whom process could be served; that action was brought by one residing in Massachusetts against plaintiffs, in which the defendant corporation was made a party defendant, as trustee of the plaintiff, and the attachment was issued against the credits of the plaintiff in the hands of the defendant; that the action was still pending, and by virtue of the laws of Massachusetts its courts had acquired full jurisdiction over the parties. It was held that the debt due from the plaintiff to the defendant was not within the jurisdiction of the courts of Massachusetts; that the defendant corporation was a resident of New York and that the plaintiff was a resident of New York; and that the fact that the defendant corporation had an agent in the state of Massachusetts did not carry the corporation into that state, and did not affect the locality of the debt owing by the defendant to the plaintiff, both residents of New York, it having been contracted in New York, and being payable therein. Said the court of appeals, by Andrews, Ch. J.: "But, we repeat, no court can acquire jurisdiction in attachment proceedings unless the res is either actually or constructively within the jurisdiction, and we are of opinion that the attempt to execute an attachment in Massachusetts upon the debts owing to the plaintiff by the insurance company, by serving upon the agent of the corporation there, and without having acquired jurisdiction of the plaintiff, must fail for the reason that the debtor, the insurance company, was in no just or legal sense a resident of Massachusetts and had no domicile there, and was not the agent of the plaintiff, and that, in contemplation of law, the company and the debt were, at the time of the issuing of the attachment, in the state of New York, and not in the state of Massachusetts. This court has had occasion heretofore to consider the effect of the act of a foreign corporation constituting an agent in another state, upon whom proceedings may be served, done in compliance with the laws of such state in pursuance of a condition imposed, and to enable the corporation to do business in such state. It has been held by such act the corporation does not change its domicile of origin or its residence. It becomes bound by judgments rendered upon service on the designated agent, because it has consented so to be bound, but it remains as before, a resident of the state where it is incorporated. Gibbs v. Queen Ins. Co. 63 N. Y. 114, 20 Am. Rep. 513; Plimpton v. Bigelow, 93 N. Y. 593. If in this case the insurance company could be regarded as residing or having its domicile in Massachusetts for the purpose of attachment proceedings, it likewise has a domicile in every state where it may have appointed an agent under similar laws, and so constructively, upon the theory upon which the Massachusetts attachment is defended, the corporation is present as debtor to the plaintiff in every state where such agency exists, and the credit is also present at the same time in each of such jurisdictions. The admission of such a principle would give rise to most embarrassing conflicts of jurisdiction, and subject creditors of domestic corporations to great prejudice. We think the rule is that a domestic corporation at all times has its exclusive residence and domicile in the jurisdiction of origin, and that it cannot be garnished in another jurisdiction for debts owing by it to home creditors, so as to make the attachment effectual against its creditor in the absence of jurisdiction acquired over the person of such creditor."

The same principle is laid down in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Dooley, 78 Ala. 524; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Malby, 34 Kan. 125; Wright v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 19 Neb. 175, 56 Am. Rep. 747; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Sharitt, 43 Kan. 375, 8 L. R. A. 385; Keating v. American Refrigerator Co. 32 Mo. App. 293; Pielder v. Jessup, 24 Mo. App. 91; Green v. Farmers' & Citizens' Bank, 25 Conn. 452; Lawrence v. Smith, 45 N. H. 533, 86 Am. Dec. 183; Nye v. Lacombe, 21 Pick. 263; Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 283; Renier v. Hurlbut, 81 Wis. 24, 14 L. R. A. 562; Boerett v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 4 Colo. App. 509; Baylies v. Houghton, 15 Vt. 626; Tingley v. Bateman, 10 Mass. 348; Sawyer v. Thompson, 24 N. H. 510; Lovejoy v. Albee, 33 Me. 414, 54 Am. Dec. 630.

It is abundantly established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that, no matter what business a corporation does in another state, its residence is exclusively in the state of its creation. Shaw v. Quincy Min. Co. 145 U. S. 444, 86 L. ed. 768; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 374; Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 59 U. S. 18 How. 404, 15 L. ed. 451, and a number of other cases holding the same principle cited in the learned opinion of Mr. Justice Gray first above named.

Nor are the cases in Michigan opposed to the view we have taken. The case most relied upon is that of Newland v. Reilly, 85 Mich. 151. In that case residents of Boston brought an action in assumpsit in a state court of Michigan against residents of New York as principal defendants, and served a writ of garnishment upon residents of Detroit within that state. Though the contract of indebtedness was not to be performed within the state of Michigan, the court held that, as the debt was owing by the residents of Michigan, the res was within the jurisdiction of the courts of that state. Certainly there is nothing here to conflict with our holding that, where neither the plaintiff nor the defendant nor the garnishee are residents of the state of Michigan, and the debt is not to be paid within the state of Michigan, the debt sought to be garnished has no situs in that state. In Coffrode v. Gartner, 79 Mich. 332, 7 L. R. A. 511, the supreme court held that the plaintiffs, who were nonresidents of the state, might bring their action against a non-resident, and proceed to judgment in the courts of the state for the purpose of subjecting credits in the hands of three persons, residents of the state, to the payment of such debt, although no personal service could be made upon the principal defendant within the state. In this case the debtor owing the debt was a resident of Michigan, and the control of its payment would therefore seem to have been within Michigan's sovereign power. In Drake v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 69 Mich. 168, plaintiff was a resident of Michigan, who had acquired the claim by assignment from a resident of Indiana.

the defendant was a citizen of Indiana, and the garnishee defendant was a corporation organized under the laws of Indiana and Michigan, and doing business in each state. The contract was made between the defendant and the garnishee in Indiana, and payment was to be there made. No service was made upon the defendant. It appeared that the debt in Indiana was exempted from attachment, and some of the reasoning of the court proceeds on this as a premise; but the whole tenor of the opinion is to the effect that the facts that the original creditor and the original debtor were residents of Indiana, and that the debt was contracted in Indiana, and was made payable in that state, prevented the exercise of jurisdiction over the debt in Michigan without personal service upon the principal defendant. We do not find anything in any of the other cases cited from the Michigan courts holding a different conclusion.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

John B. SMITH, Treasurer of Eaton County,
v.
GERMAN INSURANCE COMPANY, of Freeport, Illinois, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The legislature may lawfully provide that interest as a taxpayer of a county shall not disqualify a person from acting as juror in a suit in which the county is a party.
2. Painters employed in repainting a building are not "mechanics" within the provision of an insurance policy respecting the employment of mechanics on the building.
3. An insurer waives a cause of forfeiture of a policy by failing to mention it when it undertakes to state definitely its reasons for denying liability thereon.
4. Gasoline is not "kept, used, or allowed" on the premises insured within the meaning of a provision for avoiding the policy, by leaving a five-gallon can containing gasoline in the building for a number of days for use in burning off old paint preparatory to repainting the building.
5. The increase of hazard by using gasoline to burn old paint from a brick and stone building is a question for the jury, where there is some testimony to show that this was the custom of painters.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Eaton County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas Bates, with Messrs. Howard & Roos, for plaintiff in error:

It tends to bring the law itself into disrepute when by astute and subtle distinctions a plain case is attempted to be taken without the operation of a clear, reasonable, and natural obligation of the contract.

Mack v. Rochester German Ins. Co. 106 N. Y. 500.

NOTE.—For a similar case, see First Cong. Church v. Holyoke Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Mass.) 19 L. R. A. 587. 30 L. R. A.

If the assured allows any building or repairing operations to go on for more than the limited time without a permit, he will of course vitiate his policy.

Richards, Ins. 2d ed. 182.

Gasoline was used and was kept and was allowed here in such a way as would avoid this policy of insurance.

As bearing upon the question whether the use of a naphtha torch would increase the risk, the defendants might show, if they could, by an expert, in regard to the rates of premium for fire insurance, that the rates on a building whose paint was to be removed from the outside by the use of such a torch would be higher than if there was to be no such use.

The contract is that if the gasoline be kept, used, or allowed on the premises, the policy shall be void, etc. Under this provision of the policy, it makes no difference whether the fire originated from the gasoline or not. If it be kept, used, or allowed on the premises, it makes void the policy, and no recovery can be had under a void contract.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On October 28, 1893, the defendant issued to the treasurer of Eaton county its policy of insurance, covering $3,000 on the Eaton county court-house, for three years. The policy was the Michigan standard form, and contained the following conditions: "This policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the hazard be increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured, or if mechanics be employed in building, altering, or repairing the within-described premises for more than fifteen days at any one time, or if there be kept, used, or allowed on the above-described premises benzine, naphtha, or other explosives." It appears that on October 12, 1893, some two weeks before this policy was issued, the board of supervisors provided by resolution for the appointment of a committee to repaint the court-house. This committee, on June 1, 1894, entered into a written contract with S. H. Sleater to have such work performed. Sleater and his employees commenced this repainting three weeks and three days previous to the fire, and continued the work, with the exception of one or two days, up to that time. For the purpose of removing the old paint, preparatory to repainting, gasoline torches were used to blister or loosen it. The court-house was a brick and stone structure, with metal roof and tower. The framework of the roof, tower, and cornice was wood, the tower and cornice being covered with galvanized iron, and the roof with tin. The iron work of the building, except the roof, had been previously painted and sanded to imitate stone, and this sanded paint, at the time the policy was issued, was peeling off; and it is claimed that, in order to make a good job of painting, it was necessary that it be scraped off the iron work. Some contention is made on the part of the defendant that, during the time these torches were being used, the season was very dry; while, on the other hand, plaintiff's testimony showed that from the 16th to the 24th of June of that year there was considerable rain, and that on the 28th it rained nearly all day. It does appear that by the 4th of July most of the paint had been removed from the cornice by the use of these torches, and that Mr. Horn, who had done most of the work on the cornice, had worked some portion of that day thereon, when, about half-past 5 in the afternoon, the court-house was discovered to be on fire. The fire seems to have originated some 15 feet distant from where Mr. Horn last used his torch on that day. After the fire, the part of the cornice where he last worked was found to be intact. Defendant contends that the torch had come in contact with some straw and other substance carried into the cornice by the birds, and that the iron work of the cornice in various places had become loosened, so that, by the use of the torches, the fire, penetrating through such crevices, communicated with the wood work. But we think this statement hardly borne out by the record; and Mr. Horn testifies that he found only two places where the galvanized iron was clear off; that one of the little panels had come off, but he had passed over that, and that there was one other bad place on the west end, but he had not reached that when the fire occurred; that all the balance of the cornice was in good condition, and he found no place where the seams had opened. There is little contention, however, but that the fire was in some way communicated by the use of this torch. It also appears in the case that the gasoline used in these torches was carried into the tower of the court-house in a five-gallon can; and, in order to supply the torches, the men passed over the roof of the building into the tower and filled them from the can; and, up to the time of the fire, Mr. Horn had used from one half to a gallon per day, and the others something more than that. The torches were so constructed that, by pumping in air, a gas would be generated, which, if ignited, would create a very hot flame. As some of the witnesses express it, it was upon the same principle as the blow pump used by jewelers in welding their jewelry. Replying to the letter of plaintiff, inclosing proofs of loss, the defendant, under date of October 1, 1894, wrote as follows: "We have to say that we have given the matter prompt attention, and thoroughly investigated as to the origin of this fire, and as to the condition of the property at the time of the fire, and find there was employed at the time of the fire, and previous thereto, one or more men who were using gasoline torches for the purpose of burning off paint on the cornices and other portions of the court-house, and there was stored in the court-house gasoline for this use and purpose in considerable quantities, and in such quantities as would be a large increase of the hazard; and, further, the use of gasoline in gasoline burning torches for burning off paint is a very great increase of hazard, so much so that it is a violation of the conditions of the contract; and, with the information we now have as to the use of this gasoline and its storage in the building,—all within the knowledge and control of yourself, as treasurer, and of the county commissioners of your county, having charge of the county property,—this company must conclude that such act on the part of the proper officials of Eaton county was a voidance of the contract, and that by this serious increase of hazard the policy was voided before the fire. Hence we call your attention to these facts to explain to you the position which this company would be obliged to take in this case: If, as we understand from the reports we have received, these conditions existed, clearly the policy was void and of no effect, and there could be no liability under it after the use and storage of gasoline in and on the premises. And, further, that you may not be misled as to the position of this company, we again repeat, if these conditions as to the use and storage of gasoline existed, the policy was absolutely void, and there is no liability thereunder." Upon the trial, before a jury, in Eaton county, the plaintiff had verdict and judgment for the amount of the policy, with interest.

The first objection to the proceedings relates to the trial of the cause in Eaton county. Before the trial came on, the defendant moved for a change of venue, based upon the affidavit of one of its counsel, which states "that in each of said causes [there were four suits pending upon separate insurance policies] there will be an issue of fact as well as issue of law to be determined, in the opinion and judgment of the deponent, and deponent has thoroughly examined into said cases, and believes he understands the issue involved thereunder. Deponent further states that, in his judgment, it will be impossible to get an impartial jury to try said causes, or either of them, in said county, from the fact that the jurymen, being taxpayers, would be directly and financially interested in having the plaintiff recover judgment." This motion was overruled. At the commencement of the trial, before the jury were sworn, counsel for defendant, in order to again raise the question, challenged each juror on the ground that he was a taxpayer of the county, and therefore incompetent to sit in the case. These challenges were overruled. Section 7555, 2 How. Anno. Stat., provides that the list of jurymen shall be taken from the assessment roll, and each regular juror was presumably a taxpayer of that county; but section 466, 1 How. Anno. Stat., provides: "On the trial of every action in which a county shall be interested, the electors and inhabitants of such county shall be competent witnesses and jurors." The contention is that this act is unconstitutional, as it seeks to deprive a party of the right to a trial by an impartial jury. We think there is no force in this contention. It is competent for the legislature to provide that, where the interest of a person is merely that of a taxpayer of a municipal corporation, it shall constitute no disqualification of him as a juror, judge, or commissioner in the case where a corporation is a party. As was said in Minneapolis v. Wilkin, 30 Minn. 142: "This does not infringe upon the constitutional right of a party to an impartial tribunal to hear his cause. Public policy and the necessities of the case require that this should be so. The ground upon which the ruling is usually placed is that such an interest is so remote, indirect, and insignificant that it may be fairly supposed to be incapable of affecting the judgment or influencing the conduct." This same rule is laid down by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed. p. 508.

The principal contention arises over the charge of the court, which is as follows: "No. 1. I instruct you that there is no foundation for the claim in this cause on the part of the defendant that the policy in question was rendered void by reason of mechanics having been employed in repairing the building for more than fifteen days without any agreement indorsed upon the policy or added thereto permitting the same. The evidence clearly shows that only painters were employed in repainting the building. Painters are not 'mechanics' in the sense of this term as used in this policy; and neither the painters employed nor the work they did is embraced in this provision. And, further, I instruct you that, were such employees and their work comprehended within the meaning of this provision, still that the defendant has waived any breach thereof, if any ever occurred, and is now estopped from raising this question. You will therefore not consider this objection as constituting any defense whatever to this action. No. 2. You are further instructed that the third objection of defendant—that is, that gasoline or naphtha was stored in the court-house in violation of the provisions of the policy prohibiting the keeping, using, or allowing on the premises of benzine, gasoline, naphtha, or other explosive—is also without force or foundation.

This condition in the policy must be understood as prohibiting only the habitual keeping, using, or allowing of any of these articles on the premises, and not the occasional introduction thereof for some temporary purpose connected with their occupation, such as making ordinary or necessary repairs, and the like. I therefore charge you that there is no evidence in this cause tending to show a violation of this condition, and hence a recovery by the plaintiff cannot be defeated by reason of this objection. No. 8. As to whether there has been an increase of hazard or violation of the terms of the policy within the meaning of its terms as understood and contemplated by the parties, I instruct you that, in determining whether or not there has been an increase of risk, it is essential to ascertain what the parties must be presumed to have contemplated when the insurance was made. And this involves the consideration of the usages and incidents of the risk, because where any change is warranted by the usage or usual incidents of the risk, although it in fact increased the risk, it does not come within the prohibition, because it is presumed to have been contemplated. No. 4. The well-settled doctrine seems to be that that which is necessary for the protection of the property or its preservation, such as ordinary repairs, by way of painting or otherwise, or that which is usual or incident to it for the purpose for which it is employed, when insured, must be regarded as within the contemplation of the parties, and excepted from the operation of any stipulation apparently to the contrary. No. 5. You are further instructed that the right to repair buildings is incident to the ownership and use of the property, and alterations which do not increase the risk under an insurance policy, as well as all ordinary repairs, may be made without affecting the validity of the policy. And hence, although, in making any such repairs, hazardous articles are introduced into the building, such as gasoline, oils, turpentine, paints, etc., the insurer is not relieved from liability if such articles are necessary incidents to the repairs in progress. No. 6. Both parties to a contract for insurance must be presumed to expect that the property will be preserved and kept in proper condition by making repairs upon it; and although the making of ordinary or necessary repairs in a reasonable way may sometimes increase the risk more or less while the work is going on, or involve the use of articles whose use in a business carried on in the building is prohibited by the policy, still the insurer would not be relieved from liability by reason of such repairs or such temporary increase of risk. No. 7. You are further instructed that, in the absence of an express stipulation to that effect, a contract of insurance should not be held to forbid the making of ordinary repairs in a reasonably safe way, and provisions like those we are now considering in the policy in question should not be deemed to apply to an increase of risk caused by reason of any such repairs, or to the use of an article necessary therefor or for the preservation of the property. And I instruct you that if it was reasonably necessary to remove the old paint from the building, as shown in this cause, for the purpose of properly repairing it, and that the use of the gasoline burner was reasonable and proper for that purpose, having reference to the nature of the building, the danger of fire, as well as to other considerations properly connected with the transaction, the policy would not be rendered void by reason of such use, and such use would constitute no defense to this action."

The question first presented by the charge is whether the painters employed were "mechanics" within the meaning of the policy, so that the insured was bound to obtain the indorsement of the company upon the policy permitting the repairs, inasmuch as these workmen were engaged for more than fifteen days. Plaintiff contends, (1) that they were not such mechanics; (2) that, if they were, the defendant waived any breach of that condition by its letter of October 1, 1894.

Webster defines the word "mechanic" as "one skilled or employed in shaping and uniting materials, such as wood, metals, etc., into any kind of structure, machine, or other object requiring the use of tools or instruments." The American Encyclopedia Dictionary defines the term as "one who is employed or skilled in the construction of materials, as wood, metal, etc., into any kind of structure or machine; one who is skilled in the use of tools or instruments; one who follows a mechanical trade for a living." In Anderson's Law Dictionary the term is defined as "a workman employed in shaping and uniting materials, such as wood, metal, into some kind of structure, machine, or other object requiring the use of tools." In Crabb's English Synonyms the distinction between a mechanic and a painter is drawn as follows: "The mechanic is a species of artisan who works at arts purely mechanical, in distinction from those who contribute to completion and embellishment of any objects. On this ground the shoemaker is a mechanic, and a common painter is a simple artisan." It is apparent that the common acceptance of the term "mechanic" does not include painters, and that painting was not intended by the terms of this policy to be included in those repairs which required the assent of the company to be indorsed upon the policy. To make the case more certain upon this point, when Mr. Rowe, who was called by the defendant as an expert upon insurance matters, was cross-examined, he testified: "The company I represent issues a permit for repairs. Never was called upon to issue a permit for painting alone. We never regarded painting alone as the kind of repairs that was contemplated by the policy."

We think the court was also right in stating to the jury that, if the painters were included within the term "mechanic" as used in the policy, clearly there was a waiver of any such claim by the letter of October 1, 1894. In the letter the company admits thoroughly examining the loss, the origin of the fire and attendant circumstances, and undertakes to state definitely its reasons for denying liability on the policy. It is apparent that the ground, and the only ground, and filled them from the can; and, up to the time of the fire, Mr. Hora had used from one half to a gallon per day, and the others something more than that. The torches were so constructed that, by pumping in air, a gas would be generated, which, if ignited, would create a very hot flame. As some of the witnesses express it, it was upon the same principle as the blow pump used by jewelers in welding their jewelry. Replying to the letter of plaintiff, inclosing proofs of loss, the defendant, under date of October 1, 1894, wrote as follows: "We have to say that we have given the matter prompt attention, and thoroughly investigated as to the origin of this fire, and as to the condition of the property at the time of the fire, and find there was employed at the time of the fire, and previous thereto, one or more men who were using gasoline torches for the purpose of burning off paint on the cornices and other portions of the court-house, and there was stored in the court-house gasoline for this use and purpose in considerable quantities, and in such quantities as would be a large increase of the hazard; and, further, the use of gasoline in gasoline burning torches for burning off paint is a very great increase of hazard, so much so that it is a violation of the conditions of the contract; and, with the information we now have as to the use of this gasoline and its storage in the building,—all within the knowledge and control of yourself, as treasurer, and of the county commissioners of your county, having charge of the county property,—this company must conclude that such act on the part of the proper officials of Eaton county was a voidance of the contract, and that by this serious increase of hazard the policy was voided before the fire. Hence we call your attention to these facts to explain to you the position which this company would be obliged to take in this case: If, as we understand from the reports we have received, these conditions existed, clearly the policy was void and of no effect, and there could be no liability under it after the use and storage of gasoline in and on the premises. And, further, that you may not be misled as to the position of this company, we again repeat, if these conditions as to the use and storage of gasoline existed, the policy was absolutely void, and there is no liability thereunder." Upon the trial, before a jury, in Eaton county, the plaintiff had verdict and judgment for the amount of the policy, with interest.

The first objection to the proceedings relates to the trial of the cause in Eaton county. Before the trial came on, the defendant moved for a change of venue, based upon the affidavit of one of its counsel, which states "that in each of said causes [there were four suits pending upon separate insurance policies] there will be an issue of fact as well as issue of law to be determined, in the opinion and judgment of the deponent, and deponent has thoroughly examined into said cases, and believes he understands the issue involved thereunder. Deponent further states that, in his judgment, it will be impossible to get an impartial jury to try said causes, or either of them, in said county, from the fact that the jurymen, being taxpayers, would be directly and financially interested in having the plaintiff recover judgment." This motion was overruled. At the commencement of the trial, before the jury were sworn, counsel for defendant, in order to again raise the question, challenged each juror on the ground that he was a taxpayer of the county, and therefore incompetent to sit in the case. These challenges were overruled. Section 7555, 2 How. Anno. Stat., provides that the list of jurymen shall be taken from the assessment roll, and each regular juror was presumably a taxpayer of that county; but section 466, 1 How. Anno. Stat., provides: "On the trial of every action in which a county shall be interested, the electors and inhabitants of such county shall be competent witnesses and jurors." The contention is that this act is unconstitutional, as it seeks to deprive a party of the right to a trial by an impartial jury. We think there is no force in this contention. It is competent for the legislature to provide that, where the interest of a person is merely that of a taxpayer of a municipal corporation, it shall constitute no disqualification of him as a juror, judge, or commissioner in the case where a corporation is a party. As was said in Minneapolis v. Wilkin, 80 Minn. 142: "This does not infringe upon the constitutional right of a party to an impartial tribunal to hear his cause. Public policy and the necessities of the case require that this should be so. The ground upon which the ruling is usually placed is that such an interest is so remote, indirect, and insignificant that it may be fairly supposed to be incapable of affecting the judgment or influencing the conduct." This same rule is laid down by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed. p. 508.

The principal contention arises over the charge of the court, which is as follows: "No. 1. I instruct you that there is no foundation for the claim in this cause on the part of the defendant that the policy in question was rendered void by reason of mechanics having been employed in repairing the building for more than fifteen days without any agreement indorsed upon the policy or added thereto permitting the same. The evidence clearly shows that only painters were employed in repainting the building. Painters are not 'mechanics' in the sense of this term as used in this policy; and neither the painters employed nor the work they did is embraced in this provision. And, further, I instruct you that, were such employees and their work comprehended within the meaning of this provision, still that the defendant has waived any breach thereof, if any ever occurred, and is now estopped from raising this question. You will therefore not consider this objection as constituting any defense whatever to this action. No. 2. You are further instructed that the third objection of defendant—that is, that gasoline or naphtha was stored in the court-house in violation of the provisions of the policy prohibiting the keeping, using, or allowing on the premises of benzine, gasoline, naphtha, or other explosive—is also without force or foundation.

This condition in the policy must be understood as prohibiting only the habitual keeping, using, or allowing of any of these articles on the premises, and not the occasional introduction thereof for some temporary purpose connected with their occupation, such as making ordinary or necessary repairs, and the like. I therefore charge you that there is no evidence in this cause tending to show a violation of this condition, and hence a recovery by the plaintiff cannot be defeated by reason of this objection. No. 8. As to whether there has been an increase of hazard or violation of the terms of the policy within the meaning of its terms as understood and contemplated by the parties, I instruct you that, in determining whether or not there has been an increase of risk, it is essential to ascertain what the parties must be presumed to have contemplated when the insurance was made. And this involves the consideration of the usages and incidents of the risk, because where any change is warranted by the usage or usual incidents of the risk, although it in fact increased the risk, it does not come within the prohibition, because it is presumed to have been contemplated. No. 4. The well-settled doctrine seems to be that that which is necessary for the protection of the property or its preservation, such as ordinary repairs, by way of painting or otherwise, or that which is usual or incident to it for the purpose for which it is employed, when insured, must be regarded as within the contemplation of the parties, and excepted from the operation of any stipulation apparently to the contrary. No. 5. You are further instructed that the right to repair buildings is incident to the ownership and use of the property, and alterations which do not increase the risk under an insurance policy, as well as all ordinary repairs, may be made without affecting the validity of the policy. And hence, although, in making any such repairs, hazardous articles are introduced into the building, such as gasoline, oils, turpentine, paints, etc., the insurer is not relieved from liability if such articles are necessary incidents to the repairs in progress. No. 6. Both parties to a contract for insurance must be presumed to expect that the property will be preserved and kept in proper condition by making repairs upon it; and although the making of ordinary or necessary repairs in a reasonable way may sometimes increase the risk more or less while the work is going on, or involve the use of articles whose use in a business carried on in the building is prohibited by the policy, still the insurer would not be relieved from liability by reason of such repairs or such temporary increase of risk. No. 7. You are further instructed that, in the absence of an express stipulation to that effect, a contract of insurance should not be held to forbid the making of ordinary repairs in a reasonably safe way, and provisions like those we are now considering in the policy in question should not be deemed to apply to an increase of risk caused by reason of any such repairs, or to the use of an article necessary therefor or for the preservation of the property. And I instruct you that if it was reasonably necessary to remove the old paint from the building, as shown in this cause, for the purpose of properly repairing it, and that the use of the gasoline burner was reasonable and proper for that purpose, having reference to the nature of the building, the danger of fire, as well as to other considerations properly connected with the transaction, the policy would not be rendered void by reason of such use, and such use would constitute no defense to this action."

The question first presented by the charge is whether the painters employed were "mechanics" within the meaning of the policy, so that the insured was bound to obtain the indorsement of the company upon the policy permitting the repairs, inasmuch as these workmen were engaged for more than fifteen days. Plaintiff contends, (1) that they were not such mechanics; (2) that, if they were, the defendant waived any breach of that condition by its letter of October 1, 1894.

Webster defines the word "mechanic" as "one skilled or employed in shaping and uniting materials, such as wood, metals, etc., into any kind of structure, machine, or other object requiring the use of tools or instruments." The American Encyclopedia Dictionary defines the term as "one who is employed or skilled in the construction of materials, as wood, metal, etc., into any kind of structure or machine; one who is skilled in the use of tools or instruments; one who follows a mechanical trade for a living." In Anderson's Law Dictionary the term is defined as "a workman employed in shaping and uniting materials, such as wood, metal, into some kind of structure, machine, or other object requiring the use of tools." In Crabb's English Synonyms the distinction between a mechanic and a painter is drawn as follows: "The mechanic is a species of artisan who works at arts purely mechanical, in distinction from those who contribute to completion and embellishment of any objects. On this ground the shoemaker is a mechanic, and a common painter is a simple artisan." It is apparent that the common acceptance of the term "mechanic" does not include painters, and that painting was not intended by the terms of this policy to be included in those repairs which required the assent of the company to be indorsed upon the policy. To make the case more certain upon this point, when Mr. Rowe, who was called by the defendant as an expert upon insurance matters, was cross-examined, he testified: "The company I represent issues a permit for repairs. Never was called upon to issue a permit for painting alone. We never regarded painting alone as the kind of repairs that was contemplated by the policy."

We think the court was also right in stating to the jury that, if the painters were included within the term "mechanic" as used in the policy, clearly there was a waiver of any such claim by the letter of October 1, 1894. In the letter the company admits thoroughly examining the loss, the origin of the fire and attendant circumstances, and undertakes to state definitely its reasons for denying liability on the policy. It is apparent that the ground, and the only ground, upon which all liability was denied, was the storage of gasoline, though in the former part of it mention was made that men had been employed to burn off this paint. Good faith required that the company should apprise the plaintiff fully of its position; and, failing to do this, it estops itself from asserting any defense other than that brought to the notice of plaintiff. Towle v. Ionia, E. & B. R. Mut. F. Ins. Co. 91 Mich. 227, and cases there cited. The defendant having specifically called the attention of the insured to its objections to paying the policy, reiterating the claim made, it limited its complaint to the use and storage of gasoline. No more definite statement could have been made, and it operated as a waiver of other causes of complaint and defenses to the action.

The next objection is to the charge of the court upon the question of the use and storage of gasoline upon the premises. In the notice attached to the plea, the defendant sets out the manner in which the policy was voided under three heads: the first referring to the increased hazard to the property by the use of gasoline torches; the second referring to the employment of mechanics for more than fifteen days without the written assent of the company. The third matter of defense is set up as follows: "The gasoline or naphtha was stored in the court-house building covered by this policy at the time of said fire continuously for several days immediately preceding said fire, and that no agreement was indorsed on said policy or added thereto permitting such storage; and by reason thereof, within the true intent and meaning of the provisions of said policy, said policy became null and void." The defense then set up by this notice relates to the storage of gasoline contrary to the terms of the policy, and not to the use made of it by the workmen in removing the paint. The court construed this condition to mean only the habitual keeping, using, or allowing of any of these articles on the premises, and not the occasional introduction thereof for some temporary purpose connected with their occupation, such as making ordinary and necessary repairs or the like. While it is apparent that, under the notice, the defense upon that branch of the case was limited to the storage within the building, yet the inquiry need not be so restricted. The question is fairly presented by the charge whether the storing for the purpose for which the gasoline was used was a violation of the terms of the policy; and the court, we think, properly charged the jury on that point. In Dobson v. Southby, Moody & M. 90, the terms of the policy required that no fire should be kept in the building on which the rate of insurance in that case specified was paid. A tar barrel had been taken into the barn which had been insured against fire, for the purpose of repairing the building by tarring it. No fire was ordinarily kept or made there, but a fire was lighted inside to boil the tar; and, by the negligence of a servant, the building took fire, and was consumed. The insured recovered. Lord Tenterden said that the condition in the policy must be understood as forbidding only the habitual use of the fire, and not its occasional introduction, as, in that case, for the temporary purpose connected with the occupation of the premises. In O'Neil v. Buffalo F. Ins. Co. 3 N. Y. 123, the policy provided that "the true intent and meaning of the parties hereto, that in case the above-mentioned buildings, or either of them, shall at any time after the making, and during the time this policy would otherwise continue in force, be appropriated, applied, or used to or for the purpose of carrying on or exercising therein any trade, business, or vocation, denominated 'hazardous' or 'extra hazardous' . . . or for the purpose of storing therein any of the articles, goods, or merchandise in the same conditions, denominated 'hazardous' or 'extra hazardous' or included in the special rates, then . . . these presents shall cease and be of no force or effect." In the conditions annexed to the policy, oil and turpentine are denominated "hazardous" goods, and spirits of turpentine "extra hazardous;" and house building or repairing is included within the memorandum of "Special Rates of Premium." In the suit upon the policy it was held that painting of the inside of this house was not an application of the house to the purpose of carrying on the trade of house repairing, and that the oil and turpentine brought into the house for the purpose of painting it were not "stored" therein within the meaning of the clauses of the policy; and the court said: "The object of that clause was to prevent the house from being used for the ordinary deposit of hazardous goods, and not for their occasional introduction for a temporary purpose necessary to make the house tenantable as a dwelling." In New York Equitable Ins. Co. v. Langdon, 6 Wend. 623-628, under a somewhat similar clause, it was said: "The only question then is, whether the keeping of oil and spirituous liquors in the store, under the circumstances disclosed in the case, was appropriating or using the building for the purpose of storing those articles within the meaning of the policy. Everything that was kept, either in the store or cellar, was kept for the purpose of being retailed. The smaller vessels in the store were replenished from the larger ones in the cellar, which consisted at the time of the fire of one cask of oil, one barrel of rum, one cask of Jamaica spirits, and one pipe of gin, from all of which more or less had been drawn for the use of the store. It appears to me that the word 'storing' was used by the parties in this case in the sense contended for by the plaintiff, viz., a keeping for safe custody, to be delivered out in the same condition; substantially, as when received, and applies only where the storing or safe keeping is the sole or principal object of the deposit, and not where it is merely incidental, and the keeping is only for the purpose of consumption. If I send a cask of wine to a warehouse to be kept for me, that is a storing of it; but if I put it into my cellar or my garret to be drawn off and drank, I apprehend the term would not be considered as applying." Anderson's Law Dictionary defines the term "to store" as to keep merchandise for safe custody, to be delivered in the same condition as when received. In Mears v. Humboldt Ins. Co. 92 Pa. 15, 87 Am. Rep. 647, the policy on a distillery forbade the insured to keep or have on the premises petroleum, naphtha, benzine, benzole, gasoline, varnish, etc., or to keep, have, or use camphene, spirit gas, or any burning fluids or chemical oils, etc. In an action on the policy it was held that this did not prohibit the temporary taking of benzine on the premises for the cleaning of machinery and the use of the same therefor. See also Faust v. American F. Ins. Co. (Wis.) 64 N. W. Rep. 883; Fraim v. National F. Ins. Co. 170 Pa. 166. We think it is clear that there was not such a storing of gasoline within the building as to avoid the policy, and the court was correct in its charge.

Defendant's counsel insist, further, that the use made of this gasoline in burning off the paint was a violation of the condition of the policy which provides: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the hazard be increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured." Considerable testimony was introduced tending strongly to show that it was the custom of painters, and had been for many years prior to the issuing of the policy in suit, to use these torches in removing paint; and the court submitted that question fairly to the jury. In Wood on Fire Insurance, 2d ed. § 253, the rule is stated: "In determining as to whether or not there has been an increase of risk, it is essential to ascertain what the parties must be presumed to have contemplated when the insurance was made, and this involves a consideration of the usages and incidents of the risk, because if the change was one warranted by the usages or usual incidents of the risk, although it in fact increased the risk, it does not come within the prohibition, because it is presumed to have been contemplated by the parties." In First Cong. Ch. v. Holyoke Mut. F. Ins. Co. 158 Mass. 475, and also reported in 19 L. R. A. 587, it appeared that the church edifice was being repainted on the outside. It was built of wood, and had been painted and sanded. The paint had peeled and curled at the time of the fire, and for some time prior thereto the old paint was being taken off by the use of naphtha in torches similar to the ones in the present suit. The building was destroyed by fire after the workmen had been thus employed for nearly a month, and when the work was nearly completed. The policy provided as follows:

"This policy shall be void if . . . without the assent in writing or in print of the company . . . the situation or circumstances affecting the risk shall, by or with the knowledge, advice, agency, or consent of the insured, be so altered as to cause an increase of such risk; . . . or if camphene, benzine, naphtha, or other chemical oils or burning fluids shall be kept or used by the insured on the premises insured except that what is known as refined petroleum, kerosene, or coal oil may be used for lighting," etc. The court said: "On the undisputed facts as stated in the bill of 30 L. R. A.

exceptions, the only ground on which the plaintiff could fairly ask to present a question to the jury is upon its contention that the use of the naphtha and the change in conditions affecting the risk occurred through making ordinary repairs in a reasonable and proper way, and that in the provisions quoted from the policy there is an implied exception of what is done in making ordinary repairs. It is generally held that such provisions are not intended to prevent the making of necessary repairs, and the use of such means as are reasonably required for that purpose." The court further said: "The making of ordinary repairs in a reasonable way may sometimes increase the risk more or less while the work is going on, or involve the use of an article whose use in a business carried on in the building is prohibited by the policy. In the absence of an express stipulation to that effect, a contract of insurance should not be held to prohibit the making of ordinary repairs in a reasonably safe way, and provisions like these we are considering should not be deemed to apply to an increase of risk or to a use of an article necessary for the preservation of the property. We are therefore of opinion that if the use of naphtha at the time and in the manner in which it was used was "reasonable and proper in the repair of the building, having reference to the danger of fire as well as to other considerations, it would not render the policies void."

Some question is raised in reference to the admission and rejection of the testimony of witnesses, which we have carefully examined, but find no error in the record. The only question of fact in the case was fairly submitted to the jury, and we think the charge of the court contained a correct statement of the principles of law involved.

The judgment will be affirmed.

Hooker, J., took no part in the decision. McGrath, Ch. J., and Montgomery, J., concurred with Long, J.

Grant, J., dissenting:

The contract of insurance in this case provided that it should "be void if the hazard be increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto; or if, any usage, custom of trade or manufacture to the contrary notwithstanding, there be kept, used, or allowed on the premises, benzine, gasoline, naphtha, or other explosives." The rate of insurance was very low. The property insured was a court-house, standing in the center of a block with no other buildings on it.

1. It is conclusively established by the evidence, and is in fact conceded, that gasoline was kept, used, and allowed in the tower of the court-house for twenty-four days; that the floor of this tower was of pine, that the timbers were of pine, and that they were as dry as tinder; that three torches or blowpipes were used to burn the paint off from the cornice, which was constructed of pine timber on the inside and covered with galvanized iron on the outside; that these torches did set the building on fire, and cause its destruction; that the defendant was not informed that this was to be done; that its assent was not obtained; and that the proper county authorities contemplated and permitted it, and had full knowledge of the method employed while it was being done. The sole claim of the plaintiff is that this method was customary and reasonably safe, that it was a proper way of making repairs, and was contemplated by the contract of insurance. Can the above language be reasonably construed to mean that these parties contracted that plaintiff might keep, or permit to be kept, within this building, for weeks, one of the most volatile and inflammable of substances, to be used by its painters, not upon the inside, but upon the outside, of the building? There was no necessity for storing it there. It could as well have been kept outside the building. It was, possibly, a little more convenient for the painters to keep it in the tower; but convenience is not the test, but reasonable necessity. Where the insured seeks to avoid the plain terms of his policy upon the ground of repairs, it certainly is incumbent upon him to show some necessity for the methods employed. The following authorities are relied on by the plaintiff: Dobson v. Sotheby, Moody & M. 90; O'Neil v. Buffalo F. Ins. Co. 8 N. Y. 123; New York Equitable Ins. Co. v. Langdon, 6 Wend. 628; Mears v. Humboldt Ins. Co. 92 Pa. 15, 87 Am. Rep. 647. In neither of these cases was the language of the policy like that in the present case. In Dobson v. Sotheby it appears that there was no agreement in the policy, but the rate of premium was the lowest rate, and only payable for buildings of a certain description wherein "no fire is kept." The court held that this language applied to habitual fires, but said: "If the company intended to stipulate, not merely that no fire should habitually be kept on the premises, but that none should ever be introduced upon them, they might have expressed themselves to that effect."

Is there any difference in meaning between the terms "allowed" and "introduced?" As used in this contract, "to allow," as defined by Webster, means "to permit; suffer; tolerate." Will it be contended that if, in that case, the policy had provided that no fire should be kept, used, or allowed in the building, the court would have held, as it did, that it was proper to make a fire to heat tar? In O'Neil v. Buffalo F. Ins. Co. the policy forbade the storing of hazardous or extra hazardous goods. The property insured was a private dwelling. Painters were painting the inside of the house, and brought into it, and kept there while the work was going on, the necessary material,—paints, oil, and turpentine. It was held that the object of that clause was to prevent the house from being used for the ordinary deposit of hazardous goods. In Mears v. Humboldt Ins. Co. the provision in the policy was as follows: That "if the assured shall keep or have, in any place on the insured premises where this policy may apply, petroleum, naphtha, benzole, gasoline, benzine, varnish, or any product, in whole or in part, of either; or gunpowder, fireworks, nitro-glycerine, phosphorus, saltpetre, nitrate of soda; or keep, have, or use camphene, spirit gas, or any burning fluid or chemical oils, without written permission in this policy,—then and in every such case, this policy shall be void." The plaintiff purchased eight or ten gallons of benzine and a small quantity of carbon oil, and stored them in his bonded warehouse, situated some 40 or 50 yards distant from the insured premises. His workmen carried the benzine in a small tin can from the warehouse to the distillery, and used it in cleaning the machinery. The court held that the words, "keep or have," were intended to prevent a storage either permanently or habitually, and that bringing a prohibited article upon the premises upon a single occasion, and for the sole purpose of cleaning machinery, was not keeping or having it there, within the meaning of the policy. Stress was laid upon the fact that the benzine was not kept on the insured premises during the period of its use, but was stored in the bonded warehouse. Upon the other point the court said: "The use of benzine is not prohibited in terms. If prohibited at all it must be because benzine comes within the description of burning fluid or chemical oils, which, in their nature, were like camphene or spirit gas, and there was no proof that it was of like nature." In New York Equitable Ins. Co. v. Langdon the two defenses were that the business of a grocer was hazardous because he kept liquor and oil, and because he kept these articles for the purpose of retailing. It was held that the term "storing" meant a keeping for safe custody, and not where the grocer kept them for retail. We are cited to no authorities, nor have I been able to find any, where the provision that these articles shall not be "used, kept, or allowed" upon the premises has been construed to cover a case like the present. If the plaintiff had permitted these painters to keep gasoline in the court-house for three weeks, while they were painting the property of some other person near by, or some other county building, it would, under all the authorities, have rendered the policy void. The danger would have been no greater in those cases than in this, and apparently no greater necessity for such keeping. The language of this contract is clear and unequivocal. It clearly forbids certain acts, to which the plaintiff agreed, under the penalty of the forfeiture of his policy. To hold that they were not forbidden is, in my judgment, directly contrary to the plainest and most unequivocal language, and imposes a contract upon the parties which they never made.

2. It requires no testimony to inform any one that the application of an intense flame to dry pine wood is dangerous and hazardous. A thin coat of galvanized iron was placed over the woodwork upon this cornice. Upon this iron was blown a flame of intense heat. It is common knowledge that, if there was a hole or open seam in this sheet iron the flame would penetrate, and set fire to the wood inside, and also that it would quickly heat the thin iron sufficiently to ignite the wood with which it was in contact. There is no testimony that this flame was not applied with due care, upon the assumption that it was proper to apply it at all. It is conceded that it set fire to the building, and that it was thereby destroyed. Either there was some hole or defective seam through which the flame entered, or else the iron was so heated by the application of the flame that it set fire to the woodwork. It is therefore established that, notwithstanding the care used by the painters, the use of the flame was dangerous, increased the hazard, and destroyed the building. It is insisted, however, that this is a customary and proper method of removing old paint from buildings, and this brings us to an examination of the testimony. On account of the importance of the case in the construction of insurance contracts, and the—to me—strange claim of the plaintiff, I give the substance of the entire testimony on the use of these torches.

Mr. Samuel H. Row, who was commissioner of insurance of this state for twelve years, and has been the general agent for an insurance company in this state for ten years, testified that he never knew paint to be burned off a building before, did not know that it was customary to do so, and that no company would write insurance knowing that it was to be done, and that the increase of hazard was so great that his company would at once have canceled the policy had it known what was to be done, and that in his judgment it was a material increase of hazard. Mr. Cornell and Mr. Tillotson, both of whom have been state agents for eighteen to twenty years, gave similar testimony. No one, experienced or inexperienced in the insurance business, has given any testimony tending to show that insurers have ever voluntarily assumed such a risk.

Mr. Sleater, who had the contract to paint the building, testified that he could not tell whether or not any seams were open in the cornice. He never made an examination. That this was a proper way to remove the paint, and it could not have been done in any other way in ten years. He couldn't tell exactly how long it was necessary to direct the blaze upon the paint in order to blister it up. It was very soon,—“according to how much you could turn off. You could rig that lamp so that it would take up one-half hour or a quarter of a minute. The ordinary way, we worked right along with it, using it in one hand and taking the knife in the other, and passed right along. I got one of these torches of Mr. Hill, and one of Mr. Woodbury. Mr. Woodbury is a plumber in this city, and Mr. Hill is a painter. I had none of my own. I have been painting twenty-two years, and never owned a torch,—not that kind of a torch. I never used this one before I used it on this building,—not that kind of a torch. In my profession or trade as a painter, I never used a gasoline torch in painting before. In my twenty-two years' experience, this was the first time I had occasion to use a gasoline torch, and I guess it is not very common to use such torches in small towns. I have heard of them being used in Charlotte before. I have never seen them in use, until I was shown this one, and how to use it. I was never called upon, in my twenty-two years' practice, to take off that kind of paint before. I presume that kind of a torch would be more liable to set fire to a building than if the torch had not been used. Yes, sir; likely it would. The flame went with a good deal of force. With some force. If it got in back of the—through the joints, and got in back of the galvanized iron, it would be right on the tinder box, I presume. I have burned the paint off two buildings in Charlotte; off two buildings in my twenty-two years' experience. Two buildings, and this was one of them; one other beside this building. I burned off what there was, just a small portion of it. It was in front of a store where it had scaled. With the exception of one front of a store and this building, I had never done anything of that sort in twenty-two years.” The front of this store was of solid iron.

Francis Horn was a painter, and worked for Mr. Sleater on this building, and was working on it when it took fire. He testified: “In this lamp, when full, I had a quart of gasoline. We put in a quart, and this air pump would force the air under the gasoline, and around in some way, so as to force it out the top. That would generate the gas, and it would be this gas that would burn. It would be hard to tell how long a flame that would make. We might pump it full, or as full as you could, and force through a flame 5 or 6 inches. The flame would depend upon how hard you work the pump. I suppose it is a good deal upon the same principle of the blow pump used by jewelers in welding their jewelry. It creates a hot flame. In order to remove the paint, you would have to make this hot enough to blister the paint. I had been using the torch around the cornice from the beginning. Had been using it something over three weeks at the time of the fire. I found a place on the cornice where this galvanized iron was broken off. I found no places where the seams had opened; only where it came clear off. There were two places, I believe, where it came clear off. That was in behind the wood. I noticed places there where the sparrows had taken up trash or straw in the cornice. I found it there. I didn't notice other places until after the fire. In the eagle, I believe, there was some which I discovered after the fire. I did not burn the paint off from those. There were three torches used on the job. They were all gasoline torches. We used a gallon, or a little over, per day. We averaged a gallon per day during all the time. We kept the gasoline in the tower at the court-house. We kept a five-gallon can of it. When we would use up five gallons, we would go and get it filled again, and bring it up there, and put it in the tower of the court-house, and use out of it until it was all gone. One of these lamps took two people to use it. It didn't pump air in the same way as the one I used. They used a rubber pump, and I used a metal. It took one to hold, and the other to scrape off. They didn't have to pump it. They pumped it full, and let it go. Would have to fill them very often; about four times a day." Philip Wareham was walking along the street just before the fire, saw Mr. Horn working with the blow lamp, and could hear the noise of it upon the street.

Plaintiff introduced as a witness one Michael Wolf, a painter from Grand Rapids, who testified that they used these lamps "on any kind of a building,—on wooden buildings. Been in the habit of using them for the last fifteen years, that I can remember. We keep them as a part of our outfit for work. We have got half a dozen in our store now for that purpose. I know of no other way of removing the paint from cornice work of a building, where it is sanded, and it is flaky. This is the only proper way to do it as I know of, or anybody else that I heard of. Used them right along for fifteen years every summer and spring. Generally carry a lamp right along with us. That is, the outside work. Sometimes use them on the inside, where there is paint to be burned off. I never heard of an accident occurring from the use of these lamps. I never had one, and I never heard of one. I don't see any danger in them. They cannot explode. I would consider it perfectly safe to use one of those lamps for the purpose of removing paint. I know of no other way to remove it, unless they tear the cornice down and put on a new one. There would be no such thing as scraping it off, not in a building of this kind. It would take a man all his lifetime, and then he could not do it proper. By the use of these lamps, we do not heat the paint very hot. You have got to hold the lamp until the paint kind of bubbles, and you follow right along with the scraper, and take the paint off as you go along. You can go in carriage shops, or in any shops, and you will find them burning lamps. They use them in carriage shops for burning off old paint,—when the buggies crack and chip off, to blister it." On cross-examination, he testified: "I burned all the paint off a wooden building, and didn't set it on fire. I did not think that a bit remarkable. A man has got to be careful. There is no more danger in burning it off than if you do not burn it off, unless a man is careless. That depends on the man, on a wooden building. Of course, we do not use an inexperienced man to burn off paint. If a man works alone, and nobody else around him, there might be danger, then, if he leaves the lamp on one spot, maybe ten or fifteen minutes. That makes it dangerous. It is dangerous if a man is inexperienced, and is using it on a wooden building. I will admit that it is dangerous on any building where the flame is liable to come in contact with the wood, or liable to come in contact with trash or straw, or anything of that kind. There is danger, if you hold the torch ten or fifteen minutes. It is liable to set fire on a frame house. You can throw a flame 8 inches out of the nozzle. It makes a roaring sound. During the last year I have burned paint off from about five houses. This last summer, in Grand Rapids. I have no idea how many houses I have painted during last summer,—a good many. We burned the paint off one house last year on Madison avenue, that belongs to Mr. Alexander Kennedy. We burned off some paint on the inside. Burned the paint off four rooms. That is the only house we burned off last summer. It is a common thing to burn off the paint where it is necessary. It is necessary a good many times, but the people do not want to pay for doing it. They like to have it done, all right, if we do it for nothing. Only burn the paint off one out of a hundred. I remember using these gasoline torches fourteen years ago. That is the first I knew about them. I do not know how they removed the paint before that. They burned it off before I ever started to burn off. They removed it, before that, by setting it afire by turpentine, soaking it up. Used to use lye in taking paint off then, rubbing the lye over it, and scraped it off. You could not use lye on the cornices, because the lye gets into your eyes."

One H. Bower, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that he had assisted in painting the court-house, and that he saw the lamp described as having been used by Mr. Horn. "I know when it was ordered; I guess, the first time it was filled. Fred Hill ordered it. I told him where to order it, and he sent and got it. It was the time they burned off Jerry Mikesell's front, or Lamb & Spencer's now. I do not know whether three or four years ago,—two or three years ago; I could not say. That was an iron front. It was not galvanized iron. I had some experience here in the city myself burning off paint when I went away. I burned off buggies, and some furniture and doors. We used the lamp for that purpose. We used the hot iron some, too,—blistered the paint. I worked in Chicago for four years. Q. Do you know of any way they employ for the purpose of removing paint off cornice work, and off buildings, where it is peeling, and it becomes necessary to remove the paint, except by the use of these lamps? A. No, sir; not successfully. They are used there among those painters almost constantly. Burning it off is the only practical way. We have taken it off with lye and varnish, and sometimes with naphtha and benzine. They are not using that as much at present; not as much as they are burning it off. That is the only proper way for taking it off. I do not think you could use lye effectually on the cornice of this building. Taking that paint off in order to repaint it, by the use of one of these lamps, is the only way that I know of taking it off, and, in my opinion, it was a safe way to do it. I never knew of an accident occurring from the use of those lamps and removing paint in that way." On cross-examination he testified: "I have used these torches to burn off paint in Chicago on Ex-Mayor Roche's house. I think the fore part of last spring. There were six or eight men in the shop that were to work there. I used the burner myself, some of the time. There were slide doors—folding doors—in the house, that had been painted a good many times; some of the front doors; and one of the front doors was burned off. We burned the iron railing of the steps off. We burned off the barn doors. We took them out of the building. They were removed, and they were made over, and made into smaller doors. We burned them off inside the building. We took them inside, and burned them off. They were not hung in the building. They were off from the building. In addition to that, we burned off some from the wooden casing around the door or rope molding. Treated a number of houses in the city in that way. I couldn't name the houses we have treated in that way. It is very seldom we know the names of the people. I could take you right to the house if I was there, but I couldn't tell you the number. When in Chicago the last time, I worked for Mr. Widden. He does the work for insurance companies. He does work for the Aetna and the Merchants' Insurance Company in Chicago, and he does a good deal of fire work that way. Where the curtains, lots of times, a gas jet, where there was two windows together, or there was one window, where the gas jet was pretty close to the window, the window raised, and the curtains swings around, and catches fire, and burns the finish off from the casing, part of the casing would be charred; so you would have to put in a piece, and the other part, to make it like, have to take the finish off, and make it all alike; and we use a burner of naphtha or benzine, or something or other, to take that finish off, to make like the new part. I could not give you any idea of the number I have treated in that way. I think we done a dozen jobs last summer that was burning a piece of work of the kind, and also papering. I have burned buggies off here in Charlotte. I cannot remember how many houses here. I think there is more risk where there is fire around building than as though there was not. There is some risk in burning paint off from a building; that is, more than there would be if you did not burn it off."

Mr. Sleater was recalled as a witness for the plaintiff, and testified that he used, in removing paint, a heating apparatus of some kind,—sometimes a torch, and sometimes a charcoal box. On cross-examination, he testified: "During all my twenty-five years' experience I never removed paint from the outside of a building in Charlotte by gasoline torches. I have removed it off from doors on the outside of a building. Just doors taken off from a building. There is always more or less danger of fire. I know that gasoline is very explosive and exceedingly inflammable. It is about as dangerous as anything, as far as explosives is concerned. I do not know about the intensity of heat, but I presume it is about as hot as any. It is volatile, and it generates gas very rapidly. The gas which it generates is exceedingly inflammable, and burns very rapidly. I have removed paint from buggy boxes and tires with gasoline torches, while the buggy was standing in the shop. Put it in the shop, and applied the gasoline torch there."

It conclusively appears that no such custom existed in Charlotte, nor do I think it can be called a custom in Grand Rapids, where Mr. Wolf admits he does not use it upon one house in a hundred. He is the only witness who testifies to its use upon wooden buildings, and he does not say whether such buildings upon which he used it were isolated or not. It may be entirely safe to use it upon buggies, doors, solid iron and brick buildings, or upon window and door frames set in solid brick walls or fences, where there is nothing back of them for the flames to reach; but to say that it is reasonable to use it upon wooden buildings, and upon dry timber covered with galvanized iron, is, in my judgment, contrary to reason. We know, from common experience, that shingles, clapboards, boards, and timbers will shrink and crack, and leave spaces through which a flame of this kind would instantly penetrate, and set fire to the cobwebs, dust, and dry material within. From the garrets of many houses daylight can be seen through these cracks and crevices, under the eaves and around the cornice. It appears to me past belief that the municipality of Grand Rapids, or Chicago, or any city, would permit the use of this flame upon wooden buildings, or those covered, in whole or in part, with thin sheets of tin or iron, in thickly settled localities. The danger of conflagration is too great. Such use is dangerous per se, and no amount of expert testimony can, in my judgment, justify a finding by court or jury that it is reasonably safe. Mr. Wolf, plaintiff's principal witness, says: "It is dangerous on any building where the flame is liable to come in contact with the wood." Was not the flame liable to come in contact with the wood in this case? Even in the Church Case, hereinafter cited, a bucket of water was kept at hand to put out any fire which might be kindled by the flame. This, however, would be of little use if the fire was kindled within the walls. In this case not even this precaution was taken. All the witnesses admit that it was dangerous, and increased the hazard from fire, and, even if it were customary, the unambiguous language of this contract is that the insured should not permit it. Not a single witness says that it did not increase the hazard. Is it reasonable to even suppose that the parties to this contract contemplated that the insurer should assume the risk of a flame—so hot that it would heat metal—being thrown upon the sides of this building, the interior of which was a mere tinder box? Such holding, it seems to me, is in clear violation of the terms of a contract in which there is no ambiguity and which absolutely prohibits using, allowing, or keeping gasoline. Yet, courts are asked to declare that this contract contemplated using it in its most dangerous form. The only case cited, and we presume the only one that can be found, involving this method of removing paint, is that of the First Cong. Ch. v. Holyoke Mut. F. Ins. Co. 19 L. R. A. 587, 158 Mass. 475. The provision of the policy involved in that case was that these inflammable articles should not be "kept or used by the insured on the premises insured." The result in that case was the same as in this. The building was destroyed. In so far as that case appears to hold, even under the terms of that policy, that it was a question for the jury to determine, I cannot yield it my assent. The language of that policy, however, is not as strong as that of the policy here involved, since it did not contain the word "allowed." I concur in the following language there used: "Was a change of this kind increasing the risk with the knowledge, agency, and consent of the insured, an alteration of 'the situation or circumstances affecting the risk,' within the meaning of those words in the policies? Those words imply something of duration, and a casual change of a temporary character would not ordinarily render the policy void under this provision. But this change had existed continuously during the working hours of every day for nearly a month, and the work was not nearly done when it was interrupted by the fire. We are of opinion that the change of the condition was sufficiently long continued to be deemed a change in 'the situation or circumstances affecting the risk.' In the case of Lyman v. State Mut. F. Ins. Co. 14 Allen, 329, it was held that an alteration of a building which increased the risk for three weeks was enough to render the policy void under a similar clause." The editor of the Lawyers' Reports Annotated, in a note to this case, says: "The facts of the above case are unusual and the decision an important one in the law of fire insurance. The interpretation of the clause as to the use of naphtha 'on the premises' establishes a precedent where there seems to have been none before."

All the essential facts in the present case are undisputed, and the question was one of law for the court, and not of fact for the jury. In this connection I quote, with approval, the language of the court of appeals of New York, in Appleby v. Astor F. Ins. Co. 54 N. Y. 260, where, under somewhat similar circumstances, it was strenuously insisted that the question was one of fact for the jury: "As much as we venerate and respect the right of trial by jury, we are of opinion that the judges of the courts, while they may be supposed to have more learning in the law, are still able to comprehend an undisputed state of facts with as much intelligence as any jury that can ordinarily be impaneled." The court held that the facts in that case were, in law, a plain violation of the terms of the policy. So, in Maack v. Rochester German Ins. Co. 106 N. Y. 564, the court says: "We have no difficulty in agreeing with the rules of law laid down by that court, but we are quite unable to concur in the view taken by it of the evidence. The provision of the policy governing the case is framed in plain, unambiguous language, and its object and design are reasonable and free from any doubt. Certain conditions are very generally regarded by underwriters as largely increasing the hazards of insurance, and they, unless corresponding premiums are paid for the extra risks, are usually intended to be excluded from the obligation of the policy. Such are the conditions in reference to unoccupied houses, changes in the occupation from one kind of business to another more hazardous, the use of inflammable substances in buildings, and their occupation by carpenters, roofers, etc., for the purpose of making changes and alterations. These conditions, when plainly expressed in a policy, are binding upon the parties and should be enforced by courts, if the evidence brings the case clearly within their meaning and intent." In Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Gunther, 116 U. S. 128, 29 L. ed. 580, it is said: "One of the conditions of the policy is, that if the assured shall keep or use any of the prohibited articles without written permission, it shall be void; another is that the articles named 'are not to be stored, used, kept; or allowed on the above premises, temporarily or permanently, for sale or otherwise, unless with written permission indorsed on the policy,' etc. A violation of these prohibitions by any one permitted by the assured to occupy the premises, is a violation by the assured himself. The company stipulates that it will not assume the risk arising from the presence of the articles prohibited, and if they are brought upon the premises in violation of the policy by one in whose possession and control the latter have been placed by the insured, he assumes the risk which the company has refused to accept." The plaintiff does not claim that the agents of the company were ignorant of any of the terms of this policy. They were fully aware of them. This the law presumes. Yet they chose to permit the application of this intense flame, the natural result of which was the destruction of their property, without even an examination, to determine whether it was probably safe to do so, without notice to their insurers, or any attempt to obtain their assent. The inside was a tinder box, and there were holes in the iron covering. I think this case is squarely within Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Gunther, supra.

8. I am of the opinion that a very damaging error was committed in admitting certain questions on the cross-examination of Mr. Row. The following will serve as illustrations: "Q. Then if I, for any purpose, carry a bottle of benzine into my house to use for some family use, and leave it there, or keep it there for that use, my policy is absolutely void, under that clause, is it?" "Q. Would you consider that a policy issued by your company, with this clause, that no benzine shall be kept or used on the premises, that if a person shall take a pint of benzine into their house, covered by such a policy, for the purpose of cleaning grease spots out of his clothing, would that void the policy?" These questions involved pure conclusions of law. The last question did not correctly state the terms of the policy, because it left out the important term "allowed." Furthermore, it allowed the jury to compare the occasional use of these articles, and a very common use, too, with the facts of the present case, a very unusual one, and to naturally say that, if the former one would not vitiate the policy, neither would the latter. Mr. Row had not been asked his opinion as to whether this policy was rendered void by the conduct of the insured. Certainly, no one would claim that his opinion would have been competent, and yet he is required to give his opinion upon other issues not involved, and having no connection with the case upon trial. The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Edmund OSGOOD, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

An oral lease of land for one year, with the privilege of three, at an annual rent, is for a longer period than a year within the statute of frauds, notwithstanding the lessee's option, since he cannot compel the execution of the lease for a year because the contract contemplates the exercise of the option after the execution of the lease.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Lenawee County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for breach of an agreement to lease. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Patterson & Flynn, for plaintiff in error:

This lease was to be for three years, hence the verbal contract would not constitute a valid lease for more than one year, even if the plaintiff had gone into possession, and inasmuch as he did not go into possession the lease is void.

Carney v. Mosher, 97 Mich. 554; Evans v. Winona Lumber Co. 80 Minn. 518; McDonald v. Maltz, 78 Mich. 685; Tillman v. Fuller, 18 Mich. 118; Taylor, Land. & T. 25, and note.

A contract void under the statute of frauds is a mere nullity and cannot be used for any purpose whatever.

Chamberlain v. Dow, 10 Mich. 819; Hall v. Soule, 11 Mich. 494; Holland v. Hoyt, 14 Mich. 238; Grimes v. Van Vechten, 20 Mich. 410.

The statute making the parol contract absolutely void furnishes no ground of action in favor of the plaintiff.

Bath v. Campbell, 65 Wis. 405.

The measure of damages in such a case is the fair average value of the use of the land less the rent.

Taylor v. Cooper (Mich.) 63 N. W. Rep. 157.

The plaintiff's right to recover is based upon his damages suffered growing out of being deprived of his contract. If he has not suffered any damages he certainly is not entitled to recover anything.

Tufts v. Weinfeld, 88 Wis. 647.

Messrs. Wood & Bird and Walter C. Burridge for defendant in error.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff instituted this suit to recover damages for the violation of an executory parol agreement that defendant would execute a lease to him of certain lands for one year, with the privilege of three, at the annual rental of $100 per year. The court instructed the jury that, if they found such to be the contract, the plaintiff was entitled to recover as damages the difference between the market value of the lease and what he agreed to pay for it. It is conceded that, if this was a contract for a lease for a longer period than a year, it is void under the statute of frauds. 2 How. Anno. Stat. § 6181. It is settled that such a contract, unexecuted, cannot form the basis of an action or of a defense. Sabb v. Campbell, 65 Wis. 405; Carney v. Mosher, 97 Mich. 554; Grimes v. Van Vechten, 20 Mich. 410; Hall v. Soule, 11 Mich. 494. The contention of the plaintiff is that the contract may be performed within one year, and is therefore good for that period, in support of which he cites Barton v. Gray, 57 Mich. 634; Whiting v. Ohlert, 53 Mich. 463, 50 Am. Rep. 265; Blake v. Voight, 184 N. Y. 69. In Whiting v. Ohlert the sole question decided was that a parol agreement for a year's lease, to begin in the future, is valid. Barton v. Gray goes no further than to hold that the statute of frauds does not apply to contracts which leave it uncertain whether they may or may not be performed within a year, or which depend upon a contingency that may happen within the year. Blake v. Voight holds that a verbal contract which contains an option allowing either party to terminate it within a year is not within the statute, although without the option it would be within the statute. Neither of these cases is like the present, or affords any light in construing this contract. Counsel for the defendant do not argue the question, but assume that the lease was to be for three years. We have been unable, after considerable search, to find any case involving such a contract, or one which affords us any light. We think, however, upon principle, that it is within the mischief which the statute is designed to prevent. The contract contemplated a lease for three years, and, so far as the defendant is concerned, it is absolute. Plaintiff has not exercised his option, and asked for a contract for a year. He comes into court relying upon a parol contract by which he was entitled to a lease for three years. His case appears to have been tried upon that theory, for his damages were not limited to one year. The defendant could not have complied with the contract by tendering a lease for a year, nor could the plaintiff compel the execution of a lease for a year, because such contracts contemplate the exercise of the option after the execution of the lease. It follows that the agreement is void under the statute, and cannot, therefore, be made the basis for a recovery for a breach of contract.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

The other Justices concur.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

LEVY BROTHERS, Appts.
v.
CHICAGO NATIONAL BANK.

(188 ILL. 88.)

1. A secured creditor of one who becomes insolvent is entitled to prove his claim and to participate in dividends only for the amount remaining after deducting sums realized upon collaterals up to the date of filing his claim and making the preliminary proofs, and not upon the claim as it exists at the date of the assignment, especially in view of the provisions of the Illinois assignment act, that creditors must assent to the assignment by proving their claims within a certain time, and for discontinuance of the proceeding by assent of a majority of creditors, as a creditor acquires no vested interest in the assigned estate until his assent is so signified.
2. A party excepting to a claim filed in insolvency proceedings has the burden of showing what payments have been made thereon.
3. A payment upon collaterals held to secure a claim against an insolvent estate, shown to have been made merely upon the same day that the claim was proved, should not be deducted from the amount of such claim as made before the proving, as acts done upon the same day will generally be regarded in law as done at the same time.
4. An appeal from the Illinois county court upon the question of the amount for which a claim against an insolvent estate should be allowed is properly taken to the appellate court.

APPEAL by objectors from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Cook County Court overruling their objections to the allowance of the claim of the Chicago National Bank against the insolvent estate of Herman Schaffner & Co. Reversed.

Statement by Magruder, J.:

Herman Schaffner & Co., by A. G. Becker, the surviving partner, made an assignment June 3, 1893. Their indebtedness exceeded at that time $2,000,000. Their assets were such that, up to the present time, a 10 per cent dividend has been declared, and the prospects for more than 5 per cent additional dividend are exceedingly slight. At the date of the assignment the insolvents were indebted to the Chicago National Bank in the sum of $100,000. The bank held as collateral security to this indebtedness certain promissory notes of the customers of Herman Schaffner & Co., owned by the insolvents, and pledged by them to the bank in accordance with the contract embodied in the collateral notes. These collateral notes had been partially paid. Prior to September 9, 1893,— the day on which the Chicago National Bank filed its claim against the estate of Herman Schaffner & Co.,—it had collected upon these collaterals $86,012.88. On September 9th (but whether before or after the filing of its claim does not appear) it collected $5,000; and at the time of the hearing of this cause in the county court it had collected in all $90,000.88. The court allowed the bank to participate in the dividends on the basis of its claim as it stood on the day of assignment. Appellants, creditors of the estate, who had filed objections in due time, insisted that the claim should be allowed only for the balance due at the date of the hearing, after deducting all sums collected on the collaterals prior thereto. The order or judgment of the county court has been affirmed by the appellate court.

Messrs. Hofheimer, Zeisler, & Mack for appellants.

Messrs. Tatham & Webster for appellee.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When appellee filed its claim on September 9, 1893, against the assigned estate in the county court, there had been paid upon the notes, which had been pledged to it as collateral security for its debt, the sum of $86,012.88. This sum consisted of various amounts paid by the makers of the collateral notes at different times between June 3, 1893, the date of the assignment, and September 9, 1893, the date of the filing of the claim. Certificates of deposit for the respective sums so paid were issued by appellee to the order of its cashier, and by him deposited in an envelope in lieu of the notes paid, for the purpose of keeping a record of such payments. None of these collections were indorsed on the principal note of the insolvents, Herman Schaffner & Co., or entered on the books of appellee to the credit of the insolvents. But appellee received the money so paid to it, and mingled it with its own funds, and so had the use and benefit of it. In addition to this, the principal indebtedness was overdue at the date of the assignment. Such principal indebtedness was evidenced by a note for $100,000, dated April 15, 1893, payable on demand, to the order of appellee, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and signed by Herman Schaffner & Co. This note recited that there had been delivered to appellee, to secure its payment, certain collaterals in the shape of notes, etc., and provided that appellee or its assigns might, at any time after the maturity of the note, sell such collaterals, or any part thereof, at public or private sale, with or without notice, and apply the proceeds upon the note. Nothing had been paid upon the notes held as collateral when the assignment was made, but appellee had then, and before that time, the right to sell the collaterals and apply the proceeds upon the note for $100,000. If, instead of selling the collaterals, it voluntarily received payments upon them from the makers of them, it is difficult to see why it was not their duty to apply such payments upon the principal note. The amount of their claim, on September 9, 1893, would then have been the difference between $100,000 and $66,012.88, or $33,987.12 instead of the sum of $100,000 for which their claim was filed on that day. The general rule is that a creditor should credit upon the principal debt whatever he may collect upon the collateral security. Jones, Pledges, § 678. A pledgee who holds commercial paper as collateral security for the payment of his debt has no authority, in the absence of a special power for that purpose, to sell the securities, upon default of payment, at public or private sale. He is bound to hold and collect the same as they become due, and apply the net proceeds to the payment of the debt so secured. Joliet Iron & S. Co. v. Scioto Fire Brick Co. 82 Ill. 548, 25 Am. Rep. 341; Union Trust Co. v. Rigdon, 98 Ill. 458; Schouler, Bailm. 2d ed. §§ 206, 236. It is true that here a special power was given to sell the collateral notes at public or private sale, but, as that power was not exercised, the duty of applying the money collected from the collaterals to the payment of the principal debt arose out of the fact of the pledge of the commercial paper, independently of the power. Under such circumstances, when payments are made on the notes held as collateral, the law makes the application of such payments to the principal debt, even if the creditor himself does not do so. Hunt v. News, 15 Pick. 500, 26 Am. Dec. 618.

NOTE.—The very difficult and much-disputed question decided in the above case, as to deductions for collections made from collateral securities after an insolvency assignment, is decided differently in Chemical Nat. Bank v. Armstrong (C. C. 80 L. R. A.

App. 6th C.) 23 L. R. A. 231. These two conflicting cases very extensively review the authorities upon the subject. The extreme doctrine of the Maryland authorities is shown in National Union Bank v. National Mechanics' Bank (Md.) 27 L. R. A. 678.

Where a creditor holding collateral security files his claim in the county court against the estate of an insolvent who has made an assignment, or in the probate court against the estate of a deceased insolvent debtor he should credit upon his claim such payments as have been received by him upon his collaterals up to the time of filing proof of his claim, or filing and proving his claim. By "proof" is meant the preliminary proofs which accompany the presentation of the claim, and not the additional proofs made necessary by the filing of objections or exceptions. The amount of the claim, as thus filed by the creditor and supported by his oath or affidavit, is the amount upon which the creditor is entitled to receive dividends from the insolvent estate, irrespective of what may be collected from the collaterals thereafter. Such was the decision of this court in Furness v. Union Nat. Bank, 147 Ill. 570. In that case we said: "The creditor has a right to prosecute his claim for the full amount against the estate of the deceased debtor in the hands of the administrator, as he had a right to prosecute it for the full amount against the debtor when alive. Of course, this right is subject to the condition that the whole amount of his claim is due to him when he files and proves it.

If he has realized upon his collateral before filing and proving his claim, he voluntarily parts with the double right secured to him by the law, and can only proceed for what is actually due to him, that is to say, for what remains of his claim after deducting the amount realized from the collaterals.

But if a creditor, who has filed and proved his claim for the full amount in the probate court can only be allowed the difference between such amount and the sum thereafter realized by disposing of his collaterals, there will be a temptation to prolong the litigation and delay the allowance in order that he may be forced to dispose of his collaterals, so that the dividends coming to him may be calculated upon a reduced claim. By such a course of proceeding the secured creditor may be deprived of his right, under the law, to proceed both against the estate and the security, until he gets payment in full." The assignment act requires the assignee to give notice of the assignment by publication, and to notify the creditors, by mail, "to present their claims under oath or affirmation to him within three months," etc. At the expiration of three months from the time of first publishing notice, he shall report and file with the clerk of the county court a sworn list "of all such creditors of the assignor . . . as shall have claimed to be such, with a true statement of their respective claims. . . . Any person interested as creditor or otherwise" may appear within thirty days after the filing of such report, and file with said clerk "any exceptions to the claim or demand of any creditor's exhibit as aforesaid." The clerk is required to give notice thereof to the creditor, and the court shall proceed to hear the proofs and render judgment. 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. pp. 1804, 1805. It is manifest, from the foregoing provisions, that the exceptions are to be filed to the claim as presented under oath to the assignee and reported by him. The question is whether the amount so claimed is due at the time when the claim is presented and sworn to. The trial is not merely a trial between the creditor and debtor, but between the claimant and any other creditor or interested party, as to the amount to be allowed as a basis for the calculation of dividends. This necessarily follows from the fact that any person interested as creditor or otherwise may except. If the trial should disclose that the claim as presented and sworn to was unjust, as between the creditor and his insolvent debtor, either wholly or in part, then, of course, it would be either wholly or partially disallowed. But, as to collections realized upon collaterals securing it after its original presentation under oath, there should be no reduction thereof from it, for the reason, among other reasons, that other creditors or interested parties would file exceptions for the mere purpose of delay, and so as to secure reductions by crediting collections made from collaterals during the delay. Somewhat similar provisions are set forth in the administration act (Rev. Stat. 1893, chap. 8, § 60) in regard to the proof of claims against the estates of deceased debtors, where, when the claimant produces his claim in writing, and swears to its correctness, it will be allowed by the court if no objection is made; but, if objection is made by the administrator, widow, heirs, "or others interested in said estate," other evidence must be produced before allowance.

There is a conflict among the authorities as to the time when payments on collateral securities or money realized from collateral securities, should be applied; so as to operate as a reduction of a claim on which dividends are to be paid. The relation of debt and credit, for the purpose of distribution, is fixed by the decisions at three different periods, respectively: First, the time of making the assignment, or adjudication of bankruptcy, or death of the insolvent; second, time of filing proof of claim; third, time of dividend or distribution. The precise question here involved did not arise and was not considered in the case of Re Bates, 118 Ill. 524, 59 Am. Rep. 383. In that case a creditor holding notes secured by a mortgage, executed by the debtor upon his own property, filed her notes as a claim in the county court against the insolvent estate of the debtor who had made an assignment for the benefit of creditors. The claim, as evidenced by the notes, was reported by the assignee, and no exceptions were filed to it. Nothing had been realized upon the mortgage security when the claim was filed and proved. The question there was whether the creditor was entitled to a dividend upon the whole amount of her claim as filed and proved, or whether the value of the mortgage security should be deducted from the amount of the claim, and the dividend should be allowed upon the difference only; and it was held that the creditor was entitled to a dividend upon the claim in full, without deducting the value of the security. In other words, the Bates Case declined to follow the rule known as the bankruptcy rule. That rule requires the creditor to give up his security, in order to be entitled to prove his whole debt, or, if he retains it, to prove only for the balance of the debt after deducting the value of the security held. This rule has its foundation in statutory enactments. It has not been uniformly applied in distributions under general assignments, or under state insolvent laws. The preponderance of authority is in favor of the view that the creditor has the right to prove and have dividends upon his entire debt irrespective of the collateral security; and, as an authority for this general view, the doctrine of the Bates Case has been indorsed in the following cases: People v. Remington, 131 N. Y. 328, 8 L. R. A. 458; Re Meyer, 78 Wis. 615, 11 L. R. A. 841; Allen v. Danielson, 15 R. I. 480; Chemical Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 8 C. C. A. 155, 59 Fed. Rep. 878, 23 L. R. A. 231, 16 U. S. App. 465; Tod v. Kentucky Union Land Co. 57 Fed. Rep. 47; People v. Remington, 54 Hun, 505. See also Lewis v. United States, 92 U. S. 618, 23 L. ed. 513; Bishop, Insolvent Debtors, § 427. But the question still remains, whether the entire debt upon which the dividend may be declared is the debt as it exists at the date of the assignment, or at the time of filing proof of the claim, or at the time of the distribution. The theory that the creditor is only entitled to share pro rata upon his debt as it exists at the time of distribution requires his claim to be reduced by the collections realized from his collaterals before the declaration of each dividend, and after his claim has been proved and allowed. This seems to be the rule in Maryland, but is not generally accepted as correct. We are not inclined to adopt it. It is not contended for, as we understand it, by either counsel in the case at bar. It is opposed to the decision in Furness v. Union Nat. Bank, supra. Its enforcement would require a readjustment of the basis of distribution at the time of declaring each dividend, whereas there should be a fixed sum as a basis for representation in the declaration of dividends, and as a measure of the creditor's right and interest in the assets of the insolvent estate. The theory that the creditor is entitled to dividends upon his claim as it exists at the date of the assignment, without reference to collections on collaterals thereafter, is founded on the doctrine that, by the deed of assignment, each creditor is an equitable owner in the assigned estate to the extent of the claim held by him when the assignment is made. But, under recent decisions of this court, construing the assignment act of this state, it cannot be said that each creditor acquires a fixed, equitable ownership in the assigned estate at the time of the assignment. If such were the fact, such interest could not be taken away from him by an act of the legislature. A legislative enactment which transfers the property of one man to another without his consent is not a constitutional exercise of legislative power, because, if effectual, it operates to deprive a man of his property without "due process of law." Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140, 40 Am. Dec. 274; Rohn v. Harris, 130 Ill. 525; Ervine's Appeal, 16 Pa. 256, 55 Am. Dec. 499; Hoke v. Henderson, 4 Dev. L. 1, 25 Am. Dec. 677. But the case of Hove v. Warren, 154 Ill. 237, holds that, under section 15 of the assignment act, the assignment may be revoked by the assent of a majority in number and amount of the creditors who may have proved their claims in accordance with the provisions of the act, irrespective of the wishes of the minority, and that the effect of the discontinuance provided for by that section is to destroy the trust upon which the property was held. This being so, each creditor does not have a fixed ownership in the assigned estate at the date of the assignment; and the reason for fixing upon the amount of the claim held by him at that date as the basis for the distribution of dividends is without force in this state, however it may be elsewhere. The provisions of the assignment act would seem to lead to the conclusion that the revocable interest of each creditor in the assigned estate only vests in him when he signifies his assent to the assignment by filing his claim with the assignee. Gibson v. Rees, 50 Ill. 388; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 994; 2 Lewin, Tr. 515. This appears from the provisions requiring the creditor to present his claim within a specified time, and from the further provision that creditors who do not exhibit their claims within three months from the publication of the notice shall not participate in the dividends until after the payment in full of all claims presented within said time and allowed by the court. 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 1806, § 10. The object of the latter provision is to fix a time at which the estate of the assignor shall be placed in process of final settlement, and after which distributions may be made without risk of uncertainty arising from the allowance of subsequently presented claims. The reason of the provision is the same as that requiring creditors of deceased persons to exhibit claims within two years after the grant of letters of administration. Suppiger v. Seydt, 23 Ill. App. 468.

Whatever may be the fact in other jurisdictions, it cannot be known here whether the creditor intends to participate in the distribution of the assets of the assigned estate, under the orders of the county court, until he manifests his assent by filing his claim under oath. As his interest in the estate cannot be said to accrue until he does so file his claim, it is the amount of his claim at that date which should be taken as the basis of representation in future dividends, irrespective of collections from collateral securities after that date. The learned judge who wrote the exhaustive opinion in Chemical Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, supra, states that there is no logical basis for any distinction between the effect of collections made from collaterals after insolvency and before filing proof, and of those made after filing proof. We are unable to concur in the view that there is no logical basis for such distinction. Even in the Armstrong Case, the opinion, after stating that the great weight of authority in England and in this country is strongly opposed to the view that a creditor with collaterals shall be thereby deprived of the right to prove for his full claim against an insolvent estate, and after referring to numerous authorities sustaining such view, says: "The exact point which is common to all the foregoing authorities, and which they all sustain, is that a creditor who has proved his claim against an insolvent estate under administration can collect his dividends without any deduction from his claim as proven, for collections made from collateral after his proof of claim is filed." And, after expressing the view (which, for the reasons already stated, cannot prevail in this state, that such deduction should be made from the claim as it exists at the date of the assignment, subject always to the limitation that the amount to be received from all sources shall not exceed the original debt and interest, the opinion further proceeds as follows: "The cases we have already cited fully confirm the foregoing view as to credits after the filing of the proof of claim;" that is to say, that no collections made from collaterals after the filing of the proof of claim shall be applied to reduce the amount of the claim as so filed. This we regard as the correct rule; and it is sustained by the English authorities. In Kellock's Case, L. R. 8 Ch. 769, the court of chancery appeals adopted the rule that collections on collaterals before filing proofs of claim in proceedings to wind up an insolvent company should be deducted, but that subsequent collections should not be deducted. In that case Lord Justice Wood said: "There remains the question as to the time with reference to which the amount provable is to be ascertained; and as to this there is a little more difficulty. I think, however, that the true rule is, that the debt is to be taken as it stands at the time when the claim is put in. . . . Where the demand of the creditor was large, and the securities held by him considerable, the official liquidator might dispute the claim for the very purpose of obliging the creditor to realize some of his securities before the time for making his affidavit arrived. . . . It appears to me that it would be leaving a great deal too much open to the caprice or arbitrary discretion of the liquidator if we were to fix upon any time except the time when the claim which is to be adjudicated upon was sent in." In the same case Lord Justice Selwyn also said: "I think, therefore, that the balance of convenience and inconvenience inclines strongly to the view which my learned brother has expressed, which is, that the debt is to be taken as it stood when the creditor sent in his claim." In Re Barnard's Bkq. Co., Fortwood's Claim, L. R. 5 Ch. 18, it was held—First, that the rule in bankruptcy, as to proof by secured creditors, does not apply in the winding up of insolvent estates, but that the rule that a creditor holding security may, if he chooses, prove for the whole of his debt and retain his security, does apply; second, that the time when the claim is put in is the date after which the creditor may realize his security, and not be bound to give credit for the proceeds of the realization. It was also there held that the putting in of the claim in winding-up cases is "equivalent to the proof against a testator's estate where an affidavit is made." To the same effect is Ex parte Bank of England, 39 L. J. Ch. 769. In Eastman v. Bank of Montreal, 10 Ont. Rep. 79, after approving of the rule in chancery that the creditor is entitled to prove for the whole amount of his debt and to take a dividend upon the whole without prejudice to his rights against securities he may hold, and after stating that "to hold otherwise would be virtually to deprive the secured creditor of any advantage from his security," the court adopts the rule in Kellock's Case, as above stated, and says: "The state of the accounts at the time the claim is put in is that which forms the basis of the dividend sheet. . . . Any moneys received prior to that from collaterals are to be credited. Those received after that from such sources need not be taken into account, unless they, with the dividend as to that part of the claim to which such securities are referable, bring up the amount received by the creditor to 100 cents on the dollar." In Fottrell v. Kavanagh, 10 Ir. Eq. Rep. 256, the doctrine and the rule are thus clearly stated by the vice chancellor: "The question . . . is whether the plaintiff, who is a mortgagee of certain lands of the deceased whose assets are under administration, can be admitted to prove as a creditor against the general assets on foot of his mortgages, and to be paid ratably with the other creditors upon the full amount of his debt, or whether he must first realize as much as he can out of the premises comprised in his mortgages, and claim only upon the balance then remaining unpaid. It is the right of a mortgagee in this court [court of chancery] to proceed for the recovery of his debt upon all, or one or more, of his securities, and either simultaneously, or in any order he thinks fit.

Accordingly, it is now settled that the rule in bankruptcy does not prevail in this court, and that a mortgagee may prove in an administration suit, or a proceeding for winding up under the companies' acts, for the full amount of his debt, realize what he can in any such proceeding, and afterwards resort to the premises mortgaged to him to obtain payment of any deficiency. . . . I shall therefore rule that the plaintiff is entitled to prove his claim for the full amount against the general assets without being bound first to realize his mortgage securities. The time at which the plaintiff's debt is to be ascertained is, as settled by Kellock's Case, that at which his claim was brought in under the posting for creditors. I shall therefore direct that the amount due to the plaintiff be ascertained as of that date, and in doing so he must be charged with all sums theretofore received by him, whether out of the mortgaged premises or otherwise, but not with any sums subsequently received. On this sum he will be entitled to a ratable dividend, the estate being insolvent." To the same effect are Ex parte Wildman, 1 Atk. 109; Re Hamilton, 1 Fed. Rep. 800; Sohier v. Loring, 6 Cush. 537; Re Hicks, 19 N. B. R. 299, Fed. Cas. No. 6,456; Re Meyer, 78 Wis. 615, 11 L. R. A. 841.

Our conclusion is that the amount upon which the secured creditor is entitled to receive dividends from the assets of the insolvent estate is the amount actually due to the creditor when he files his proof of claim or presents his claim under oath; that the subsequent hearing upon objections or exceptions should be directed to the inquiry as to what was due at that date; that the amount due at that date is to be ascertained by the deduction from the principal debt of all payments made before that date, whether realized from collaterals or otherwise, but that amounts realized from collaterals after that date are not to be deducted; subject always to the qualification that the dividends received from the general assets and the amounts realized from the collateral security shall not together exceed the amount due the creditor upon his claim. It follows that the county court erred in not deducting from appellee's claim the amounts collected from the collateral notes prior to the day on which the proof of claim was filed, to wit, September 9, 1893. We are, however, unable to concur in the contention of appellants that payments collected upon the collateral notes after that date should be deducted in fixing the allowance to be awarded to appellee as a basis for the declaration of dividends. In regard to the payment made on September 9, 1893, the burden of proof was upon the party excepting to the claim as filed to show what payments were made, as the fact of payment is matter of defense. Although the law will look into the fractions of a day when it becomes important to the ends of justice to do so, or in order to decide upon conflicting interests, yet the general rule is that the law knows no fractions of a day. Grosvenor v. Magill, 37 Ill. 289. The effect is to render a day a sort of indivisible point, so that any act done in the compass of it is no more referable to any one portion of it than to any other portion of it; and where two acts are done upon the same day, they will, as a general thing, be regarded in law as done at the same time. It follows that, where a case turns on the question as to which of two things was done first, the party having the burden of proof fails in merely showing that both were done on the same day. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 89-91, and cases in notes. Hence, the appellant has not shown that the payment made on September 9, 1893, was made before the filing of the proof of claim on that day, and consequently such payment should not be deducted.

A motion is made by appellee to dismiss the appeal. The motion is overruled. The appeal was properly taken from the county court to the appellate court upon the authority of Union Trust Co. v. Trumbull, 137 Ill. 146, and Heinzelman Bros. v. Schrader, 150 Ill. 227.

The judgments of the Appellate Court and the County Court are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the latter court for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

William McGUIRE, Resp't.,

v.

Marcellus BROWN, App't.

1. The prior appropriator of water has no right to enter upon the homestead

NOTE.—Change of use or channel of water appropriated.

The limitation upon the right of an appropriator of water upon the public domain to change the 80 L. R. A.

claim of a settler for the purpose of materially changing the point of diversion and constructing new waterways through the land, although the settler has not made final proof of residence and cultivation or obtained a patent to the land, but has made an entry and has actual possession.

2. The privilege of changing the point place or manner of use of the water seems to be simply that he must not by so doing prejudice other rights which have been acquired subsequently to the acquisition of his rights. Subject to of diversion of water to which a right has been obtained by prior appropriation under Civ. Code, § 1412, does not extend to materially changing the point of diversion and making new ditches on land lawfully held under a homestead claim.

3. The provision in the act of Congress of July 26, 1866, that a party committing injury or damage, in the construction of a ditch or canal, to the possession of any settler on the public domain, shall be liable to the party injured, does not grant any rights to enter on the possession of a homestead claimant for the purpose of materially changing the point of diversion of water already appropriated.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Ventura County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin defendant from interfering with certain alleged water rights of the complainant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. H. L. Poplin, for appellant:

As soon as the land was entered as a homestead and the certificate of such entry was executed and delivered, the equitable title vested in the homesteader, and attached to the land, and was absolute as against every person except the United States, and absolute against the government dependent only on his complying with the requirements of the laws relative to homesteads.

Sturr v. Beck, 138 U. S. 541, 88 L. ed. 761.

In no just sense can lands be said to be public lands after they have been entered at the land office and a certificate of entry obtained.

Witherspoon v. Duncan, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 310, 18 L. ed. 339.

Entry means that act by which an individual acquires an inceptive right to a portion of the unappropriated soil of the country by filing his claim.

Ohotard v. Pope, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 586, 6 L. ed. 787; Shepley v. Qwan, 91 U. S. 330, 23 L. ed. 424; Farley v. Spring Valley Min. & I. Co. 58 Cal. 143; Western P. R. Co. v. Tevis, 41 Cal. 489; Hutton v. Frisbie, 87 Cal. 476.

An appropriator may change the place of diversion if no one be injured by such change.

Ramelli v. Irish, 96 Cal. 217; Jacob v. Lorens, 96 Cal. 840.

But in the case at bar it would diminish the amount defendant is entitled to, both as a riparian proprietor and as an appropriator; and such damage is clearly within the provision of § 1412, Civil Code, "when others are not injured by such change," and within the equity and right of defendant to the relief demanded in this action.

such limitation, the point of diversion and manner of use may be changed. Middle Creek Ditch Co. v. Henry, 15 Mont. 558; Junkans v. Bergin, 67 Cal. 207.

An appropriator can extend his ditch at any time and use the water to the extent of his appropriation at any other point for the same or a different purpose. Woolman v. Garringer, 1 Mont. 585.

After the claim for which the water was appropriated has been worked out the ditch may be

Messrs. W. E. Shepherd and Orestes Orr, for respondent:

In so far as the construction of the new ditch is concerned, Crawford under the United States statute might do this, and the measure of relief to which Brown was bound was the compensation for any damage he might suffer by way of injury to his possession.

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2339; Knoth v. Barclay, 8 Colo. 300.

The fact that he used it upon lands riparian to the stream did not lessen his rights, and the rights of the defendant, a subsequent settler upon the land and appropriator of the water of the stream, were subject to plaintiff's rights to such water.

South Yuba Water & Min. Co. v. Rosa, 80 Cal. 333; Burrows v. Burrows, 82 Cal. 564; Ramelli v. Irish, 96 Cal. 214.

Britt, C., filed the following opinion:

The controversy which resulted in this action arose between plaintiff and defendant concerning the right to the use of water flowing in Cuyama creek, in the county of Ventura. One W. A. Dorn was permitted to intervene, he asserting an interest in the water superior to that of both the original parties; but, as the court below found against his pretensions, and dismissed his complaint "without prejudice," and he has not appealed, his claims are eliminated from the case.

It appears from the record that in January, 1885, one Beekman took possession of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of a certain section 20, the same being unappropriated lands of the United States, and shortly afterwards filed his declaratory statement as a pre-emption claimant thereon, paid the purchase price, and obtained the receiver's final receipt some time in the year 1886, and in June, 1891, the United States patent for the same was issued to him. At the time Beekman entered upon said land there was a ditch thereon, constructed by a former occupant, leading from a point on Cuyama creek, within the boundaries of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 20, and thence westerly across a part of such N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and upon said N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, by means of which ditch water was diverted from said creek, and made to flow upon the latter quar-extended and the water used at other points. Davis v. Gale, 33 Cal. 26, 91 Am. Dec. 554.

The original appropriator may construct a new ditch if the amount which it carries is not greater than the amount originally appropriated. Higgins v. Barker, 42 Cal. 233.

The first appropriator may change the place of diversion, or the place where the water is used, or the use to which it was first applied, if others are not injured by the change. Ramelli v. Irish, 96

ter section. This ditch was repaired by Beekman in the spring of 1885, and was thenceforward used by him to divert said water for irrigation and other purposes on his said land,—it having a capacity, the court finds, of 90 inches, which was filled when the creek afforded sufficient water, and exhausted the flow of the creek at the point of diversion when the supply was less than that amount.

In December, 1888, Beekman conveyed the land covered by his pre-emption claim,—said N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 20,—together with its appurtenances, to one Crawford, who entered into possession. Crawford then, in May, 1889, changed the point of diversion of the ditch to a place about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile farther up the creek, eastward from the head of the old ditch, and dug a new ditch across the said N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, and upon the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 20, connecting with the old ditch near the west line of said N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$. The new ditch had a capacity of 90 inches, as the court also found, and was used by Crawford on his lands from 1889 to 1891, inclusive, for the same purposes that the former ditch had been used by Beekman. January 20, 1892, Crawford conveyed to plaintiff by deed of grant said N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 20, together with all water rights possessed or acquired by the grantor "either by use, purchase, or appropriation." But in August, 1888, Brown, the defendant and appellant, a person qualified to acquire land under the homestead laws, settled upon said N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 20, it being then public land of the United States, and in October of the same year he filed his homestead application therefor in the proper land office, paying the fees of the receiver upon such entry and obtaining his receipt therefor. Ever since his settlement he has resided on the land, cultivating and improving considerable portions of it, but has not made final proof, nor received a patent for the same. When Crawford constructed the new ditch across defendant's homestead claim in 1889, defendant was temporarily absent therefrom, and gave no consent to the change; but on his return, soon afterwards, he made no complaint or claim of damage, and permitted the use thereof by Crawford and his successor, the plaintiff, until the month of October, 1892, when he filled up such new ditch at a point on his homestead claim, and stopped the further flow of the water, and by force prevented plaintiff from repairing the ditch. In November, 1889, defendant constructed a ditch tapping Reyes creek, a tributary of said Cuyama creek, on land in section 16, belonging to the state of California, at or near the point of confluence of the two streams, about $\frac{1}{4}$ mile above the head of the new ditch dug by Crawford in May of the same year, and thence leading to his (defendant's) homestead claim, said N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 20. By means of this ditch defendant diverted water from Reyes creek during the years 1890, 1891, and 1892, and used the same for irrigation and other purposes on his claim, not interfering with the flow of water to plaintiff's ditch during the first two of those years, but increasing the amount diverted during 1892 so as to materially lessen the quantity descending to plaintiff. Plaintiff then, in September, 1892, filled up defendant's ditch on said section 16, so that no water could pass into it from the creek. All the lands above mentioned lie in the same township and range, and are riparian to Cuyama creek.

Plaintiff commenced this action May 4, 1898, to restrain defendant from interfering with the ditch and water rights acquired by plaintiff from Crawford, and for damages. Defendant answered, and also filed a cross complaint, setting up his claims to the water and to damages for plaintiff's invasion of his rights, and praying that plaintiff be restrained from interference with his use of the water, etc. After trial, the court rendered judgment determining that plaintiff has the paramount right to 90 inches of the water in Cuyama creek for all useful and beneficial purposes, to be diverted through the ditch constructed by Crawford in 1889, and is the owner of such ditch, with the right to maintain it across the homestead claim of appellant, and enjoining defendant from disturbing plaintiff's enjoyment of such rights. Also that defendant is entitled to take 90 inches of water flowing at the head of his ditch in section 16 so long as the diversion of that quantity does not reduce the flow at the head of plaintiff's ditch below the same amount; that defendant has the right to maintain and use his said ditch to convey the water to which he is so entitled, and plaintiff is restrained from interference therewith. Plaintiff is awarded the entire flow of water at and above the head of the Crawford (new) ditch when the quantity falls below 90 inches; also judgment for nominal damages and his costs.

1. The first and most important question arising on this record relates to the right of Crawford, plaintiff's predecessor in interest, to enter upon the land claimed by and in the possession of defendant, and, in the exercise of the right to change the point of diversion, there construct a new aqueduct, and lead the water through the same. For, if he had not the right to effect the change in this manner, then the defendant was not in the wrong when he obstructed the flow of the water in the new ditch, and the judgment restraining him in that behalf, and establishing the right of plaintiff "to have, maintain, keep, and use" such new ditch for diverting and conveying the water upon his (plaintiff's) land is erroneous. The claim that Crawford, the former ditch owner, was justified in shifting the point of diversion and the line of his ditch in the manner here disclosed is based mainly on the familiar provisions of the legislation of Congress (U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 2339, 2340)* concerning the rights of appropriators of water on the public lands, and the saving of those rights in patents for such lands granted by the government; on section 1412 of the Civil Code of this state: "The person entitled to the use may change the place of diversion if others are not injured by such change;" and on certain cases in this court, which will be noticed farther on.

We do not think that the right of the settler under the Federal homestead laws on public land through which water flows is of the unsubstantial character which the contention of the respondent implies. Of course, if a valid appropriation of the water, whether on the particular tract or off it, has been made, the settler must take the land subject to that qualification of his right and of the title which he may ultimately acquire; but it should not be held that such qualification involves the indefinite extension of the right of the prior appropriator, unless the law is thus plainly written. It is of the highest importance to the bona fide settler on riparian lands to know the extent to which he must subordinate his claims to those of prior appropriators of the water; to know, in short, what easements and servitudes his land is subject to in favor of the previous appropriation. Has the prior appropriator license to enter upon the homestead claim of such a settler for the purpose of materially changing thereon the point of diversion and constructing new waterways through the land? Is such a license among the servitudes to which the land must be submitted? We think not. "In no just sense can lands be said to be public lands after they have been entered at the land office, and a certificate of entry obtained. If public lands before the entry, after it they are private property." Witherspoon v. Duncan, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 218, 18 L. ed. 342. The term "entry," as applied to appropriations of land within the scope of the language just quoted, has been held to mean "that act by which an individual acquires an inceptive right to a portion of the unappropriated soil of the country by filing his claim." Sturr v. Beck, 183 U. S. 547-549, 38 L. ed. 764; citing Chotard v. Pope, 25 U. S. 13 Wheat. 588, 6 L. ed. 788; Hastings & D. R. Co. v. Whitney, 182 U. S. 357, 33 L. ed. 363. It appears from the evidence in this case that on (October 23, 1888, the defendant made entry (within the meaning of the authorities referred to) of the land in question in the proper United States land office, and that his entry remains intact.

Crawford, a witness for plaintiff, testified: "When I went there in 1883, Brown was on the northeast $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 20, and, I think, had a house. . . . When I made the change in my ditch, Mr. Brown was in possession of his land. We had a fence between us, so I ran with my new ditch through his fence." Here was an entry, and here was an actual possession of the land by defendant. In course of time, and on compliance with the law relative to continuous residence and cultivation, he will be entitled to a patent which will invest him with the legal title. Now, it cannot be that, pending proceedings for the consummation of his interest thus initiated, any other person may rightfully invade his possession for the purpose of making an original appropriation of water, and so possibly divesting the land of its chief element of value, any more than for the purpose of cutting off its timber or committing other trespass. This proposition is substantially adjudged in Sturr v. Beck, 183 U. S. 541, 38 L. ed. 761, where the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the doctrine that the plaintiff in that case had "no right to enter upon the prior possession of the defendant under his homestead entry for the purpose of appropriating any portion of the running streams and creeks thereon." But what is the difference in the legal wrong to the defendant between an entry on his homestead, with a view to appropriating for the first time the water there flowing, and an entry having for its object the material shifting of the place of a previous diversion, and the construction by changes in the bed of the stream it has become impossible to obtain the original quantity of water through the ditch without raising the dam. Nevada Water Co. v. Powell, 34 Cal. 109, 91 Am. Dec. 685.

*Sec. 2339. The point of diversion cannot be changed so as to cut off the flow to a mill which has been established after the first appropriation. Columbia Min. Co. v. Holter, 1 Mont. 296.

An appropriator cannot control the surplus that was not originally appropriated by him. Edgar v. Stevenson, 70 Cal. 226.

If the appropriation is for a certain ranch, whatever is not wanted for irrigation and household purposes thereon may be appropriated by another person, and the first appropriator cannot after-of new waterways to make the diversion effectual? Either purpose, if carried out, must interrupt the quiet of his enjoyment, and deprive him of the use and control of some portion of his property.

If it be said that by the 9th section of the act of Congress of July 26, 1866, now embodied in section 2839 of the Revised Statutes of the United States vested and accrued rights to the use of water for beneficial purposes, acquired by priority of possession thereof on the public lands, are to be maintained and protected as against homestead settlers on those lands, and that the right of way for the construction of ditches for such purposes is acknowledged so long as they are in any sense "public lands," and before a patent has issued for the same, and hence that defendant took up his land subject to those reservations in favor of the prior appropriator, and the consequent right of the latter to change his system of works at will, it may be replied—Firstly. That the argument, if good for anything, proves too much; for by the terms of section 2840 of the Revised Statutes of the United States,—a re-enactment of section 17 of the act of July 9, 1870, upon this subject,—the same exceptions and reservations are declared to qualify all patents granted as well as all homesteads allowed; so that the right of the prior appropriator of the water to make such use of the land of the homestead claimant would not cease with the issue of a patent to the latter, but must continue indefinitely,—a result which even the cases relied on by respondent discountenance. Osgood v. El Dorado Water & D. G. Min. Co. 58 Cal. 571; Farley v. Spring Valley Min. & I. Co. 58 Cal. 142. Secondly. It is only "vested and accrued" rights to the use of water which are reserved by the operation of the acts of Congress above referred to from the interest that without those provisions would vest in the homestead claimant; and the only vested and accrued right which Crawford had in the land at the time defendant made his homestead entry was the right to the continued flow of the water into his existing canal to the extent of his prior appropriation, including, of course, the right to maintain and improve such canal. True, he had the privilege of changing the point of diversion if he could do so without injury to others (Civ. Code, § 1412; Ramelli v. Irish, 96 Cal. 217); but such privilege is a different thing from the "vested and accrued" right to the use of the water. It is not a part of that right; and the condition upon which it can be exercised to any material extent becomes impossible when another person has made a lawful settlement on the land affected, and is proceeding in good faith under the homestead laws to perfect his title,—impossible, that is, without the consent of such settler. This court, speaking through Mr. Justice Harrison, said recently: "That section [U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2839] does not confer the right to enter upon lands in the possession of another for the purpose of securing the water thereon, or of completing an attempted diversion of water, even though the person seeking so to enter had at some previous time manifested his intention to secure a water right thereon." Taylor v. Abbott, 108 Cal. 424. As little does it, in our opinion, confer the right to enter upon the possession of another for the purpose of materially changing the point of diversion of water already appropriated; certainly not for the purpose of constructing new aqueducts where none existed before.

By the terms of the proviso found in section 9 of said act of July, 1866, it is declared "that whenever after the passage of this act any person or persons shall, in the construction of any ditch or canal, injure or damage the possession of any settler on the public domain, the party committing such injury or damage shall be liable to the party injured for such injury or damage;" and respondent claims that such provision authorized the construction of the new ditch by plaintiff's predecessor, and that defendant's right is limited to compensation for the damage therein mentioned. This is not the proper construction of the proviso. It does not grant rights of way where none existed before, nor confer additional rights upon owners of ditches subsequently constructed. Jennison v. Kirk, 98 U. S. 460, 25 L. ed. 243; Robertson v. Smith, 1 Mont. 411.

Does the fact that defendant has not made final proof of residence and cultivation, or obtained a patent, affect the case? In Sturr v. Beck, supra, the court quotes with approval this language of Attorney General MacVeagh in an opinion rendered by him in 1891: "Upon the entry the right in favor of the settler would seem to attach to the land, which is liable to be defeated only by failure on his part to comply with the requirements of the homestead law in regard to settlement and cultivation. This right amounts to an equitable interest in the land subject to the future performance by the settler of certain conditions (in the event of which he becomes invested with full and complete ownership); and until forfeited by failure to perform the conditions, it must prevail, not only against individuals, but against the government." And in the course of the same decision the court says further: "When, however, the government ceases to be the sole proprietor, the right of the riparian owner attaches, and can-wards increase his use so as to deprive the latter of the benefit of his appropriation. Byrne v. Crafts, 78 Cal. 641.

The first appropriator has a right to all water appropriated by him as against subsequent appropriators, and has a right to erect dams and divert water before any subsequent appropriation, but not to make any new dams or diversion of water after a subsequent appropriation. Lobdell v. Simpson, 2 Nev. 274, 40 Am. Dec. 537.

cannot afterwards change or extend his use to the prejudice of the other. Proctor v. Jennings, 6 Nev. 83, 3 Am. Rep. 240.

Where a person has acquired by appropriation a limited right of diversion of water and has lost further claim to an appropriation by failure to complete his work within a reasonable time, he cannot increase the amount of his diversion thereafter to correspond with his notice of appropriation to the prejudice of the rights of a riparian owner. Conkling v. Pacific Imp. Co. 5 Cal. 296.

The appropriator of water to be used at a speci-not be subsequently invaded. As . . . no subsequent attempt to take the water only can override the prior appropriation of both land and water, it would seem reasonable that lawful riparian occupancy with intent to appropriate the land should have the same effect." 133 U. S. 549, 551, 33 L. ed. 764. We see no reason to hold that defendant's rights for the purposes of this case would have been enlarged by the issue of a patent to him. How could they have been augmented by that means in view of the provision (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2340) that such a patent must be subject to all "vested and accrued" water rights? It must be remembered that the appropriator is not the owner of the "very body of the water" until it passes into the appliances he has provided for its reception. Before he is thus possessed of it he has a mere right to its continued flow, so that he may impound it; but the stream itself, flowing in its natural course, is a part of the land over which it flows. Parks Canal & Min. Co. v. Hoyt, 57 Cal. 46; Nevada County & P. Canal Co. v. Kidd, 37 Cal. 310, 311. And it follows that, after the land where the diversion is made has ceased, by reason of a lawful private appropriation thereof, to be public land, and passed into private occupancy, the occupant of the land—in this case the homestead claimant—is the owner of the stream, in the same sense that he is the owner of the land, until it comes into the possession of the appropriator, and may justly repel any attempt to interfere with such ownership at any place except that where the diversion was effected when his rights to the land attached. Nor is this necessarily a mere empty abstract right. The stream may add beauty to the landscape, or afford valuable fishing privileges, or furnish useful mechanical power, any of which elements of value would be liable to destruction if the prior appropriator may remove his point of diversion wheresoever he will after the inception of private title to the land in another person.

Our conclusion is supported by analogy, also, with the rule for many years enforced both in the Federal courts and in the courts of this state, that the right of property which the laws of Congress allow to be acquired on the public domain shall not be initiated by trespass and intrusion on the actual possession of a prior occupant. McBrown v. Morris, 59 Cal. 64; Goodwin v. McCabe, 75 Cal. 588, and cases cited. In McBrown v. Morris this court, quoting with approval the language of Mr. Justice Miller in Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 513, 24 L. ed. 733, concerning the acquisition of pre-emption rights, said: "The right to make a settlement was to be exercised on unsettled land. . . . It had reference to vacant land, to unimproved land; and it would have shocked the moral sense of the men who passed these laws, if they had supposed that they had extended an invitation to the pioneer population to acquire inchoate rights to the public lands by trespass, by violence, by robbery, by acts leading to homicides, and other crimes of less moral turpitude." We regard this just and forcible statement as equally cogent in the present case. The new ditch over defendant's claim, established as a legal right of plaintiff by the judgment appealed from, was constructed in virtue of an intrusion on defendant's possession during the latter's temporary absence from his home, and through artificial barriers erected by him. Such acts, if tolerated at all, must certainly tend to the promotion of the evils prefigured in the language of the court just cited.

We have treated this subject somewhat at large because of its practical importance in the constantly expanding scheme of water development in this state, and because the result at which we have arrived seems to be at variance with parts of the argument, at least, on which rest some former decisions of this court (Osgood v. El Dorado Water & D. G. Min. Co. 56 Cal. 571; Farley v. Spring Valley Min. & I. Co. 58 Cal. 142), in so far as those cases seem to hold that, by reason of the legislation of Congress, the interest of the settler on government land with respect to appropriators of water on land claimed by him must be held to attach only at the time of the issuance of his patent, or at the earliest when he makes final proof and payment. The judgments announced in those cases may have been correct on their special facts. We do not pass on that question. But to the extent that they must find support in the proposition that the interest of a settler on the public lands under the pre-emption or homestead laws attaches as against the appropriators of water rights on his tract only as of the time of his final proof or obtaining a patent, they appear to be in conflict with the decision of the Federal supreme court in Sturr v. Beck, 133 U. S. 541, 552, 33 L. ed. 761-765; and the views of that court, as those of the tribunal of last resort in cases of this impression, must, of course, prevail. See also Faull v. Cooke, 19 Or. 455; Black's Pom. Water Rights, §§ 40-42; Kinney, Irrigation, §§ 212-220. It follows that the defendant had the right to obstruct the flow of water across his claim in plaintiff's new ditch, and the court below erred in restraining him from so doing. And, since the plaintiff insisted on taking and did take fixed place for the purpose of operating machinery and other works after so using and returning it to its original channel cannot change the place of use to the damage of a subsequent appropriator lower down on the stream. Last Chance Min. Co. v. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & C. Co. 40 Fed. Rep. 480.

But it has been held that one who acquires the privilege of using the waste water of a prior appropriator can be deprived of the same at any time unless the water has been returned to the original channel without any intention of recapture. Woolman v. Garringer, 1 Mont. 535.

Priority not lost by change.

The question of abandonment of water rights in general is treated in the note to Hewitt v. Story, ante, 265, but it may be stated here that a mere change in the use of the water from one mining locality to another does not forfeit the right. Maeris v. Bicknell, 7 Cal. 261, 68 Am. Dec. 257.

A different use of the water subsequently to its appropriation does not affect the right; that is subject to the same limitations whatever the use. Atchison v. Peterson, 37 U. S. 20 Wall. 507, 22 L. ed. 414.

the water by means and at a place unwarranted by his rights as a prior appropriator, it results further that the defendant, as entitled to the flow of the water after supplying the lawful requirements only of the plaintiff, had the right to use the same, and should recover the damages, if any, which he sustained by reason of the destruction of his dam and the filling of his ditch by plaintiff, and his consequent deprivation of the water.

2. But the plaintiff had the prior right to the use of the water to the extent of the appropriation made by his predecessors, Beekman and Crawford, through the old ditch, prior to defendant's settlement, together with the right to maintain such ditch. Brown's claims as a homestead settler were subordinate to those interests, and his land was subject to a servitude for the support of the same. De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397; Wells v. Mantee, 99 Cal. 588. It would be inflicting a severe penalty for the trespass committed by Crawford on the land of Brown, and the attempt to shift the location of the ditch, to hold that by that circumstance alone Crawford lost for himself and his successor, the plaintiff, all prior right to the flow of the water itself. He certainly did not intend to abandon his interest in the water. Whether he abandoned his property in the former ditch, and the right to lead water through the same, is a question which has not been argued here or apparently litigated below, and ought not to be now decided; but the parties should be allowed, if they so desire, to amend or supplement their pleadings, and to have determined in the trial court the issue just suggested, and any other necessary to the adjustment of their relative rights under the law as stated in this opinion. It seems to us doubtful whether the finding to the effect that the first ditch, after its repair by Beekman in 1885, was of a capacity to carry 90 inches of water, is sustained by the evidence in the record; but, as the question is not important to the present decision, we mention it merely that the parties may have the matter in mind if it should become of moment upon another trial. We recommend that the judgment against the defendant and the order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial and other proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion; both parties to the appeal having leave to amend their pleadings as they may be advised.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Searls, C.

The point of deviation and place of use may be changed without losing the right to priority where the rights of others are not injuriously affected. *Fuller v. Swan River Placer Min. A change in the point of diversion does not affect the priority provided the quantity of water diverted remains the same and no intervening appropriator is injured. Sieber v. Frink, 7 Colo. 148.

D. C. COOK et al., Resp'ts.

1. An appropriator of water upon the public domain acquires, under the confirmatory acts of Congress, no rights superior to the riparian rights which have attached to land held at the time of the appropriation in private ownership.
2. A riparian owner does not lose his right to the use of water for irrigating purposes by mere nonuser, as against a lower appropriator.
3. A riparian owner is not estopped to use the water for irrigating purposes by failing to object to the diversion of water by a lower appropriator.
4. An appropriator of water may change the place and purpose of use as against subsequent appropriators, so long as the water is used for proper objects and the change does not injuriously affect the rights of such other appropriators.
5. Although an appropriator of water upon government lands retains his right when the land passes into private ownership under 14 U. S. Stat. at L. 253, 16 U. S. Stat. at L. 218, and may change the point of diversion to another place, he cannot make such change arbitrarily, but only when required to enable him to take the amount of water to which he is entitled, and then, under Civ. Code, § 1412, only when others are not injured by the change.

Messrs. Chapman & Hendrick, Barnes & Selby, and Del Valle & Munday for respondents.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from the order granting a new trial. Plaintiffs claim ownership in common with some of the named defendants in a certain described ditch, flume, water right, and right of way, by means of which they diverted the waters of Piru river to their nonriparian lands. The ditch was known as the "Hargrave & Comfort Ditch." They averred the adverse claims of defendants, and asked for a decree settling their rights and enjoining defendants from further assertion of such or any claims. The defendants answered in accordance with their various claims; some asserting ownership in the ditch and water rights, others declaring upon superior rights by prescription. But in particular the defendant Cook claimed the rights of a riparian owner to the water of the creek, which rights are pleaded as superior to those of the ditch owners.

Stripped of matters unnecessary to this consideration, the following are the essential facts: Defendant Cook is the owner of the Temescal rancho under United States patent issued in 1871. Piru river flows through this ranch, and thence across the northwest quarter of section 20. About the year 1875, section 20 being public land of the United States, plaintiffs' predecessors in interest constructed the ditch, and diverted part of the waters of the river, with the acquiescence of the then occupant of the land; and, as the court found, plaintiffs and their grantors, "for more than fourteen years next preceding the commencement of this suit, have been in the quiet, peaceable, open, adverse, notorious, uninterrupted, and exclusive possession, claiming right and title of said water ditch, with the right to divert and use the waters of said Piru river to the extent of 271 inches, measured under 4-inch pressure." The court further found that the predecessors in interest of the defendant Cook in the Temescal rancho did not use any of the waters of said stream except at rare and irregular intervals, and in small quantities; and that they at all times knew that the said Hargrave & Comfort ditch was being continuously used, and that the waters of the stream were being diverted and conducted to lands not riparian to the stream; and that such use, "with their full knowledge and acquiescence," had been continuous for a period exceeding ten years before Cook acquired title to the Temescal rancho and the northwest quarter of section 20. Also it is found that when Cook acquired title he knew of the use of the water by defendants, and "did not object to such use, but fully acquiesced therein, until about the commencement of this suit; and that the rights of plaintiffs were not disputed until long after they had fully acquired a prescriptive right with their co-owners to a part of the waters of the said stream." The waters of Piru river had in the past been little used by the owners of the Temescal rancho but upon Cook's acquisition of it he began the planting of extensive orchards of fruit-bearing trees, until, as he pleads, there were at the commencement of the suit over two millions of orchard and nursery trees dependent upon the waters of the Piru river for irrigation. This use of the water by Cook naturally lessened the flow of the stream to plaintiffs' ditch, decreased the supply available for their purposes, and led to this action. The Piru Water Company, another of the defendants, took water from the Piru river by means of a ditch higher up the stream than the ditch of plaintiffs. Its ditch, at the time of the action, tapped the river upon the land of the Temescal rancho and carried the water over and across it to other nonriparian lands. Its right by prescription was claimed to be prior and superior to the right of the owners of the Hargrave & Comfort ditch, and this seems to have been conceded; though the precise extent of the right is a matter of controversy which will be considered hereafter.

The court, by its judgment and decree, awarded: (1) The right to Cook to use the waters flowing over the Temescal rancho for domestic uses and purposes and the watering of stock; (2) the right to Cook to 100 inches of water, under 4-inch pressure, drawn off in the Esperanza ditch; (3) the right to the Piru Water Company to an amount not in excess of 285 inches, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the uses accustomed to be made upon certain nonriparian lands; (4) the right to the owners of the Hargrave & Comfort ditch to an amount not in excess of 271 inches, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the uses accustomed to be made, and in accordance with the amounts by the owners respectively accustomed to be used, upon certain described nonriparian lands; and (5) the right to Cook, "after the wants and necessities of the above prior owners have been fully and reasonably supplied," to use the surplus waters for irrigation on the lands of his ranch. By this decree the right of an upper riparian owner to the use of the water for irrigating purposes is made subordinate to the right of a lower appropriator, because at the time the right of appropriation vested the riparian owner was not actually using the water for the designated purpose. This view, appellants contend, is sound. It is the view taken by the court upon trial and expressed by the judge in the following language: "I think the law is well settled in this state that a person diverting and appropriating to a useful purpose the waters of a running stream may acquire an ownership in the right to the use of such waters to the amount he has appropriated to such useful purpose, by operation of the statute of limitation, even against an upper riparian owner, although the point of diversion is without the limits of the lands of such riparian owner, except as against any lawful use to which the riparian owner had or was making of the waters during the time of the creation of the right in the appropriator by operation of statute of limitation." Upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial the court receded from this position, after the consideration of authorities not before called to its attention, and ordered a new trial. Other grounds were urged in support of the motion. Such of them as are deemed necessary will receive attention, but the principal point inviting consideration is the one above set forth.

The right of a riparian proprietor in or to the waters of a stream flowing through or along his land is not the right of ownership in or to those waters, but is a usufructuary right,—a right amongst others, to make a reasonable use of a reasonable quantity for irrigation, returning the surplus to the natural channel, that it may flow on in the accustomed mode to lands below. If his needs do not prompt him to make any use of them, he still has the right to have them flow onto and along and over his land in their usual way, excepting as the accustomed flow may be changed by the act of God, or as the amount of it may be decreased by the reasonable use of upper owners and riparian proprietors. But none of his rights to put the water to legitimate uses is lost by mere nonuser. His rights are not easements, nor appurtenances to his holding. They are not the rights acquired by appropriation or by prescriptive use. They are attached to the soil, and pass with it (Luz v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255), and may be lost only by grant, condemnation, or prescription. With any use or diversion of the water after it has passed his land the upper riparian proprietor, having no ownership in, and no longer any rights to, it, would have no concern. (The right to forbid the lower owner from backing the water and flooding his land not being here under consideration.) None of his rights would or could be impaired thereby, and without such an impairment he would be without injury, and, consequently, without cause for complaint or redress. "His right extends no further than the boundary of his own estate. He cannot complain of the mere fact of the diversion of the watercourse either above or below him, if, within the limits of his own property, it is allowed to follow its accustomed channel." Luz v. Haggin, supra. The Rancho Temescal was never public land, within the meaning of the United States statutes affecting appropriations of water. The riparian rights of the owners of private land are fully protected by section 1423 of the Civil Code. One who bases his right solely upon appropriation made of waters flowing over land which at the time of the appropriation was part of the public domain acquires thereby no right superior to or in derogation of those attaching to lands riparian to the same stream, which, at the time of the appropriation, were held in private ownership.

The "acquiescence" of Cook and his predecessors in interest in the acts of the owners of the Hargrave & Comfort ditch, as declared by the findings, receives this support from the evidence, and no more: With knowledge of these acts, they never attempted to interfere with them. But before one can acquire a right to the doing of an act in which another so acquiesces, the act itself must amount to an invasion of that other's rights, and the doing must either have been so long-continued as that a prescriptive claim can be supported upon the theory that the acquiescence presupposes a grant, or under such circumstances as will raise an estoppel against the objecting party. But, as the upper riparian proprietor's right to object to any use or diversion of the water below ceased when it had flowed past his boundary, any such use could not work an invasion of his rights, and he was not called upon to protest against it. Thus in Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 808, 10 Am. Rep. 299, the waters of a spring had been appropriated below by plaintiff. The time arrived when defendant, upon whose land the spring was situated, desired to make use of the waters which fed it. A prescriptive right in plaintiff was urged by reason of defendant's long acquiescence in the use, but this court said: "It will be seen at once that McCue, or those from whom he purchased, could, in the nature of things, have no right to complain that the water in the artificial channel, after leaving the spring, was appropriated below by the owners of the Hanson lot. If they had no right to complain in the first instance we are not driven to the presumption of the grant of an easement to account for why they did not complain." The same principle is announced in Lakeside Ditch Co. v. Orans, 80 Cal. 181, where a lower appropriator claimed a right to a certain amount of water against an appropriator whose ditch was higher up the stream. The finding was that plaintiff diverted his ditch full of water "whenever there was water in the stream to fill it," and a right superior and adverse to that of defendant was predicated upon this. But the court said: "If the plaintiff's ditch was simply diverting water which the defendants allowed to pass down the stream while the head-gate of their ditch was closed, the act of the plaintiff in diverting the water thus permitted to pass down the stream could not, in the nature of things, be adverse to the right of the defendants. The latter could not complain, and title by prescription cannot be acquired unless the acts constituting the adverse use are of such a nature as to give a cause of action in favor of the person against whom those acts are performed." To like effect are the cases of Anaheim Water Co. v. Semi-Tropic Water Co. 64 Cal. 192, and Alta Land & W. Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219. No estoppel is pleaded or found, nor would the facts warrant such a finding. The motion for a new trial was properly granted upon the ground considered.

In contemplation of the new trial it is proper to say that the rights of defendant Cook, and of defendant the Piru Water Company, of which Cook is a stockholder, are in issue in this action only to the extent that their rights affect or are affected by the rights of the plaintiffs. As between themselves, their rights are not subject here to determination, excepting as far as may be necessary to do complete justice to plaintiffs, and excepting so far, as between themselves, they have tendered and joined hostile issues. The limitation upon the use of the water appropriated by the Piru Water Company is not warranted by the evidence. So far as as plaintiffs are concerned, the Piru Water Company is prior in time and superior in location, and had acquired the ownership of a given amount of water while that water was used for proper objects, with the right to change the place and purpose of use so long as the change did not injuriously affect the rights of the subsequent appropriators and claimants. Ramell v. Irish, 96 Cal. 214; Jacob v. Lorenz, 98 Cal. 382; Davis v. Gale, 82 Cal. 26, 91 Am. Dec. 554; Pom. Water Rights, § 69.

Upon the question of the right of the owners of the Hargrave & Comfort ditch to extend it 500 or 600 feet over the northwest quarter of section 20, now the land of Cook, the better to facilitate the obtaining of their water, we do not deem it proper, upon this appeal, to do more than point out that, while an appropriator of water upon government land retains his rights when the land passes into private ownership, by virtue of the confirmatory statutes of the United States (14 Stat. at L. 253; 16 Stat. at L. 218), and while in the exercise of these rights he may change the point of diversion to another place upon the servient tenement, he is nevertheless limited in so doing to the exigencies of the situation, and has no right to make such change arbitrarily and at will. He may do so when, under certain circumstances, it is required to enable him to take the amount of water to which he has ownership, but then only when "others are not injured by the change." Civ. Code, § 1412. His rights are the rights of the grantee of an easement, and extend, in the matter of changing the point of diversion, no further than the boundaries of the servient tenement; and even when entering upon this he is under obligation only to make reasonable changes with reasonable care, and also to repair, so far as possible, whatever damage his labors may have occasioned. Gale & W. Easem. 235. As to lands other than those subject to his easement, and as to other claimants and owners, he can make no change at all which injuriously affects them or their rights. The order appealed from is affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

City of WILKES BARRE

v.

F. V. ROCKAFELLOW

John Welles HOLLENBACK et al., Appts.

APPEAL by defendants Hollenback et al. from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Luzerne County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce the alleged liability of the parties to the bond of Rockafellow as city treasurer. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. W. Wheaton, S. J. Strauss, G. R. Bedford, and H. W. Palmer, for appellants:

Any course of dealing between the party guaranteed and the principal in a bond entered upon, either before the bond is executed or afterwards, which changes the contract or the relations which the sureties suppose themselves to guarantee, relieves the sureties if they are not parties to the alteration.

American Teleg. Co. v. Lennig, 189 Pa. 594; Bensinger v. Wren, 100 Pa. 500; Nashitt v. Turner, 155 Pa. 429.

Mere noncommunication of circumstances affecting the situation of the parties, material for the surety to be acquainted with and within the knowledge of the person obtaining a surety bond, is undue concealment, though not wilful or intentional or with a view to any advantage to himself.

The same rules of contract are applicable where the sovereign is a party, as between individuals.

These principles apply to official bonds.

Lafayette v. James, 93 Ind. 240, 47 Am. Rep. 140; Berkis County Comrs. v. Ross, 3 Binn. 520; Sharp v. United States, 4 Watts, 21,

1. A city treasurer who borrows money in his custody from sinking fund commissioners who have the power to invest it holds the money as a debtor, rather than as an officer; and the sureties on his bond are not liable for his repayment of the money, but only for his care of the security held by him.

2. An offer to prove that a city treasurer borrowed money in his custody from the officers who had power to invest it, and that he paid interest upon it, and that the city council approved reports showing the receipt of such interest, should not be rejected in an action against his sureties because it does not undertake to set forth what action was taken before loaning the money.

3. Interest paid to himself as city treasurer by such officer, on money which he had borrowed from a fund in his custody, is held by him as treasurer, and his failure to pay it over to his successor is a breach of his official bond.

4. The promise to pay interest on balances in favor of the city, made by a banker to induce his election by the council as city treasurer, is against public policy and is incapable of enforcement.

5. Money is not loaned to a city treasurer who is also a banker, so as to relieve his sureties from liability for it, by his invalid promise, made to induce his election, that he will pay interest on the balances in favor of the city.

6. Transcripts showing entries by a treasurer upon his books are not conclusive, but only prima facie evidence, against his sureties, that he is liable for the sums with which he has charged himself.

NOTE.—While previous cases may have in some degree involved the questions here presented, it is believed that the above case is the first that clearly presents them.

Messrs. John McGahren, William S. McLean, and Alexander Farnham for appellee.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action upon an official bond. The principal obligor allowed judgment to go by default. The sureties made defense, and raised on the trial some questions that, so far as we have been able to discover, have not been passed upon in the form in which they now appear.

It seems that F. V. Rockafellow was elected treasurer of the city of Wilkes Barre for twenty-one years, consecutively. His last election took place in April, 1893, and he gave the bond now sued on soon after. During all this time he was a banker, in good financial standing, doing business in Wilkes Barre. In February, 1893, his bank suddenly closed its doors. Its liabilities proved to be large, and its assets practically nothing. He made a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors, but his assigned estate realized less than 7 per cent on his liabilities. His indebtedness to the city, as treasurer, was ascertained to be $51,748.01. It was made up of four items, viz., the sinking fund of the city, and between $4,000 and $5,000 of interest thereon, the ordinary or current funds of the city, and a considerable sum allowed as interest on the balance due upon this account.

The position of the sureties is that their undertaking is to be responsible for their principal as an officer, and not as a banker or borrower; the condition of the official bond being that their principal, "treasurer of said city of Wilkes Barre, shall faithfully discharge the duties of his said office, and pay over and safely deliver into the hands of his successor all moneys, books, accounts, papers, and other things" belonging to the city, which he shall hold as such officer. They allege that he held no part of the $51,748.01 found due from him, when his bank closed its doors, as a city treasurer, but as a borrower, and that the city has,

for that reason, no claim upon them for any part of its loss. The position of the city, on the other hand, is that the entire amount demanded belonged to the city, and was in the hands of the city treasurer as its lawful custodian. The assignments of error all relate to some phase of this general controversy, and will be sufficiently considered by determining the relation of F. V. Rockafellow to the four items into which the plaintiff's demand is divisible. The general rule is that the liability of both principal and sureties in an official bond must be measured by the terms of the instrument. The terms must receive a reasonable construction, and, if there has been no violation of official duty, there has been no breach of the condition for which the sureties can be required to account. It follows, necessarily, that for an extraofficial act or undertaking of the principal the sureties cannot be held responsible. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 467b. And if the ordinary course of official action is departed from, for the benefit and at the instance of the party to whom the bond is given, and loss results, the sureties are not, in law or morals, responsible for such loss, unless they assented to the departure from the ordinary course of official action which made the loss possible. Rogers v. The Marshal, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 644, 17 L. ed. 714; Skinner v. Wilson, 61 Miss. 90. What was the official duty of the city treasurer? Simply to act as custodian of the funds belonging to the city. As to the sinking fund, it is clear that he had no power to invest it or use it in any manner, except under the direction of the sinking-fund commissioners. They had power, under the ordinance, to invest the funds under their control, subject to the approval of the council, and it was made their duty to report annually the condition of the sinking fund and its securities to the council. The eleventh section of the same ordinance provides that "the treasurer of the city shall be the custodian of the moneys and securities of the sinking fund, subject to the inspection and order of said commissioners." As the commissioners had power to invest the sinking fund in such securities as the council should approve, they had, of course, power to lend it to the person who had the custody of it as an officer. When they did this, the money was no longer in the treasury, but the security taken for its return stood in its place. The treasurer, as such, held the security. The individual borrower held the money, not as an officer, but as a debtor to the city. The sureties would, in that case, be liable for the care of the security held by their principal, or city treasurer. They would not be liable for the payment of the money borrowed by him from the sinking-fund commissioners, because that was a personal debt, for the collection of which the creditors would be compelled to look, as in the case of any other loan, to the solvency of the borrower, and the securities given at the time the loan was made. When asked to pay the personal debts of their principal, the sureties may well reply: It was the official conduct, not the personal solvency, of the treasurer for which we engaged to be responsible. If he has been guilty of a breach of official duty, for that we are liable as sureties upon his official bond; but we have no concern with his personal debts. Now, the defendants offered to prove at the trial that Rockafellow borrowed the money in the sinking fund from the sinking-fund commissioners at 4 per cent per annum; that he held it under this arrangement for eight years before the bond sued on was given, and paid the interest regularly at the rate agreed upon. They also offered to prove, in connection with this offer, that each year the commissioners reported the receipt of the interest from him to the city council, and their reports were approved. The learned judge rejected this offer, for the reason that it did not undertake to set forth "what action was taken, either by the council or the sinking-fund commissioners, before the loaning of the money." But if the fact was as alleged, that, without the knowledge of the sureties, their principal had been turned from a mere custodian of public moneys into a borrower of them, by the action of the municipal officers, and the money subjected to all the risks of loss incident to its being mingled with the funds of the borrower, and used in his private business, the sureties had a right to show it; and if they did show it, then on the commonest principles of justice they had a right to defend as to so much of the plaintiff's claim. What difference could it make to the sureties whether the proceedings were strictly formal, so long as they resulted in the loss of the money, and were taken by those who had a right to invest it. Suppose the loan had been made to some other person, upon whose failure it was lost, and that in the treasury there was found the borrower's note, taken by the commissioners. Would the sureties, if sued, be compelled to show that every step taken by the sinking-fund commissioners had been regularly entered on their records, and had been in exact compliance with the law, before they could set up the fact that the money had been taken out of the treasury by those who had the right to invest it? Unless there was some breach of official duty on the part of the treasurer in parting with the money, neither he nor his sureties could be held for its loss because the commissioners had made a bad loan. If they had the power to make the loan, and did make it, they took the money out of the treasury for investment, and the treasurer no longer held it as the custodian. This offer should have been received. Whether the evidence would have supported it we cannot determine, but the defendants had a right to make the showing offered if it was in their power. It was, in effect, an offer to show that the sinking fund had been invested, and had not been in the treasury for more than eight years. The sinking-fund commissioners might be liable to the city for a loss resulting from their neglect of duty, but the defendants are not their sureties, and have no concern with that question.

The interest on the sinking fund stands on quite different ground. If Rockafellow, as a banker, had borrowed of the sinking-fund commissioners, the money which Rockafellow, as city treasurer, had in his custody, and had paid interest on it regularly, as alleged, for eight years, the interest, having been paid by him as borrower to himself as city treasurer, was as to himself and his sureties, in the treasury. For this he was liable to account. His failure to pay it over to his successor was a breach of his official duty, and for such breach of official duty his sureties were liable on their bond. They were liable, not because it was interest due from him to the city, but because it was interest received by him as city treasurer from a borrower from the sinking-fund commissioners. It was income derived by the commissioners from an investment of the sinking-fund money, paid to the treasurer as the proper receiving officer and custodian of all uninvested money belonging to the city. If the money was not, in fact, lent to Rockafellow, then he was not liable to interest; for, as city treasurer, his duty was to hold the money subject to the orders of the proper officers, and he had no right to use it. His duty was simply to pay over, when legally required so to do, what he had received by virtue of his office; and for the discharge of this official duty his sureties were liable. When this duty was discharged their liability was at an end. Either he held the sinking fund as treasurer, or he had borrowed it as a banker. The rejected evidence, if it had sustained the offer, would have settled this question, and the extent of the liability of the defendants as to this part of the plaintiff's claim.

The remaining question relates to the general funds of the city, and the effect of the agreement by Rockafellow to pay interest at the rate of 8 per cent on balances in favor of the city. It does not appear that there was, as to this money, any agreement entered into. Some member of the city council, in naming another candidate, stated that the person named by him would, if elected city treasurer, pay interest at the rate of 8 per cent on the balance in favor of the city. Another member said, if Mr. Rockafellow was re-elected, he would do as well by the city as any one else. The election then took place and resulted in the choice of Mr. Rockafellow by a decided majority. The relation of borrower and lender was not created by these statements. It does not seem to have been contemplated. The balance would be constantly shifting in amount. The treasurer was to be prepared at all times to honor the warrants of the proper officers, and upon the surplus of receipts over disbursements, as balances were struck from time to time, interest was to be allowed. This agreement, if made, did not amount to a loan of any particular sum of money by the city council to the treasurer, but was in the nature of a premium demanded from him as the price of the office. It was a premium for which he was not liable, which he could not be compelled to pay if he had taken defense to it, and for which the sureties are not liable. The agreement, if made, was against public policy, and is incapable of enforcement. If, as we incline to think, he was not a borrower of the money of the city, but was to hold the money subject at all times to the call of the proper municipal officers, his duty and his sureties' undertaking on his behalf, are discharged by the payment of the amount of money that came into his hands as treasurer, regardless of any promise to pay interest, or a premium in any other form, for the privilege of holding the office. The promise to pay interest as the price of an election to the office of treasurer has no valid consideration to support it. It is a promise that we cannot recognize as binding on him who made it. A fortiori is it without binding effect on the sureties upon an official bond.

It is contended that, as the law requires the city treasurer to keep accounts of his receipts and disbursements of the revenues of the city, and to make at stated intervals transcripts of these accounts for the information of the municipal government, the transcripts so made should be held to be conclusive upon him and his sureties as to the amount of public moneys received by him. This is putting the effect of the entries by the treasurer upon his books too strongly. They should be held to make a case, prima facie, against him and those who are in privity with him. They cannot, however, preclude the defendants from showing that the items, or some of them, have been erroneously entered,—that their principal was mistaken in his view of his own liability, or was disposed unfairly to make them responsible for sums of money for which no recovery could otherwise be had against them. Their liability is limited, as we have seen, by the terms of the bond, to a breach of official duty. If it was not the duty of the treasurer to pay, as such, the price demanded from him as the consideration of his appointment, his failure to pay it was not a breach of official duty, and therefore not a breach of his official bond. By the simple device of charging himself with that for which he was not liable, he could not shut the mouths of his sureties, or estop them from alleging the truth in their own behalf. The interest, whether it be treated as an exaction the law does not authorize, or a price demanded for the office, must be struck out, so far as it relates to the general funds of the city. So far as the facts now appear, we see no reason why the sureties should not be held liable for the general funds of the city. This disposes of the questions raised on this record.

The assignments of error are sustained, so far as they relate to the questions now considered, the judgment is reversed, and a writ of venire facias de novo awarded.

Mitchell, J., dissents from so much of this opinion as holds that plaintiff cannot recover interest on balances of general account.

A ten-pound package of oleomargarine put up by a nonresident manufacturer

NOTE.—The decision in Com. v. Schollenberger (Pa.) 22 L. R. A. 156, is here followed and approved, to the effect that packages for retail trade cannot be protected as original packages of interstate commerce against the exercise of state police power. As intimated in the footnote to that case, the Pennsylvania court was the first to decide this point, and up to the present time it remains untouched by courts of the United States and of other states.

and sent into the state for sale at retail to an individual consumer, and thus sold by an agent for use as food, is not an original package the sale of which is protected against state laws by the Constitution of the United States.

APPEAL by the Commonwealth from a judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions for Philadelphia County acquitting defendant of the charge of selling oleomargarine contrary to the provisions of the statute. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. Morton Cooper, Carroll R. Williams, and George S. Graham, District Attorney, for appellant:

Defendant places himself clearly within the ruling of Com. v. Schollenberger, 156 Pa. 201, 23 L. R. A. 155, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 488 (1893).

While Congress has the power to regulate commerce under section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, the states may validly "affect" commerce in two ways:

(1) In the exercise of their inherent and inalienable police power.

(2) Under the taxing power.

Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 185, 24 L. ed. 87. The states did not at the formation of the Union, and cannot by any means or process, surrender the police power inherently existing in them.

The scope of the police power has never yet been clearly defined, but it has never been doubted that the right of the state extends to the protection of the health of its citizens.

The act under which defendant below was convicted is a health law.

If the state, as a police measure, can restrict interstate commerce as to time, it may, upon principle and precedent, restrict as to use.

Hennington v. State, 90 Ga. 396, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 413.

Although a state is bound to receive and to permit the sale by the importer of any article of merchandise which Congress authorizes to be imported, it is not bound to furnish a market for it, nor to abstain from the passage of any law which it may deem necessary or advisable to guard the health or morals of its citizens, although such law may discourage importation, or diminish the profits of the importer, or lessen the revenue of the general government.

Merchandise in mass or bulk, though imported and held intact by the importer, is not necessarily such a technical "original package" as to preclude state action before the sale.

Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257; Com. v. Zell, 138 Pa. 628, 11 L. R. A. 602.

The manufacture and sale of oleaginous substitutes for butter in the United States cannot be said to be sufficiently "national in its nature" to constitute the substituted article a legitimate subject of interstate commerce, at least seven states having by statutes prohibited the manufacture and sale of oleaginous substitutes, in imitation of and intended as a substitute for genuine butter.

The judgment should be affirmed upon the authority of Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 86, and Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461, 39 L. ed. 223.

Leisy v. Hardin has been recognized, (1) by Congress in the passage of the act of August 8, 1890, commonly known as the Wilson Bill; (2) by the several United States circuit courts in Minnesota v. Gooch, 44 Fed. Rep. 276, 10 L. R. A. 830, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 530; Re McAllister, 51 Fed. Rep. 282; Re Sanders, 52 Fed. Rep. 802, 18 L. R. A. 549, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 805; Re Ware, 53 Fed. Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not necessary to the decision of this case that we should enter upon the discussion of the existence and extent of the police power residing in the several states of the Union. It is quite unnecessary to argue that the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the citizens of the different states was not intended to abridge the lawful exercise of the police power by any of the state governments. If judicial decisions can be said to settle any question, these questions are clearly and properly settled by the decisions of the highest tribunal known to our laws, and settled in accordance with the rules laid down in this state since its first organization. In Powell v. Pennyloania, 127 U. S. 678, 82 L. ed. 253, the right of this state to deal, in the exercise of its police power, with the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, and the validity of the particular statute under consideration in this case, were distinctly affirmed. During the last year (1894) a Massachusetts statute relating to the same subject came before the Supreme Court of the United States in Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461, 39 L. ed. 223, and was sustained as a lawful exercise of the police power. The defendant in that case had, as the defendant in this case has, a license from the internal revenue department of the United States, authorizing him to deal in oleomargarine. It was held, however, that this did not authorize him to engage in the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in violation of the state laws, lawfully passed, forbidding or regulating such manufacture and sale. The dealer in articles which the state, in the exercise of its police power, places under restrictions, must make his peace with the state in which his business is conducted, as well as with the internal revenue laws of the United States. This proposition the defendant denies. He has made his peace with the tax laws of the United States, but denies the power of the state to regulate or restrict his sales of the commodity in which he deals, and asserts that he is engaged in interstate commerce, within the true intent of the constitutional provision conferring upon Congress the power to regulate commerce between the several states. In determining the question thus raised, it is important to keep in mind the facts found by the special verdict, as follows: (1) The defendant is a resident in and citizen of this state, with a store or place of business at No. 214 Callowhill street, Philadelphia. (2) He is conducting the sale of oleomargarine as the agent for "Chicago Butterine Company," which is a firm or corporation doing business in Illinois, and is the licensed dealer at No. 214 Callowhill street. (3) The oleomargarine was not made from milk or cream. It was designed to be used in place of butter. It was sent from Chicago to Philadelphia to be sold as food, and the tub sold to Crawford, which is complained of in this case, was sold to him for use as an article of food. (4) The tub contained 10 pounds only; was put up, sealed, and stamped at the factory in the state of Illinois; was received in the same form in Philadelphia, and then "placed in defendant's store, and offered for sale as an article of food." (5) This was one of "many transactions of like character made by the defendant during the last two years;" or, in other words, this was the way in which the defendant did business for his nonresident principals, the manufacturers. They put up the article in 10-pound packages, suited for the retail trade; and, because they do not allow their agents to open or divide these, they treat their trade as wholesale, though in fact they supply the actual consumer, and not the retail dealers.

Looking now at these facts in the light of the cases cited, we shall find every question raised by them has been decided against the defendant by the Supreme Court of the United States, except one. The validity of our act of assembly has been distinctly affirmed as a lawful exercise of the police power. Act May 21, 1885. The fact that an internal revenue license affords the defendant no justification for disregarding a lawful exercise of the police power by the state is stated with equal clearness. The proposition that the judiciary of the United States should not strike down the police power of the states, in the exposition of the interstate commerce powers of the general government, was asserted and abundantly vindicated in Plumley v. Massachusetts, supra (decided within the last year). Our statute is directed especially against the sale of oleomargarine as an article of food. The defendant, in wilful and flagrant disregard of the letter as well as the spirit of the statute, keeps these tubs of the commodity manufactured by his principals at the store in Callowhill street, for sale "as an article of food." He offers them for sale for use as an article of food, and he sold to Crawford the 10-pound tub which is the ground of complaint in this case for use as food. Now, it is very clear that this sale was a violation of our statute. The conviction was eminently proper, therefore, and should be sustained, unless the sale can be justified as one made of an "original package," within the proper meaning of that phrase. The nonresidence of the manufacturer does not play any important part in this case, for he comes into this state to establish a "store" for the sale of his goods, pays the license exacted by the revenue laws, and puts his agent in charge of the sale of his goods from his store, not to the trade, but to customers. We have, therefore, a Pennsylvania store selling its stock of goods to its customers, for their consumption, from its own shelves; and, unless these goods are in such original packages as the laws of the United States must protect, the sale is clearly punishable under our statute.

We first encountered this question of what shall constitute an original package, within the meaning of our national interstate commerce legislation, in Com. v. Zell, 138 Pa. 615, 11 L. R. A. 602. A nonresident manufacturer of intoxicating drinks put up his whiskey and other liquors in quart and pint bottles, adapted for use in the retail trade to consumers. These he sent to an agent in charge of a store rented for the purpose in Washington, Pa. The bottles were corked, some sealing wax put over the cork, and the brand or initials of the manufacturer impressed thereon. The bottles so secured were then put in pasteboard boxes or covers, and packed in open boxes or barrels, for shipment to the Pennsylvania store. When they were received at the store the bottles were arranged and displayed on the shelves, and offered for sale to the consumer as original packages of whiskey. Neither the distiller who shipped the whiskey, nor his agent who sold it, had a license to sell intoxicating drinks under the liquor laws of this state, but made sales of whiskey and beer by the pint and quart under the pretense that each bottle was an original package of commerce. The learned judge before whom an indictment against the seller of the bottles of liquor was brought to trial submitted the question to the jury whether this method of putting up the liquors in bottles was not adopted as a device to evade the liquor laws of this state. The jury found the fact to be that it was a mere device, and rendered a verdict of guilty. Upon an appeal to this court the ruling of the court below was affirmed, and, in speaking on the second assignment of error, we said that whether whiskey or beer could be put up in pint bottles, and sold by the single bottle, as an original package, under the protection of the interstate commerce laws, was a question that would be decided when it was squarely raised. The question was next raised in Com. v. Schollenberger, 156 Pa. 201, 22 L. R. A. 155, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 488, and its decision became necessary to the disposition of that case. In that case a nonresident manufacturer of oleomargarine had established a store for its sale in Philadelphia, and held a license, under the internal revenue laws, authorizing such sale. His agent sold a tub of "the goods" to a boarding-house keeper, for use, in the place of butter, on his table. The defense was that the tub had not been broken or divided by the seller, and was therefore an original package within the meaning of the interstate commerce cases. We held that the conclusion did not follow from the fact stated, and attempted to define an "original package" as such a package as was used in good faith by producers and shippers for convenience in handling and security in transportation of their wares in the ordinary course of actual commerce. But we also said that where the size of the package was adapted for the retail trade, so that "breaking of bulk" was not necessary to "reduce the goods into the common mass" and fit them for the retail trade, the traffic so conducted was not interstate, but infrastate, commerce; or, in other words, the common every-day retail traffic of the community in which the store was located. Let us look at the consequences of the adoption of the opposite rule. If a pint bottle of whiskey is an original package, under the protection of Congress, and can be sold as such regardless of the police legislation of the state, we cannot punish the sale to a minor, to a person of known intemperate habits, to a lunatic, on election days, or on the Sabbath. All power over the traffic for police purposes is gone. And why? Because the power to regulate interstate commerce intended to guard against stoppage along state lines for examination or the collection of customs duties, has been extended by construction until it is made to reach and protect a retail traffic carried on within any state, if the things sold have come into the retailer's store from a nonresident manufacturer or shipper. If this be a sound construction, then the power of a state to restrict or prohibit an injurious traffic does not depend on the deleterious character of the thing sold, or the manner in which sales are made, or the public or private injury inflicted by the sale, but on the manner in which the thing sold comes into possession of the seller. If he makes the article, or buys it of another citizen of the state, he cannot sell it without punishment. If he buys it of a nonresident who sends it to him across the state line, he may sell it with impunity and the state is powerless to stay his hands or to regulate his sales. A pint of whiskey put up in a flask, if made or bought in this state, cannot be sold without a license granted by the courts after an examination into the character of the applicant and his business. The same flask of whiskey put up across the border may come, as an original package, into any community, and be sold to any person,—whether a minor, a drunkard, or a lunatic,—under the protection of the Constitution of the United States. We cannot adopt a construction that seems to us so unnatural and unreasonable, and that would work such absurd and monstrous results. On the contrary, we hold, as we think is held by the recent case of Plumley v. Massachusetts, already referred to, that the mere fact that a police law may affect the trade in articles brought from another state does not amount to an attempt to regulate interstate commerce, or to an assumption of power belonging to Congress.

Coming now to the facts of this case, we find the alleged "original package of commerce" to be a small tub of oleomargarine, containing 10 pounds, and in fact sold to a consumer for use, as an article of food, upon his table. It is true that the defendant treats his trade as one carried on at wholesale, but the facts of the special verdict show that this is not because he supplies dealers or sells in large quantities, for shipment, but because he treats the little tubs and packages he sells his customers as "original packages of commerce," and his lawbreaking traffic as "interstate commerce." He does not "break bulk," by taking 1 pound out of a package, and weighing it on his scales, for the supply of a customer, but requires him to take a whole tub,—whether of 10 pounds, or of 2 or 1, is immaterial, but it must be a whole package, as it was put up at the factory. If the pint bottle or the pound package has not been opened and divided before the sale, the contention is that it has not become a part of "the common mass" of property entering into the ordinary business of the citizens of the state, but is an original package, under the protection of Congress, as interstate commerce. The question to which we are thus brought is the same that was encountered in Com. v. Schollenberger, 156 Pa. 201, 22 L. R. A. 155, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 488. It is whether a package intended and used for the supply of the retail trade is an "original package," within the protection of the interstate commerce cases. We held in that case that a manufacturer who puts up his products in packages evidently adapted for and intended to meet the requirements of an unlawful retail trade in another state, and sends them to his own agent in that state, for sale to consumers, is not engaged in interstate commerce, but is engaged in an effort to carry on a forbidden business by masquerading in a character to which he has no honest title. We are not dealing with the legislative question. Whether the trade in oleomargarine is injurious, and should be restricted, is a question that has been decided for us. It has been declared injurious. It has been placed under restrictions. These restrictions have been held to be a valid exercise of the police power both by this court and the Supreme Court of the United States. Our question is whether this valid restriction can be enforced, or whether the transparent trick of putting up oleomargarine in small packages, in another state, so that it can be sold at retail to consumers as an article of food, will clothe an unlawful retail traffic with the coat of mail belonging to honest, legitimate interstate commerce, and set the police laws of the state at defiance. In disposing of this question, we hold as follows: (1) The character of the package, whether original or not, is a question of fact, when there are facts to be passed upon, bearing upon this question, and should go to the jury. (2) It is a question of law when the facts are agreed upon, or presented by a special verdict, as in this case, and should be decided by the court. (3) It is fair to presume that a package was intended by him who devised it, for the purpose for which he uses it in his own business. (4) A package devised by a nonresident manufacturer, or put up by him, adapted for sale at retail to individual consumers,—such, for example, as a flask of whiskey, or a tub or pail or roll of oleomargarine,—and actually sold by him or his agent to the consumer for use as an article of food or drink, in violation of the laws of the state where such sales take place, is not an "original package" within the meaning of the law relating to interstate commerce. (5) The punishment of such sales, under the police power of the state, is not an interference with the powers of Congress, or with the commerce between the states, which is protected by the Constitution of the United States.

The judgment is reversed, and judgment is now entered on the special verdict, in favor of the Commonwealth. The record is remitted that sentence may be imposed according to law.

J. C. CLEVELAND, Appt.

1. The revival of a judgment against the judgment debtor is effective as against the grantee in a deed made after the judgment but before the revival, of which the judgment creditor had neither actual nor constructive notice prior to the revival.
2. Proceedings to revive a judgment as against a terre-tenant after receiving notice that he held a secret deed to the property at the time the judgment was regularly revived against the judgment debtor are erroneous, since he is bound by the proceedings against the debtor.
3. The revival by amicable scire facias of a judgment is not abandoned by sub sequent erroneous proceedings upon discovering that a transferee claimed an interest in the property covered by the judgment lien, which are instituted for the purpose of making the judgment effective against him.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Bradford County refusing to strike off a judgment which had been revived against a judgment debtor by an amicable scire facias on the ground that the revival had been abandoned by subsequent proceedings. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward Overton, for appellant:

There can be but one final judgment in any personal action, whether founded on contract or in tort.

O'Neal v. O'Neal, 4 Watts & S. 130; Walton's Appeal, 153 Pa. 99.

A recovery in a personal action is a bar to a recovery in proceedings instituted by attachment, whether defendant does or does not file a bond.

Brenner v. Moyer, 98 Pa. 274; Miller v. Rohrer, 127 Pa. 884.

A scire facias to revive a judgment and a judgment thereon are a bar to another scire facias on the original judgment.

Custer v. Detterer, 8 Watts & S. 28; Fursht v. Overdeer, Id. 470; Little v. Smyser, 10 Pa. 881; Zerns v. Watson, 11 Pa. 260.

By issuing his scire facias the plaintiff affirmed that he had no lien by virtue of his amicably revived judgment on the land he sought to bind by his scire facias on the original judgment.

Robinson v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co. 66 Pa. 160.

A plaintiff may, by his acts, abandon a judgment obtained by an amicable revival.

Ramsey v. Linn, 2 Rawle, 281; Eby's Case, 9 Watts & S. 145; Man v. Drexel, 2 Pa. 203; Meason's Estate, 4 Watts, 844; Silverthorn v. Townsend, 87 Pa. 267; Misimer v. Ebersole, 87 Pa. 109; Middleton v. Middleton, 106 Pa. 259; Sayer v. Schroeder, 2 Pennyp. 79; Baum v. Custer, 22 W. N. C. 145.

Each successive writ of scire facias to revive a judgment must be founded upon the judgment which immediately preceded it. A recovery upon a writ of scire facias is a bar to any subsequent recovery upon the original judgment.

Collingwood v. Carson, 2 Watts & S. 290; Custer v. Detterer and Fursht v. Overdeer, supra.

The plaintiff, without notice of the conveyance, can issue his scire facias on the new judgment, and then bring him in as a terre-tenant so as to bind the land.

Wetmore v. Wetmore, 155 Pa. 507; Sayer v. Schroeder, supra; Little v. Smyser, 10 Pa. 881.

The issuing of an alias f. fa. and levy upon the same property first levied is an abandonment of the lien of levy by virtue of the f. fa. Silverthorn v. Townsend, Meason's Estate, and Misimer v. Ebersole, supra.

NOTE.—In connection with the above case, see note to Betz v. Snyder (Ohio) 18 L. R. A. 235, which to some extent touches the effect of failure to 30 L. R. A. record a deed. As to defense against revival of judgment, see also Enewold v. Olson (Neb.) 22 L. R. A. 578.

The abandonment of a scire facias terminates its virtue to prolong a lien.

Messrs. D. A. Overton and J. C. Ing-ham, for appellee:

Abandonment is absolute relinquishment. It includes both the intention to abandon and the external act by which the intention is carried into effect.

If the judgment is regularly revived against defendant, and the plaintiff has no knowledge, actual or constructive, of any terre-tenant, then the lien of the original judgment is continued and preserved against the land in the hands of the terre-tenant.

And while the lien is so preserved a scire facias may issue on the original judgment to revive it against the terre-tenant.

Furatt v. Overdeer, Little v. Smyser, Porter v. Hitchcock, and Hughes v. Torrence, supra.

The only inquiry is whether the judgment has been regularly revived between the original parties, and no distinction is made between a revival by scire facias and by the agreement of the parties.

Buck's Appeal, 100 Pa. 118.

The issuing of the writ of scire facias may be dispensed with by the agreement of the parties entered amicably in the case.

2 Fish's Troubat & Haly, Pr. p. 540; Baum v. Ouster, 22 W. N. C. 145; Porter v. Hitchcock, 98 Pa. 626.

It is the original judgment that is to be revived against the terre-tenant.

Porter v. Hitchcock, 98 Pa. 627; Furatt v. Overdeer, 8 Watts & S. 470; Little v. Smyser, 110 Pa. 381.

The judgment on the amicable scire facias in this case could not be revived against the terre-tenant, as she was not a party to it.

Zerns v. Watson, 11 Pa. 260; Little v. Smyser, 10 Pa. 383; Davidson v. Thornton, 7 Pa. 138; Wetmore v. Wetmore, 155 Pa. 507.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal presents an interesting question. It cannot be said to be definitely settled, but its solution will be made comparatively easy by a distinct statement of it, and of the facts on which it arises. The plaintiff is the holder of a judgment against the defendant, which was entered in 1886. It then became a lien upon a valuable farm owned by the defendant, and occupied by himself and his family. In 1891 the defendant and his family were still in possession of the farm, without visible change. The record showed the title remaining in him. There is no allegation of notice, actual or constructive, that the defendant had parted with his title to any one. Upon this state of facts, the plaintiff applied to the defendant to revive and continue the lien of the judgment by an amicable scire facias. This was done, and the judgment of revival duly entered on the records by the prothonotary. During the following year, Mrs. Cleveland told the plaintiff that her husband had conveyed the farm to her by a deed executed by him prior to the revival of the judgment by amicable scire facias in 1891. This information started in the mind of the plaintiff the question whether the unrecorded conveyance to Mrs. Cleveland would affect in any manner the lien of his judgment as revived by the amicable scire facias, signed only by the defendant. He seems to have assumed that this question must have an affirmative answer, and to have turned to consider, in the next place, what it was necessary for him to do in order to preserve the lien of his judgment upon the farm in the hands of Mrs. Cleveland as terre-tenant. The answer to the first of these questions will dispose of this appeal, and of the appeal of Mrs. Cleveland in another case which was heard at the same time with this one. Lyon v. Cleveland, 170 Pa. 631. We are to inquire, therefore, what effect the secret conveyance by Cleveland to his wife had upon the lien of the plaintiff's judgment upon the farm so conveyed.

It may be well to begin this inquiry by considering just what is meant when we speak of the lien of a judgment upon real estate. At common law, a judgment was not a lien upon either personal or real estate. We have no statute that, in express words, makes a judgment a lien on land. The lien is not an incident of the judgment, therefore, but the result or outgrowth of a succession of statutes subjecting land to seizure and sale upon execution process. Accordingly, it has been uniformly held that a judgment on which a seizure and sale of land is not authorized is not a lien on the real estate of the defendant. Beam's Appeal, 19 Pa. 453; Schaffer v. Cadwallader, 38 Pa. 126. Judgments against the commonwealth, against counties and townships, against municipal corporations, and against canal and railroad companies, belong to this class. Writs of fi. fa. for the seizure and sale of the property of the defendant do not ordinarily issue upon such judgments, but other methods of compelling payment are provided by statute. When the right to seize and sell land in satisfaction of a judgment does exist, it must be exercised within such period as the law giving the right may appoint. Formerly, this period was a year and a day; and, if this was allowed to elapse, the plaintiff was required to warn the defendant by a writ of scire facias post annum et diem before he could seize the defendant's land in satisfaction of his judgment. While the right of seizure lasted, the judgment was said to be a lien on the defendant's real estate. When the right of seizure was lost by lapse of time, the judgment was said to have lost its lien.

By our act of April 16, 1845, the plaintiff's right to seize land was extended from a year and a day to five years from the date on which the judgment was entered. The judgment is therefore said to be a lien for five years from its date upon all the real estate owned by the defendant at that time, because the plaintiff may levy upon and sell such real estate for the collection of the sum due him on his judgment at any time within five years. If the five years are allowed to expire, the plaintiff is in the same situation that he would have been in under the old law limiting his right to execution to a year and a day. His right to seize the defendant's land is lost by the lapse of time; or, in other words, the judgment has lost its lien, since it will not support execution process until regularly revived. The revival of a judgment means simply a new award of execution process for its collection. This may be had by means of a writ of scire facias, which, after the expiration of five years, is in effect a scire facias quare executionem non. If issued before the expiration of five years, it is a scire facias to revive and continue the lien of the judgment for another period of five years. Judgment of revival may be had also by the consent of the defendant without a writ. Such a revival is known as an "amicable scire facias," and authorizes the prothonotary to enter judgment against the defendant for the amount due on the judgment, and that the lien of the judgment be extended for another period of five years. This judgment may be again revived as often as the lapse of time may require, either amicably or by writ; and the right of the plaintiff to resort to the real estate owned by the defendant when the judgment was entered is thereby preserved. The last judgment of the series is that by which the amount of the plaintiff's demand is ascertained, and his right to execution therefore determined. The several judgments that precede it have served to preserve the plaintiff's right to seize, upon execution process, all the real estate that could have been seized under the original judgment; or, in other words, they have continued the lien of the judgment upon the lands that were originally subject to it. But, being more than five years old, they will not support execution process, and have ceased to have any significance except as supports to the last of the series, and to process issued upon it. When the defendant in the judgment sells land, the purchaser is bound to take notice of the record. The record informs him of the existence and amount of the judgment; and the law, which he is also bound to know, informs him that the land he is buying is subject to seizure and sale for the payment of the judgment at any time within five years. If he takes possession of the land or records his deed, the plaintiff is bound to take notice of his situation as a terre-tenant, and thereafter, upon the revival of the lien of his judgment, to give the terre-tenant notice. Armington v. Rau, 100 Pa. 165.

If the purchaser does not record his deed or take possession, but leaves the defendant in undisturbed possession of the land so that the plaintiff has no knowledge of the conveyance, actual or constructive, he does not become a terre-tenant of the land, and has no interest therein of which the plaintiff can take notice. As between himself and his vendor, he may have a good title; but as to the lien creditor he has none, because the conveyance to him is and remains a secret one, while the vendor is permitted to remain in possession in the 80 L. R. A.

same manner as before the secret conveyance was made. Under such circumstances, the revival of the judgment against the defendant is all that is possible to the creditor, and it will continue the right to seize and sell the real estate which was subject to seizure under the preceding judgment or judgments of the series. It can make no difference whether the judgment of revival is obtained by means of the writ of scire facias regularly issued or by an amicable scire facias. It is a judgment against the defendant who was the owner of the land when the judgment was entered, and who remains so to all appearances, and as to all means of knowledge open to the creditor. If the creditor or the purchaser must lose, and if both of them may be said to be innocent parties, then the loss must fall on him whose neglect to give notice has occasioned the omission or failure complained of; but if the purchaser records his deed, or enters into the actual possession of the land, he becomes a holder of the land bound by the judgment,—a terre-tenant,—of whose position and interest the judgment creditor is bound to take notice at his peril. If thereafter the plaintiff, in a judgment against the vendor, disregards the position of the terre-tenant, and revives his judgment without legal notice to him, he will lose his lien, as to the lands so acquired by the terre-tenant, at the end of five years from the time when the notice of the terre-tenant's title can be brought home to him.

It remains to apply these principles to the facts of this case. The judgment held by Conklin was entered against Cleveland in 1886. The defendant then owned the farm on which he lived, and the judgment became a lien upon it. In 1891 the state of the record and of the possession remained the same as in 1886. The plaintiff, having, therefore, no notice of any change in the title, revived his judgment by an amicable scire facias, signed by the defendant. This judgment of revival continued the right of the plaintiff to execution against all the lands previously bound by the judgment entered in 1886; in other words, it continued the lien of the judgment upon all such lands against the defendant and all persons claiming under him by means of any secret conveyance. Mrs. Cleveland held such a conveyance. She was bound to know of the judgment and its lien upon the farm. She was bound to know that, if she expected to assert the rights of a terre-tenant, it was her duty to make her title public, so that the plaintiff could be fixed with notice of it. She did nothing. The plaintiff did the only thing possible for him,—he revived his judgment against the defendant; and we have no doubt that the revival bound the land, as to any interest acquired by Mrs. Cleveland, just as completely as it would have done if she had joined in the agreement with her husband. This revival continued the lien of the judgment for five years from the date of its entry, and the subsequent recording of a deed, or notice given in any other manner, could have no retroactive operation. This, then, was the situation when, in 1892, Mrs. Cleveland gave the plaintiff notice that she held a deed for the farm, which had been executed before the entry of the judgment upon the amicable scire facias. This notice did not affect the lien of the judgment in the slightest degree. It gave her no rights as a terre-tenant, except such as began at that time. The plaintiff and the lien of his judgment stood after the notice was given just as they stood before. There was no reason for taking any precautionary steps, or making any effort to bring Mrs. Cleveland on the record, until it became necessary to revive the judgment again against the defendant. The plaintiff seems to have reached an opposite conclusion. He at once issued a scire facias on the original judgment, which was at the time more than five years old, and named Mrs. Cleveland therein as a terre-tenant. This was not only unnecessary, but it was wholly unauthorized. The defendant took defense on the ground that the judgment had been once regularly revived as against him, and that he was not liable to a second judgment for the same cause of action. Mrs. Cleveland took defense on the ground that the lien of the judgment of 1886 had been lost by lapse of time, and could not be revived against her. The court below overruled the defense set up by the defendant; disposed of Mrs. Cleveland's allegation that as to her the judgment of 1886, having ceased to be a lien, would not support the scire facias, by admitting evidence to show the continuance of the lien against the defendant, and then rendered judgment against both. This was an error. The writ should not have been issued. Having been issued, the court should have refused to enter judgment upon it against either of the defendants. The plaintiff needed no help until it should become necessary to revive his judgment again. When that time comes, he will issue his writ of scire facias, naming Mrs. Cleveland as terre-tenant; but he will proceed upon the judgment entered upon the amicable scire facias in 1891, which, as we have seen, binds the land as well in the hands of Mrs. Cleveland, upon the facts of this case, as in the hands of her husband. But the error into which the plaintiff and the court below fell was not in this case, but, as we have said, in the action brought by scire facias against the defendant and his wife, as terre-tenant on the original judgment entered in 1886.

The judgment appearing upon this record is therefore affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of California, Resp.,
v.

1. Evidence of occurrences the same day but some hours before a fatal affray is admissible in a prosecution for murder, on the question of self-defense, where they were a part of the same occurrences that culminated in the killing, and tend to enlighten the jury as to the mental attitude of the men toward each other at the time of the affray.
2. The refusal of instructions as to the rights of a finder in respect to the property found is reversible error in a prosecution against him for murder, in which he pleads self-defense and the evidence shows that the homicide occurred while he was attempting to enforce a right to possession as against the owner, when both men used firearms, since such instructions are necessary to enable the jury to determine which was first in the wrong.
3. The duty to refrain from killing a mere trespasser is not limited to cases where the trespass is committed in a peaceable manner.
4. That an attempt to kill or inflict great bodily harm is made in resisting a forcible trespass against personal property does not deprive the person assaulted of the right to kill his assailant without retreating and declining, or making known to his adversary his willingness to decline the strife, where the assault is so sudden and perilous as to render retreat and declination impossible; but as he is the first wrongdoer, although his wrong does not justify the attack upon him, he must retreat and decline the combat, if possible, before resorting to the killing of his adversary.

5. Retreat is not an essential condition of the right of a person feloniously assaulted without adequate provocation to kill his assailant, if the assault is sudden and the danger great or apparently great; and he may under such circumstances pursue and slay his adversary if apparently necessary for his safety.
6. A first felonious assailant cannot kill the person assaulted, in defending himself against a deadly return assault by the latter, until he has in good faith declined the strife and fairly made known to the latter his willingness to do so, and the imminence of his danger does not relieve him of the necessity of so declining before availing himself of the right of self-defense.
7. A first felonious assailant may justifiably kill his adversary, if, after in good faith withdrawing from and declining further combat, and fairly making known such purpose to his adversary, the latter forces a new combat upon him.
8. A requested instruction in a criminal action, which requires the jury to be convinced to "an absolute moral certainty" before conviction, is properly refused.
9. The elimination from a requested instruction of defendant in a criminal trial, of the direction to find the defendant not guilty if the jury find the facts hypothesized in the instruction, is not reversible error, although it is the better practice to add such conclusion to each instruction which warrants it.

NOTE.—A very important question as to self-defense is decided in the above case. On the general subject, see a brief note to Drysdale v. State (Ga.) 6 L. R. A. 424.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Humboldt County convicting him of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Chamberlin & Wheeler, for appellant:

Hecker on finding and taking charge of the horses became invested with the rights and obligations of a depositary for hire.

Civil Code, § 1864.

Hecker had a lien on the horses.

Civil Code, § 8051.

This lien could be extinguished only by a voluntary restoration of the horses to their owner.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Hecker, was tried for the murder of one Patrick Riley, and by the jury found guilty of murder in the second degree. The killing was admitted, but it was claimed to have been done in self-defense.

It appeared by the evidence that Riley peddled wares through the country, using for the purpose a two-horse team and wagon. He had camped near the farm house of one Brice-land, and turned his horses into Brice-land's inclosure. From this they strayed, and were lost in the hills. They had been gone for several days when Riley, who had been in vain pursuit of them, met Hecker, and offered to give him $10 if he would find and return them. Hecker was an old resident of the vicinity, and owned a sheep range, which was contiguous to the land of Brice-land. He searched for the horses that day, and found them, put them in his corral over night, and the next morning proceeded with them to Brice-land's. Riley was away at the time of his arrival, and Hecker either made a voluntary surrender of the horses to Mrs. Riley, who put them in Brice-land's barn, as was claimed by the People, or, as was contended by the defense, they were put there by Mrs. Riley for Hecker, who thus still retained constructive possession of and a lien upon them for the promised reward of $10. The point is one in dispute. Hecker rode on to the little town of Brice-land, and passed the day in waiting for Riley. He did not see him, and went home. The next day he returned to town, and met Riley about 11 o'clock in the morning. Riley called him to one side, and the finding of the horses was discussed. There having been no one else present at that interview, the only account of it is Hecker's. But it appears from other evidence that Riley suspected that his horses had been taken and secreted in the hills in expectation of a reward, and the promptness with which Hecker found and returned them seems to have confirmed him in his suspicion, and created the conviction that Hecker had purloined them. There was no question but that Riley's suspicions were unfounded and unjust. It was in evidence that Riley said he would kill the man who stole his horses. Hecker testified that Riley accused him of stealing the horses, and refused to pay him any money for their recovery. The men parted. Hecker returned to the store and saloon, and, after thinking and talking the matter over, as he says, concluded he would take the horses from Brice-land's barn, and put them elsewhere until he was paid. Hecker was a cripple; Riley, a powerful man. Hecker armed himself, thinking that Riley would be at Brice-land's, and knowing that "he would be trying to get a row." Arriving at Brice-land's a little after noon, Hecker found but one horse, the other having been ridden off by Sam Pollock, who had gone to find Riley, and tell him the search was at an end. Hecker took possession of the animal, and led it from the stable. Riley saw him, and came forward, calling to him, and forbidding the act. Hecker half drew his pistol from the bosom of his shirt, and, in turn, told Riley to advance no further. Riley answered that he was unarmed, and turned out his pockets in proof; and a second time the two men parted, Hecker leading away the horse. He returned with it to the town, where he spent the afternoon discussing his grievance. As was shown, he used some loose talk and indulged in some threats: He would not let Riley beat him out of his money; he would have the money, or would have Riley's blood,—while, to add to the bitterness of the matter, he was informed that Riley had gone off to procure his arrest for stealing the horses. This information was brought to him by men whom he had sent to see Riley to fix up the matter, telling them that he wanted no fuss, and to take what they could get and settle it for him. So the time passed until about half past 6 of this July afternoon, when Hecker espied Pollock riding by on the other horse. Hecker, who was himself then mounted, hailed him, and demanded the horse, believing, as he testified, that he "had to have both horses in order to make the lien good." Pollock declined to surrender the animal, saying he would put it where he got it; and so Hecker rode on once more to Brice-land's, and to the fatal meeting with Riley. As the two men rode up to the stable, Riley came forward to take his horse. Pollock dismounted. Riley started to remove the saddle. Hecker leaned forward to seize the bridle. There was a struggle for possession, and then, by the evidence for the People, Hecker drew his pistol, and with it struck Riley over the head, and, as he staggered back, fired at him. Hecker's account is that he spurred his horse that he might seize the other's bridle; that, as his horse sprang forward, her fore shoulder struck Riley, and staggered him. "When I broke his hold, he ran right back, and had his hand twisted to pull his pistol, and at last he pulled his pistol out, and pointed at me, and I saw him shut his eye to pull the trigger; and, just as he was about to pull the trigger, I threw myself out of the saddle like that [shows] over the side of my horse, and grabbed my pistol at the same time; and, as I raised mine up, he had his pistol up, and we both shot about the same time. If anything, he shot a little before I did." The defendant was riding a nervous two year old colt, using a "hackamore" in lieu of bridle, and at the shooting she either bolted, or, as Hecker says, he started her to go around Brice-land's house, and get out of the way. Riley fired again at him as he went. At some beehives, Hecker reined up, and the two men exchanged shots. Hecker then rode on in another direction, to a place in the yard where there were four stumps, having abandoned, as he says, his first intention to pass around Brice-land's house, and endeavoring to get away by another route, or, as the People claim, coming back to engage Riley at closer quarters. Riley ran towards a granary, calling upon one of the bystanders, of whom there were several, to lend him his pistol, and to his wife and daughter to go to the wagon and bring him more cartridges. Whether Riley ran to the granary to escape further combat, or whether he designed to use it as a shield that he might fire with more security upon Hecker, is disputed. Near the granary, and, as Riley was about to pass a corner of it, there was shooting, and Riley, struck through the heart, ran a few yards, and fell dead.

Nothing of the foregoing narrative is to be taken as expressing the views of this court upon the weight of the evidence. That consideration is not before us. The account is designed to throw into prominence the claims made by prosecution and defense for the better understanding of the propositions of law which we are called upon to consider.

The first complaint of defendant is that the court erred in admitting testimony as to the occurrences at the meeting between himself and Riley at noon of the day of the affray. But this complaint is not well founded. Hecker's plea was self-defense. Whether Hecker was within or without his legal rights in seeking to gain possession of the horse, whether he or the deceased first committed a felonious assault, were disputed questions for the jury's determination. The attempt to retake the first horse, though separated in time from the taking of the second, was a part of the same occurrence and transaction which led up to and culminated in the fatal affray. The recovery of the first horse, and the manner of it, the conduct of the two men upon that occasion, their previous difficulty, their threats against each other, whether communicated or not, all tended to enlighten the jury as to the mental attitudes of the men towards each other at the time of the affray, and thus to assist in determining the disputed question as to which in fact first put himself in the wrong, and which first made a felonious assault upon the other; for only by so determining could the jury justly decide upon the defendant's plea. People v. Lyons, 110 N. Y. 618; State v. Perigo, 70 Iowa, 657; Monroe v. State, 5 Ga. 85; Williams v. State, 8 Helsk. 376; State v. Zeilers, 7 N. J. L. 265; Keener v. State, 18 Ga. 194, 63 Am. Dec. 269; State v. Tarter, 26 Or. 88.

But having admitted, and properly admitted, this evidence, the court erred in refusing to give the instructions asked by defendant (defendant's proposed instructions Nos. 7, 8, and 9)* defining the rights of a finder of lost property to compensation for its care and preservation and to any promised reward, the nature of his lien upon it, and how such lien could be lost or extinguished. It is conceded by the prosecution that these instructions correctly embody the law, but it is contended that they were properly refused as irrelevant. This contention cannot be upheld. One of the questions of primary consideration for the jury was, Which of the two men was the aggressor at the time of the fatal affray, which of the two first overstepped the boundaries of the law, which of the two first trespassed upon the legal rights of the other,—in short, which of the two, by his acts and conduct, first put himself in the wrong? For it is obvious that the determination of this must throw a flood of light upon the other question, second in consideration but first in importance, namely, whether, at the time the defendant first fired, he was acting in self-defense.

The opposing claims of counsel upon this evidence have been suggested. Upon the one hand it was argued that defendant, after voluntarily surrendering his possession of the horses, and so extinguishing his lien, came with a lawless hand to retake them from their owner, prepared for this end to do murder if resisted; and that this motive dominated his conduct in the meeting at noon and the fatal later one. Upon the other hand, it was argued that the surrender of possession had been involuntary and that, consequently, defendant's right to possession still existed even against the owner, that his intent was therefore proper, and his purpose lawful. The absence of instructions upon these questions of law left the jury without rudder or compass. The true rule for measuring the acts of the parties not having been given them, each was at liberty to set up his own independent standard, and approve or condemn in accordance with it. The refusal to give these instructions thus constituted reversible error. People v. Taylor, 86 Cal. 255; People v. Keefer, 65 Cal. 232; People v. Rice, 97 Cal. 459.

The court gave an instruction prepared by defendant after modification. That instruction is as follows, the modification complained of being the italicized phrase inclosed in brackets: "I charge you that the law does not permit the taking of human life or the infliction of great bodily harm in the resisting of a mere trespass against personal property. Therefore, in the present case, should you find from the evidence that defendant attempted to regain possession of the horse returned by Pollock [in a peaceable manner] for the declared purpose of holding him for a reward, and that the deceased, Riley, resisted such attempt on the part of defendant by resorting to the use of a deadly weapon, or by attempting to kill Hecker or inflict upon him great bodily harm,—and there was imminent danger of his doing so,—then I charge that Riley was acting unlawfully and without right; and if under these circumstances, you find that Hecker, in order to protect himself from death or great bodily harm at the hands of Riley, shot and killed Riley, then I instruct you that he was justified in so doing, and you must acquit him. And, in this connection, I further instruct you that, if you so find, it makes no difference whether Hecker had a right to take the horse or not; Riley had no legal right to attempt to kill Hecker in resisting a mere trespass." The instruction was offered under defendant's claim of self-defense. As given, it was unobjectionable as a statement of the law excepting for the italicized insertion. One is not justified in taking human life to prevent the commission of a mere trespass, though any person in defense of property has the legal right to prevent the commission of a felony attempted by violence or surprise, and in so doing may use all necessary force, even to the

"(7) I instruct you as law that the finder of a thing lost, upon taking charge of it, stands in the same legal position as though the owner of the lost property had deposited it with him for hire; and, furthermore, that the finder of lost property is entitled to compensation for all expenses necessarily incurred by him in its preservation, and is also entitled to a reasonable reward for keeping it; and the finder of lost property has a lien upon it for the expenses incurred in its preservation, and for the reasonable reward to which he is entitled; and, in the event of the owner refusing or neglecting upon demand to pay the lawful charges and reward of the finder, the finder may refuse to surrender the property found to the owner, and may retain possession of it until his lien for charges and reward is satisfied.

"(8) If you find from the evidence in the present case that Riley, the deceased, lost his horses, and that Hecker, the defendant, found them and took charge of them, then I instruct you as law that Hecker had a lien on the horses for his compensation for all expenses necessarily incurred by him in their preservation, and for any services necessarily performed by him for the horses, and for a reasonable reward for keeping them; and, until these charges were paid, Hecker had the legal right to retain possession of the horses, and Riley, the deceased, had no right to take the horses away from Hecker, or to in any manner interfere with him, until he first paid or satisfied Hecker's lien.

"(9) I charge you that where a person has a lien on property found for the charges and reward, that such lien depends upon possession. A voluntary surrender by the finder to the owner extinguishes the lien, but an involuntary surrender or loss does not. If, therefore, you find from the evidence in the present case that defendant found the horses of deceased, and brought them to the town of Briceland, and placed them in the barn of one John Briceland, and that, at the time of bringing said horses to Briceland, deceased was absent; and if you further find that defendant did not voluntarily surrender said horses to deceased, but held them for the payment of his charges against them,—then I instruct you that he had not parted with his lien on them, and that if any one took one of said horses from said barn without defendant's consent, that said horse would still be subject to defendant's lien, and he would have the right to take possession of it wherever he might find it."

taking of life. Penal Code, § 197, subd. 2; People v. Payne, 8 Cal. 341; People v. Flanagan, 60 Cal. 2, 44 Am. Rep. 53; People v. Dunne, 80 Cal. 84. The ~~amen~~ment left the instruction confused and erroneous. The defendant was entitled to have the jury instructed that even if he was in the act of committing a forcible trespass in endeavoring to take the horse, if his act amounted to no more than a trespass, Riley was not justified in trying to kill him, if he did try, in attempting to prevent it. And if, under these circumstances, Riley did make the first felonious assault upon defendant, defendant, in turn, would be justified in killing Riley, if the circumstances of Riley's felonious assault were sufficient to excite defendant's fears, as a reasonable man that he was in danger of death or great bodily injury, and he acted under these fears alone, and had in good faith declined further struggle before firing the fatal shot, or was put in such sudden jeopardy by the acts of deceased that he could not withdraw, and if it was thus that Riley met his death. But as given, the court in effect told the jury that the defendant's rights were to be governed by their determination whether or not he was endeavoring to take possession of the horse in a peaceable manner. Even if a peaceable trespass be conceded, the jury was substantially told that Hecker's plea of self-defense under the hypothesis could not be upheld unless his act was a peaceable trespass. But such is not law. "Where the trespass is forcible against personal property, an owner may resist it, but he is not justified in killing the trespasser unless it is necessary to prevent a felonious destruction of the property, or to defend himself against loss of life or great bodily harm." Carroll v. State, 28 Ala. 28, 58 Am. Dec. 282; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 572; State v. Tarter, 26 Or. 38; State v. Perigo, 70 Iowa, 657.

The acts which a defendant may do and justify under the plea of self-defense depend primarily upon his own conduct, and secondarily upon the conduct of the deceased. There is no fixed rule applicable to every case, though certain general principles, well established, stand forth as guides for the action of men and measures for the jury's determination of their deportment:

First. Self-defense is not available as a plea to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with the design to force a deadly issue, and thus, through his fraud, contrivance, or fault, to create a real or apparent necessity for killing. People v. Robertson, 67 Cal. 646; Stewart v. State, 1 Ohio St. 66.

Second. It is not available as a plea to one who, by prearranged duel or by consent, has entered into a deadly mutual combat in which he slays his adversary. In both of these cases the same rule applies. A man may not wickedly or wilfully invite or create the appearances of necessity or the actual necessity which, if present to one without blame, would justify the homicide. State v. Parlow, 90 Mo. 608, 59 Am. Rep. 31; State v. Underwood, 37 Mo. 225; Lambert's Case, 9 Leigh, 605; 1 Bishop, Crim. L. § 870; Gilleland v. State, 44 Tex. 356; Clifford v. State, 58 Wis. 478; Tate v. State, 46 Ga. 151.

Third. Where one, without fault, is placed under circumstances sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable person that another designs to commit a felony or some great bodily injury upon him, and to afford grounds for reasonable belief that there is imminent danger of the accomplishment of this design, he may, acting under these fears alone, slay his assailant, and be justified by the appearances; and as, where the attack is sudden and the danger imminent, he may increase his peril by retreat, so situated he may stand his ground, that becoming his "wall," and slay his aggressor, even if it be proved that he might more easily have gained his safety by flight. People v. Herbert, 61 Cal. 544; People v. Gonzales, 71 Cal. 569; People v. Ye Park, 62 Cal. 204; People v. Robertson, 67 Cal. 650; Runyan v. State, 57 Ind. 84, 26 Am. Rep. 52; Brucin v. State, 29 Ohio St. 186, 28 Am. Rep. 733. So, too, under such circumstances, he may pursue and slay his adversary. But the pursuit must not be in revenge, not after the necessity for defense has ceased, but must be prosecuted in good faith to the sole end of winning his safety and securing his life. Carroll v. State, 28 Ala. 28, 58 Am. Dec. 282; Young v. Com. 6 Bush, 312; State v. Collins, 83 Iowa, 36; Horrigan & T. Cases on Self-Defense, p. 280.

Fourth. Where one is making a felonious assault upon another, or has created appearances justifying that other in making a deadly counter attack in self-defense, the original assailant cannot slay his adversary and avail himself of the plea, unless he has first and in good faith declined further combat, and has fairly notified him that he has abandoned the contest. And if the circumstances are such, arising either from the condition of his adversary, caused by the aggressor's acts during the affray, or from the suddenness of the counter attack, that he cannot so notify him, it is the first assailant's fault, and he must take the consequences (People v. Button, 106 Cal. 628, 28 L. R. A. 591; State v. Smith, 10 Nev. 106; Stoffer v. State, 15 Ohio St. 47, 86 Am. Dec. 470); for, as the deceased, acting upon the appearances created by the wrongful acts of the aggressor, would have been justified in killing him, he whose fault created these appearances cannot make the natural and legal acts of the deceased looking to his own defense a justification for the homicide. Before doing so he must have destroyed these appearances, and removed, to the other's knowledge, his necessity, actual or apparent, for self-preservation.

Fifth. Where one is the first wrongdoer, but his unlawful act is not felonious, as a simple assault upon the person of another, or a mere trespass upon his property, even though forcible, and this unlawful act is met by a counter assault of a deadly character, the right of self-defense to the first wrongdoer is not lost; for, as his acts did not justify upon the part of the other the use of deadly means for their prevention, his killing by the other would be criminal, and one may always defend himself against the criminal taking of his life. But in contemplation of the weakness and passions of men, and of the provocation, which, though inadequate, was wrongfully put upon the other, it is the duty of the first wrongdoer, before he can avail himself of the plea, to have retreated to the wall, to have declined the strife, and withdrawn from the difficulty, and to have killed his adversary, under necessity, actual or apparent, only after so doing. If, however, the counter assault be so sudden and perilous that no opportunity be given to decline or to make known to his adversary his willingness to decline the strife, if he cannot retreat with safety, then, as the greater wrong of the deadly assault is upon his opponent, he would be justified in slaying forthwith in self-defense. People v. Robertson, 87 Cal. 646; People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 308; State v. Perigo, 70 Iowa, 657. The distinction between this principle and the one preceding it consists in this: In the former case the provocation for making a deadly counter attack in self-defense is adequate, and therefore the first aggressor must remove the necessity for it, and make that fact known before his own right of self-defense can exist; in the latter case the provocation is inadequate, and if the other by his own unlawful act deprives the first wrongdoer of the opportunity to decline a deadly strife, that fault lies, not at the door of the slayer, but of the slain.

So much it has seemed necessary to say in view of the varying theories upon the facts attending this homicide, and in contemplation of a new trial.

If, at the time of the affray, Hecker was a trespasser, and no more, in his endeavor to take the horse, and Riley met his endeavor by a deadly assault upon him with a pistol, it was Hecker's first duty to decline the strife; and, if the suddenness of the assault precluded this, he was justified, so long as the imminence of his danger continued, or apparently continued, in meeting it by a deadly return. If, however, Hecker was not a wrongdoer in seeking to take the horse, and Riley met his attempt by a felonious assault with a pistol, Hecker, if the assault was sudden, and the danger great, or apparently great, would have been justified in standing his ground, or even, as above set forth, in pursuing and slaying his adversary, to win his safety. If, on the other hand, Hecker made the first deadly assault, his right to slay Riley in self-defense did not exist, even though willing thereafter to decline further combat until he had in good faith declined and fairly made known to Riley his willingness to do so. And, if he did not do this, even though he failed because of his own imminent danger, and under these circumstances killed Riley, his act was criminal. And, lastly, if, upon the other hand, he made the first felonious assault, and thereafter, and before firing the fatal shot, did in good faith withdraw and decline further combat, and this was fairly made known to Riley by his conduct, and thereafter Riley pursued him, and forced a new combat upon him, and under these circumstances Riley was killed, the killing was justifiable.

Defendant's proposed instruction No. 13,* as to the right to pursue and slay to secure safety, is, in itself, a correct, if not a full, exposition of the law, and it cannot be said that it does not address itself to a theory permissible under the evidence. It, or an equivalent instruction, should therefore have been given.

*"(13) I further charge you as law that a person in the exercise of self-defense, as I have stated it to you in the foregoing instructions, not only has the right to stand his ground and defend himself when attacked, but he may pursue his adversary until he has secured himself from danger; and if, in so doing, it be necessary, or upon reasonable grounds it appear necessary, to kill his antagonist, the killing is exculpable on the ground of self-defense."

It was not error to refuse defendant's proposed instruction 19*. The jury was advised as to the weight of evidence, number and credibility of witnesses. The vice of the rejected instruction was that he declared that the jury must be convinced to an "absolute moral certainty." The refusal to give such an instruction has more than once been upheld. People v. Davis, 64 Cal. 440; People v. Nelson, 85 Cal. 408; People v. Ferry, 84 Cal. 81; People v. Smith, 105 Cal. 676.

The instruction lettered O† is not erroneous. Standing by itself, it would be of little value to the jury, since it merely declares that the killing after withdrawal from the struggle might be justified. However, it is obviously but a preliminary declaration, as, in the instructions immediately succeeding (P‡ and

*"(19) Gentlemen of the jury, I charge you in this case you are the sole and exclusive judges of the truth of the facts that have been adduced in evidence, and of the credibility of the witnesses who have testified in your hearing; and, in this connection, I further charge you that you are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses which do not produce conviction in your minds, as against a less number or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying your minds. In other words, notwithstanding the number of witnesses that may testify, or the amount of evidence that may be introduced upon the part of the prosecution in a criminal case, unless the jury are thereby convinced to an absolute moral certainty of the guilt of the defendant, they must not return a verdict in accordance with such testimony. Upon the other hand, notwithstanding the small number of witnesses that may testify, or the small amount of material evidence that may be introduced on the part of the defense, if the jury are thereby led to believe the defendant is innocent of the crime charged, it is their solemn duty so to find, and their verdict must be, not guilty."

†"O. A homicide is justifiable when committed in the lawful defense of such person, but such person, if he was the assailant, must really and in good faith have endeavored to decline any further struggle before the homicide was committed. If the defendant himself brought on the fight, and went into it armed, and assaulted Riley in the first instance with a deadly weapon, he cannot justify killing him, unless he had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the killing occurred. If, however, the defendant was the assailant, if he had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle, and thereafter Riley assaulted him with a deadly weapon, the killing then might be justified by the defendant in self-defense."

‡"P. In other words, gentlemen of the jury, if you believe from the evidence that the defendant was the aggressor, and made an assault upon Riley with a deadly weapon, he cannot justify killing him, unless he had really and in good faith sought to avoid further conflict before the fatal shot was fired. In case, however, that the defendant was the assailant, if he had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the mortal wound was given, and thereafter Riley renewed the conflict and made an unlawful assault upon Hecker, then Hecker could justify the killing if it was done in necessary defense of his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily injury. In order to determine whether there was any such attempted withdrawal, and whether the defendant really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle, the jury are to take into consideration all the surrounding circumstances, the situation and conduct and relation of the parties at the time of the shooting, and all the other evidence in the case."

Q^o), there are set forth in detail the circumstances under the assumed state of facts which would and would not justify. These instructions will be construed together. People v. Turcott, 65 Cal. 126.

The court gave an instruction substantially as asked by defendant, but struck therefrom the closing sentence, as follows: "And if, under these circumstances, he killed deceased you must find, as your verdict, not guilty." The complaint is founded upon this excision. It is the natural tendency of advocates to bear with emphasis upon the favorable points both in argument and in instructions, and all the cases are replete, as is this case, with instructions asked by attorneys for the prosecution and defense, and closing with this or an equivalent formula. It cannot be said that to eliminate it from one instruction is error. Yet the practice is not wise. If the instruction offered is not the law, the court may reject it; if it be law, it is better to give it as presented, for not only has either party the right to emphasize by instructions a true principle, but the danger of modifying an instruction which is correct in itself is that it may occasion some just ground for complaint that the modification devitalizes and emasculates the proposition of law whose exposition was sought. We are far from implying that such was the effect in this case, still further from implying that such was the intent, but it certainly is not amiss to suggest the wiser and better practice.

Instruction E^t, which is complained of, has often been given and as often approved by this court. The cases in which it is discussed, are reviewed in People v. Bruggy, 93 Cal. 476. As was said by this court in People v. Herbert, 61 Cal. 544: "To justify a homicide, there must be a necessity, actual or apparent; and this we understand to be true under our statute as well as at common law." Those cases where the assailed is not required to look to escape as an avenue of safety, arise, as has been before discussed, where the peril is swift and imminent, and the necessity of action immediate. Therein the law does not weigh in too nice scales the conduct of the assailant, and say he shall not be justified because he might have resorted to other means to secure his safety. The suddenness of the attack puts him to the wall. Upon the duty of retreat there was a contrariety of opinion by the writers of common law, and this difference has found its way into the decisions of our states,—some, as Alabama and Iowa, holding to the rule that retreat is necessary; others, as Indiana, Michigan, and our own state, declaring for the contrary doctrine. But it is not stating it too strongly to say that the trend of later judicial decisions is in favor of the latter rule. So that while the killing must still be under an absolute necessity, actual or apparent, as a matter of law, that absolute necessity is deemed to exist when an innocent person is placed in such sudden jeopardy. The right to stand one's ground should form an element of the instructions upon the necessity of killing and the law of self-defense.

*Q. If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was the assailant, and fired the first shot that was fired and did not thereafter really and in good faith endeavor to decline any further struggle, and that the shots fired by Riley were shot by him in necessary self defense, as I have defined it to you, and that thereafter Riley ceased to fire, and then ran away to avoid the defendant; and if you further believe from the evidence that the defendant, Charles Hecker, with intent to wilfully and deliberately kill and murder the deceased pursued the deceased towards the granary, with his pistol in his hand for the purpose of overtaking the deceased and killing him; and you further believe from the evidence that the defendant, Charles Hecker, did pursue and overtake the deceased while he was thus fleeing and showing no disposition to kill and murder the defendant, Hecker and that the defendant then and there, without believing himself to be in danger of losing his own life or receiving great bodily injury at the hands of the deceased or having reasonable ground to believe himself in such danger, fired the fatal shot and killed deceased,—then I instruct you that in such case the defendant would not be justified under the law of self-defense."

*E. The law of self-defense is founded upon necessity, and, in order to justify the taking of life upon this ground, it must not only appear that the defendant had reason to believe, and did believe, that he was in danger of his life or of receiving great bodily harm, but it must also appear to the defendant's comprehension as a reasonable man that, to avoid such danger, it was absolutely necessary for him to take the life of the deceased."

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

S. M. BUCK, Resp.,
v.
City of EUREKA, Appl.
(..... Cal.....)

1. One who has accepted the appointment to an office having at least a potential existence, and has received the emoluments of it, is estopped from endeavoring to show to his own advantage that the office had never been lawfully created because it was not done in the proper mode, as by ordinance.
2. The duty of a city attorney to attend to "all suits, matters, and things" in which the city may be legally interested, under Pol. Code, § 4901, is not limited to suits in any particular courts.
3. A contract to pay a city attorney any compensation other than his salary for conducting litigation on behalf of the city, which is within the scope of his official duties, is void by public policy as well as by the provisions of Const. art. 11, § 9.
4. For services rendered after the expiration of his term of office under a void contract to pay an officer extra compensation, he cannot have any recovery under the contract, though he may be entitled to some compensation upon an implied contract.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Humboldt County

NOTE.—For contract with an officer to pay him extra compensation, see also Tipppecanoe County Comrs. v. Mitchell (Ind.) 15 L. R. A. 530, and note; Adams County v. Hunter (Iowa) 8 L. R. A. 614; Lancaster County v. Fulton (Pa.) 5 L. R. A. 426.

in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of professional services which plaintiff had rendered for defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. N. Gillett and E. W. Wilson, for appellant:

The services for which the contract of employment undertakes to provide, and which were covered by the first and second counts of the complaint, were within the sphere of the plaintiff's duties as city attorney, and such contract was therefore ultra vires and void.

The contract, being void, creates no obligation between the parties, and cannot form the basis of judicial proceedings.

Santa Clara Valley Mill & L. Co. v. Hayes, 76 Cal. 387.

The court erred in refusing to permit the defendant to show that the plaintiff after his nomination, confirmation, and qualification acted in the capacity of city attorney of the defendant corporation, and was so acting during the time the contract in controversy was made.

Messrs. S. M. Buck and F. A. Cutler, for respondent:

There was no office of city attorney of the city of Eureka.

In order that there may be a de facto officer there must be a de jure office; and the notion that there can be a de facto office has been characterized as a political solecism, without foundation in reason and without support in law.

The mayor and common council might appoint an attorney to give advice, and draw ordinances and do such legal business as they desire done in the city, and agree by ordinance to give him a specified monthly allowance.

Such act, however, would not create the office of city attorney; it would be simply an employment from month to month to act as attorney for the city.

Plaintiff is not estopped to deny that he acted in the official capacity of city attorney.

Jones v. Morgan, supra; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 479; Memphis v. Adams, 9 Heisk. 518, 34 Am. Rep. 335.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeals from the judgment entered upon verdict of jury, and from the order denying a new trial. Plaintiff sued the city of Eureka, and charged in his complaint upon three counts. In the first, he pleaded that one Wing Hing, upon January 31, 1886, brought action against the defendant, city of Eureka, in the circuit court of the ninth judicial circuit, to recover damages in the sum of $432,800. The city of Eureka, on the 8th day of February, 1886, employed and retained plaintiff to act for it as its attorney in the matter of said action, and agreed to pay him a reasonable compensation for his services, under resolution ordering: "That S. M. Buck, Esq., be, and he is hereby retained, and authorized to act for the city of Eureka as its attorney in defense of said action; and he is also authorized to retain and associate with himself in the defense of said action some able attorney and counselor residing in San Francisco, California, if in his judgment it becomes necessary. And said S. M. Buck, Esq., is instructed to conduct said defense as economically as it can be done consistent with a vigorous and successful defense thereof." Plaintiff performed all duties imposed upon him by his contract. The case in the circuit court was finally dismissed for lack of prosecution. The value of plaintiff's services is alleged to be $13,000, of which the city paid $1,000, and refused to pay more. The second count charges in like manner and for like services as the first, asking compensation, however, for so much of the services as was rendered after August 1, 1886. The value of this is alleged to be $10,000. The second count is apparently framed in anticipation of the defense presented by the city; namely, that at the time of the making of the contract plaintiff was, and continued to be until August 1, 1886, the city attorney of the city of Eureka. The third count charges for services in a different employment, and does not call for consideration or review. Judgment was asked for $7,000, with interest. A verdict in the sum of $4,250, with interest, was rendered; and this verdict, so far as the value of the services is concerned, is supported by the evidence. In defense of the action, the city of Eureka pleaded and sought to prove that, at the time of his employment, plaintiff was its city attorney, and that the contract was therefore void, as increasing his compensation during his term of office. Const. art. 11, § 9. By respondent it is contended (1) that the office of city attorney of the city of Eureka was never created; (2) that he was never the incumbent of such office; and (3) that if the office existed, and he was its incumbent, still he is entitled to compensation under the contract, since it was no part of his duty as such officer to defend the suit in question.

Certain provisions of part 4, title 3, of the Political Code were and are a part of the charter of the city of Eureka (Stat. 1878-74, p. 91). Those pertinent to this consideration are as follows:

"Sec. 4408. The common council has power: (1) To create the office of city clerk, city attorney, assessor, tax collector and such other offices as may be necessary, and prescribe their duties and fix their compensation. . . ."

"Sec. 4369. The common council must during the first year by ordinance fix the term of office of all elective officers and the time when they must be elected, and provide for the appointment of other necessary officers, including city clerk and treasurer, and fix their terms and amount of their bonds."

"Sec. 4386. The mayor has power: (1) To nominate and with the consent of the common council to appoint all nonelective officers of the city provided for by the common council, including city attorney, secretary of the council, and city treasurer. . . ."

"Sec. 4374. All city officers, before entering upon their duties, must take the oath of office. The marshal, attorney, clerk, assessor, collector, and treasurer must also give a bond with sureties to be approved by the mayor payable to the corporation by its corporate name in such penalty as may be prescribed by ordinance conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of their office, and a like bond may be required of any officer whose office is created by an ordinance."

"Sec. 4391. The city attorney must attend to all suits, matters, and things in which the city may be legally interested; to give his advice or opinion in writing whenever required by the mayor or common council, and do and perform all such things touching his office as by the common council may be required of him."

The defendant produced its records for the purpose of showing that plaintiff was nominated and confirmed as city attorney for the term of two years from July 12, 1884, to July 12, 1886, and that after such nomination he qualified and acted as such city attorney. The court refused to admit the proofs, and defendant then offered in evidence its records to show the existence of the office of the city attorney of the city of Eureka, and the plaintiff's incumbency therein during the time mentioned, which record evidence was stricken out upon motion of plaintiff. The evidence so offered and rejected consisted of various ordinances "fixing official fees and salaries in the city of Eureka," and dating from the year 1876. In each of these the council fixed the salary of the "city attorney." Finally, in 1893, by ordinance, the council declared that the city attorney shall receive a "salary of $35 a month." This ordinance was in force during all the time in question. In 1877 the council passed its ordinance "fixing the bonds of city officers," which provided that "the city officers hereinafter named, before entering upon the duties of their respective offices, shall give a bond," etc. "The penalty of such bonds shall be as follows: . . . The city attorney's bond, $1, 80 L. R. A.

000." This ordinance remained in full force and effect. The minutes of the meeting of the common council for July, 1884, show: "The mayor placed before the council the name of S. M. Buck for the position of city attorney for the ensuing term; whereupon, on motion, the nomination was confirmed." The bonds of the city officers for the terms commencing in 1884 could not be found, but the minutes of the council for August of that year show that "the mayor verbally announced to the council his approval of the bonds of . . . S. M. Buck as city attorney." There was likewise offered in evidence a document from the mayor's office, under the seal of the city, reciting the especial confidence reposed in the integrity and qualifications of S. M. Buck for the office of city attorney, and appointing him with consent of the council as city attorney for the term as established by law, etc., to which was appended the oath of S. M. Buck to support the Constitution of the United States and of this state, and faithfully discharge "the duties of the office of city attorney of the city of Eureka." It was likewise shown that plaintiff drew and received from the city the "salary" fixed by ordinance, of $25 per month during all of this time, up to July 12, 1886.

There can be no question upon this evidence, assuming for the moment the existence of the office, but that plaintiff was not only de facto city attorney, but that he was the regularly appointed, qualified, and acting city attorney,—a de jure officer,—charged with all the duties and entitled to all the emoluments of the office. There can be no better proof of the acceptance and holding of an office than the qualification of the officer, and his drawing of the salary. Here, the plaintiff was appointed as city attorney, filed his bond as city attorney, took the oath of office as city attorney, and drew the fixed salary of city attorney, all duly and regularly, as required by law and the ordinance of the city.

Nor can plaintiff be heard to say (still assuming the existence of the office) that his contract with the city, or his understanding with the council, imposed upon him other or different or lesser duties than those which by law he was obliged to perform. He cannot, for example, be heard to say, as here he undertakes to do, in the face of the ordinance fixing his compensation, that his understanding with the council was that they were to give him $25 a month as a "retainer,"—a "stipend,"—and were to pay him "extra for all important duties, particularly business in the superior court, or business in the higher courts." It was not within the power of the plaintiff or of the council to modify, by convention, the duties which by law were made to pertain to the office of city attorney. Pol. Code, §4391. And the plaintiff, after having qualified, filed his bond, and taken his oath to perform the duties of the office, and drawn the salary pertaining thereto, will not be permitted to assert that the duties he swore to perform were not those the performance of which the law made obligatory upon him.

The contention that he was not city attorney cannot, then, be based upon any defect in the machinery of appointment, nor upon plaintiff's refusal, with proper formalities, to accept the appointment. It is claimed to rest upon the fact that the council, notwithstanding its repeated recognition of the existence of the office, never in fact created it, and that, therefore, it never existed. And the argument is that the council had power to create the office (Pol Code, § 4408); that they were required, if they created it, to do so by ordinance (Id. § 4869); that the mode is the measure of their power; and that no ordinance was produced wherein and whereby the common council of the city Eureka did ordain that the office of city attorney of the city of Eureka is hereby created.

It is a general rule, founded upon the dictates of public policy, that the acts of a de facto officer are valid, and that those who deal with such an officer are protected. The public is not required to know the terms and tenure upon which one openly holding and claiming the right to hold a public office maintains his position; nor is any person who has dealt with such an officer to suffer loss if the tenure should prove illegal. So, likewise, it is the general rule, upon grounds of plain justice and public policy, that a de facto officer is forever estopped in civil or criminal actions from denying that he holds the office, and from escaping any of the responsibilities which attach to his incumbency. But the further rule is that the law as to de facto officers applies only where there is a de jure office, the idea of a de facto officer being necessarily founded upon the conception of a de jure office. A de jure office is one having a legal existence, or, rather, one having an existence recognized by law. We are not here further concerned with the law concerning de facto offices, since, as has been said, this office, if it existed, was filled by a de jure incumbent. While it is certainly impossible to conceive of an officer either de facto or de jure filling or attempting to fill a nonexistent office, there is a marked and well-recognized distinction between such nonexistent offices and those which, while having an irregular or merely potential, or in some instances even an illegal, existence, yet do exist, and are recognized by the law. Of offices having an illegal existence which are, nevertheless, recognized, the government of a state in rebellion and of a municipality acting as such without legal authority are conspicuous examples. The government of a state in rebellion and all officers thereunder are absolutely illegal; yet, upon strong and plain grounds of public policy, the government and officers are recognized by law, and the incumbents are treated as de facto officers. "In such a case the acts of a de facto executive, a de facto judiciary, and of a de facto legislature, must be recognized as valid. But this is required by political necessity." Hildreth v. McIntire, 1 J. J. Marsh. 207, 19 Am. Dec. 61. So a municipal corporation acting under color of the law may have no legal existence, and consequently no legal municipal offices; yet such a corporation has still an existence recognized by law, and, upon plain grounds of public policy, the question of its legal existence should be raised only by the state itself upon quo warranto. Cooley, Const. Lim. 254; Geneva v. Cole, 61 Ill. 397; St. Louis Comrs. v. Shields, 62 Mo. 247; State v. Carr, 5 N. H. 367.

In some states, indeed, it is the established rule that officers filling offices created by unconstitutional laws are, nevertheless, de facto officers, until, under direct proceedings, the act has been declared unconstitutional. Thus, in Burt v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 81 Minn. 479, it was held that the municipal court of Mankato was a de facto court, and that there can be a de facto office under an unconstitutional act creating it until the act is declared void. In the case of Trumbo v. People, 75 Ill. 561, a school district had been illegally established. The supreme court of Illinois, reviewing the case in a later opinion (Leach v. People, 123 Ill. 420), says: "So far as that alleged district was concerned, there was no such legal district, and there was no de jure office of school director of that alleged district." Yet, upon a proceeding to collect a tax, the tax was sustained, it being held that the school directors were officers de facto, and that in collateral proceedings the legality of the formation of the district could not be inquired into. And in Com. v. McCombe, 56 Pa. 486, it is said: "An act of the assembly even if it be unconstitutional, is sufficient to give color of authority to the person acting under it." These decisions are in obvious conflict with the authority of the great leading cases of State v. Carroll, 88 Conn. 449, 9 Am. Rep. 409, and Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425, 80 L. ed. 178; in the latter of which Field, J., explains that, while there are many cases deciding that a person holding an office under an unconstitutional law is a de facto officer, in every one it will be found that there was a legal office, and that the unconstitutional law went only to the mode or manner of filling it. And they are likewise in conflict with the rule in this state, declared in People v. Toal, 85 Cal. 333. They are not here cited in commendation or approval, but as instructive examples of the lengths to which those courts have felt compelled to go in carrying out what they conceived to be the plain mandate of public policy. When, however, we come to consider the doctrine as applied to offices having an irregular or potential existence (as distinguished from a nonexistent office, or one void in its creation), the cases are numerous and uniform in treating the incumbents of such offices as de facto officers.

In Gibb v. Washington, McAll. 430, Fed. Cas. No. 5,880, dealing with the question of the creation of the office of appraiser, the court says: "If such an office has been even colorably created, then any irregularity which does not render the creation of the office void cannot be availed of." In Re Ah Lee, 6 Sawy. 410, 5 Fed. Rep. 899, the Constitution of Oregon provided that, when the population of the state reached 200,000, the legislature should district the state into designated circuits, and provided for the election of judges to the circuit courts therein. The legislature passed the act before the state attained the requisite population, and before election, the governor, without authority, appointed the judge whose act was under review. The court held that, admitting the act to be unconstitutional and the appointment of the governor to be invalid, still the judge was a judge de facto, since the office in effect was created by the Constitution. In Carlton v. People, 10 Mich. 250, the county officers were elected before the law creating the offices went into effect. They were held to be de facto officers. Though there were no legal offices in existence at the time, still the offices were created and had a potential existence. And the court, in distinguishing between such offices and nonexistent offices, aptly says: "Where the law negatives the idea that there can be a legal incumbent, any one assuming to act assumes what any one is bound to know is not a legal office." In Forty v. Paine, 62 Wis. 154, the legislative act creating the town of Pine River provided that the electors should meet upon the first Tuesday of the following April (April 4), and elect town officers, but the act itself did not become a law until four days afterwards,—April 8. The potential existence of the town was recognized as sufficient for holding the election, and the officers were declared to be de facto, though elected without authority of law to offices then having no more than a potential existence. In Fowler v. Beebe, 9 Mass. 231, 6 Am. Dec. 62, the legislature had created a new county and the offices thereof. The governor appointed officers before the law went into effect. It was held that their acts were binding as de facto officers, though the appointments themselves were afterwards declared void by the same court when the question was presented upon direct attack. Com. v. Fowler, 10 Mass. 291. Here, too, therefore, the potential existence of the office was recognized. In Leach v. People, 122 Ill. 420, an unconstitutional law regulating township organizations provided for the number of members, mode of election, etc., of the board of supervisors, and under this law a board was selected whose acts were under consideration. It was held that, notwithstanding the invalidity of the law, there was still "such a legal official body known to the law as the 'Board of Supervisors of Wayne County;'" and the acting board, though in number and in mode of selection illegal, was upheld as a de facto body. The case of Smith v. Lynch, 29 Ohio St. 261, is nearly a parallel case with the one at bar. The legislature of Ohio authorized villages and towns to establish boards of health and appoint members. The village of West Cleveland, by a void ordinance, attempted to do this. The members appointed qualified and entered upon the discharge of their duties, and were accepted and regarded by the public as such members. The opinion of the court, delivered by Welch, Ch. J., is as follows: "The questions argued by counsel are: (1) Had the superior court jurisdiction? (2) Are the requirements of the statute as to the manner of passing the ordinance mandatory, or are they merely directory? (3) If these requirements are mandatory, are the persons so acting to be regarded as a board of health de facto? We are satisfied that the last named of these questions must be answered in the affirmative. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the first and second questions. In other words, we think that, under the circumstances, the board is to be regarded as a board de facto. Whether it was a board de jure, and whether the superior court had jurisdiction of the case, became, therefore, immaterial questions. It is claimed by counsel for the plaintiff that this is not a case where an office has been filled, and its duties performed, by parties not legally appointed or qualified, but a case where there was no office to be filled. We do not so understand the law. The statute (66 Ohio Laws, p. 200) creates the office. It authorizes the council to 'establish' the board, and to fill it by appointment. True, until the council act in the premises, it is a mere potentiality in their hands; yet it is none the less an office, known to the law. Where the council assumes to establish the board under the law, and to appoint its members, there is no good reason why an irregularity or illegality in the act of establishing the office, any more than the irregularity or illegality in the appointment of the officers, should be held as rendering the acts of the officers void, and themselves mere trespassers. The reasons—the considerations of public policy—which exist in one case exist equally in the other. It is enough that the office is one provided for by law, and that the parties have the color of appointment, assume to be and act as such officers, and that they are accepted and acknowledged by the public as such, to the exclusion of all others. Such was the case here. There was both the color and the fact of office."

The office under consideration was given a potential existence by the acts of the legislature in the sections of the Code above quoted. The plaintiff, having accepted the appointment to it, and received the emoluments of it, is estopped from endeavoring to show to his own advantage that the council did not follow a prescribed mode in perfecting that potential existence. It was therefore error for the trial court to strike out the admitted evidence. It does not seem to be disputed that, if plaintiff's services in the case of Wing Hing v. Eureka were such as under his office he was in duty bound to perform, his contract with the council would be void as an attempt to increase his compensation; and, indeed, no question can arise upon this point. It is definitely settled by the language of the Constitution, in the first place (Const. art. 11, § 9); and in the second place, even in the absence of such a provision, such a contract would be declared void upon grounds of public policy. "It is a well-settled rule that a person accepting a public office, with a fixed salary, is bound to perform the duties of the office for the salary. He cannot legally claim additional compensation for the discharge of these duties, even though the salary be a very inadequate remuneration for the services. . . . Whenever he considers the compensation inadequate, he is at liberty to resign. The rule is of importance to the public. To allow changes and additions in the duties properly belonging or which may properly be attached to an office to lay the foundation for extra compensation, would introduce intolerable mischief. The rule, too, should be rigidly enforced." Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 233; Mechem, Pub. Off. §§ 324-376.

The contention here is, however, that these services were not among those whose performance is enjoined on the city attorney, and herein plaintiff relies upon the case of Herrington v. Santa Clara County, 44 Cal. 496. As the law then stood, the district attorney was entitled to receive as compensation 10 per cent of all money recovered by him, for the county in any action. The county supervisors, ignoring the district attorney, authorized other attorneys to bring suit without the county for the recovery of a large sum of money. Recovery was had in the action, and the district attorney sued to recover his percentage. The law made it the duty of the district attorney to prosecute all actions for the recovery of debts, etc., and to defend all suits brought against his county. Pol. Code, § 4256. The district attorney was not denying that it was his duty to prosecute this suit, but, to the contrary insisted that it was his duty. The defendant county never claimed that it was not the district attorney's duty to prosecute the suit, but insisted that the duty was not exclusively imposed upon and the right not exclusively vested in him, but that the supervisors could, if they saw fit, engage other counsel to perform the service, as in many cases special counsel are employed. The language of the court in its opinion, therefore, while not obiter, was not addressed to any contention raised by the parties. The decision of the court was by a bare majority; Chief Justice Wallace being disqualified, and Justice Rhodes expressing no opinion. It was based upon two grounds; the second, which is argued at length, holding that, as the district attorney had not collected the money, he was not entitled to his commission; and the first, which is not argued, being a declaration to the effect that it was "not a duty enjoined upon the district attorney by law to prosecute or defend civil actions in which the county is interested which are pending in any other county than his own." This declaration is, however, supported by no reasoning, by no analysis of the statute, and by no citation of authority; and it would be difficult so to support it. Says Dillon: "The statutes of the legislature and the ordinances of our municipal corporations seldom prescribe with much detail and particularly the duties annexed to public offices; and it requires but little ingenuity to run nice distinctions between what duties may and what may not be considered strictly official; and if these distinctions are much favored by courts of justice, it may lead to great abuse." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 283.

When the law of the state says that the district attorney shall prosecute and defend all suits, and the city attorney shall attend to "all suits, matters, and things in which the city may be legally interested," it is a most forced and unwarranted construction to hold that in the one case it means only such suits as are commenced and finally determined in the county courts, and in the other only such as are in like manner commenced and determined in the municipal courts. If the legislature meant that, it could and would have said so. But when it says "all suits, matters, and things," the language will bear no other construction than that which is patent on its face. No rules of interpretation are necessary to be considered, for no need or room for interpretation exists. Thus the court, in Ryce v. Osage, 88 Iowa, 558, said the law made it the duty of the city attorney "to act as attorney for the city in any suit or action brought by or against the city, and generally to attend to the interests of the city as its attorney." There, as here, plaintiff claimed extra compensation for services rendered under contract with the counsel for defending an action against the city in the district and supreme court, and there, as here, urged that it was no part of his official duty to defend the suit. Says the court: "It seems to us that a mere reading of that section of the ordinance which prescribes the duties of the city attorney is sufficient to show that under it he was required to act for the city, as its attorney, in any case brought by or against it. . . . That the services rendered by the plaintiff, and for which he now seeks to recover, were included within his duties as city attorney, is too plain to admit of argument." In Lancaster County v. Fulton, 126 Pa. 48, 5 L. R. A. 486, construing a similar statute, says the court: "The services for which the contract in question undertakes to provide, are clearly within the sphere of the duties of the solicitor of Lancaster county." Russell v. Hallett, 28 Kan. 276, is not in conflict with the authorities upon this question. In that case the county attorney sued his county for compensation for services demanded of him without the duties of his office, as the court decided. He had been compelled to assist in a trial in a county other than his own. The law expressly limited his duty to attend before magistrates and judges in his county. Kan. Gen. Stat. 1868, p. 284, § 187.

But it is unnecessary to multiply quotations upon this plain proposition. We think it must be apparent that the construction given to the statute in Herrington v. Santa Clara County, supra, cannot be supported, and should no longer be maintained; and we believe that the evil results to the public service which must arise under that construction justify and demand a declaration from this court that it be no longer considered as authority. It is of the last importance that any and every public officer entering upon the discharge of his duties should know once and for all that, be the duties onerous or be they easy, the compensation for them must be that fixed by law, and that only. If they become too burdensome, the law does not forbid the officer's resignation; but it does emphatically say that he shall not under any circumstances, by use of the power of his office, by contract, express or implied, fair or unfair, or by aid even of legislative enactment, obtain increased compensation for their performance. "The successful effort to obtain office is not unfrequently speedily followed by efforts to increase its emoluments; while the incessant changes which the progressive spirit of the times is introducing effects, almost every year, changes in the character, and additions to the amount, of duty in almost every official station; and to allow these changes and additions to lay the foundation of claims for extra services would soon introduce intolerable mischief." Evans v. Trenton, 24 N. J. L. 764.

The services here performed by the plaintiff being such as it was his duty to perform as the city attorney of the city of Eureka, the contract was an attempt to increase his compensation, and is in violation of the Constitution, against public policy, and therefore void. "A promise to pay them [officers] extra compensation, is absolutely void, under the statute of Ohio. Such promise could not be enforced at common law, being against sound policy, and quasi extortion. English judges have declared that such claims by them are novel in courts of justice, and that actions founded on such promises are scandalous and shameful (2 Burr. 934); and in the court of errors of New York they meet with no more favor. Hatch v. Mann, 15 Wend. 46." Gillmore v. Lewis, 12 Ohio, 281; Vandercook v. Williams, 106 Ind. 345; Decatur v. Vermillion, 77 Ill. 315; Hunter v. Nolf, 71 Pa. 282.

Nor can plaintiff recover under the contract, as by his second count he seeks to do, for such part of the services as was rendered after his term of office had expired. This is not the case of a city attorney carrying on litigation, after his term of office had expired, with the knowledge and consent of the authorities, in which case an implied contract and promise to pay might arise after his tenure had terminated. Here plaintiff declares on and seeks to recover under a contract against public policy and wholly void. Such a contract will not support any action for recovery. As is said by the court in Lancaster County v. Fulton, supra: "There is no pretense that any new agreement was entered into or the terms of the original in any manner changed after the expiration of his term of office. Neither the subject of a new contract nor the modification of the original ever appears to have been considered by the parties. The services of plaintiff below were no doubt efficient and valuable; but, so far as they were rendered during his term of office, his salary is all the compensation he can claim. As to services rendered after the expiration of his term of office, under and in pursuance of the original illegal and void contract, he cannot, under the pleadings and evidence in this case, recover." A void contract cannot form the basis of a judicial proceeding. Santa Clara Valley Mill & L. Co. v. Hayes, 76 Cal. 387.

There are considerations in plaintiff's case which appeal with force to a court. In the first place, the services rendered, as found by judge and jury, were of great value to defendant. In the second place, they were rendered under an early interpretation given to the statute, which justified plaintiff in suing upon his contract. In now declaring what we believe to be the only tenable construction of the law relative to the duties of the office, it has followed as a necessary consequence that the contract, void as against public policy, will not support a cause of action. Plaintiff, however, if the facts will warrant it, should recover, not upon the original or void contract, but upon an implied one for services rendered after the expiration of his term of office.

The judgment and order are reversed, with directions to the trial court to permit plaintiff, if he shall be so advised, to amend his complaint, or file an amended complaint, seeking compensation upon quantum meruit for services rendered after the expiration of his term of office.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Montana, as rel. Sam TOI, Resp.,
v.

E. S. FRENCH, Appt.

(.....Mont.....)

1. Imposing on laundrymen the payment of a license fee of $15 for a steam laundry, $10 for every male person in the business other than that of a steam laundry, and $35 for a male laundryman employing one or more other persons, does not grant a monopoly or have a prohibitory effect.

2. The uniformity clause of Const. art. 12, § 1, relating to taxation, does not apply to licenses imposed on occupations.

NOTE.—Limit of amount of license fees.

I. Power to fix license fees generally.

II. Constitutional restrictions as to amount.

a. Provisions against discrimination.

b. Provisions against violation of contract obligations.

c. Provisions requiring equality and uniformity.

d. Direct restrictions as to amount of levy.

e. Miscellaneous provisions.

III. Graduation of license fees.

IV. Limitations peculiar to municipal corporations.

a. Statutory and charter restrictions.

b. Must not be discriminating.

c. Under a general power to regulate.

1. What may be included in the fee.

2. Must not be for revenue.

3. Distinction between measures for revenue and for regulation.

4. Must not be unreasonable or in restraint of trade.

5. Reasonableness, by whom determined.

6. Presumption of reasonableness.

7. What impositions are reasonable.

d. Under a power to restrain or prohibit.

e. Under a power to tax or license.

f. When discretion is expressly conferred.

I. Power to fix license fees generally.

The power of a sovereign state to fix license fees at such figures as it may see fit would appear to be unlimited, except in cases in which its exercise would conflict with some constitutional provision.

Thus, the legislature of a state may impose such license taxes upon privileges as it may choose. Columbia v. Bealy, 1 Humph. 232, 34 Am. Dec. 646 (1839).

And it may, in regulating any matter which is a proper subject for the police power, impose such sums for licenses as will operate as a partial restraint on the business or on the keeping of a particular kind of property. Tenney v. Lens, 15 Wis. 536 (1838).

And in the exercise of the police power it might prohibit altogether the sale of liquors, and consequently may attach such conditions to the allowance of their sale as it sees fit to prescribe. Timm v. Harrison, 109 Ill. 593 (1884) (dictum).

And it may prohibit or permit the doing business in the state by foreign insurance companies, as it sees fit, and if it is permitted it may impose such conditions and restrictions, and require such payment, for the privilege as it may choose. Milwaukee Fire Department v. Helfenstein, 15 Wis. 137 (1862); Leavenworth v. Booth, 15 Kan. 637 (1875) (dictum).

3. The fact that Chinamen are engaged in the hand-laundry business does not make invalid a statute imposing a license fee of $25 on a male laundryman employing one or more other persons in such business, while the fee for a steam laundry is $15, where the law in its terms applies to all male laundrymen of every condition and nationality.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Lewis and Clarke County in favor of relator in a mandamus proceeding to compel defendant to issue a license to relator to conduct a laundry. Reversed.

Statement by De Witt, J.:

This is an appeal from the judgment of the district court upon an application for a writ of mandate requiring the appellant to accept $10 as a license fee from the respondent, and to issue to respondent a license to conduct a laundry. Sections 4079 and 4080 of the Political Code are as follows:

"Sec. 4079. Every male person engaged in the laundry business, other than the steam laundry business, must pay a license of $10 per quarter; provided, that where more than one person is engaged or employed or kept at work, such male person or persons shall pay a license of $25 per quarter, which shall be the license for one place of business only.

"Sec. 4080. Every person who carries on a steam laundry must pay a license of $15 per quarter."

So, it may properly delegate the power to license and to fix the fees to be paid for the license, to municipal subdivisions and bodies. See infra, IV. c. f.

And where by the charter of a city a power to license a particular occupation is given, such power involves the necessity of determining both the extent and duration of the license and the sum to be paid therefor. Darling v. St. Paul, 19 Minn. 399 (1873) (dictum).

A city council having power to license and regulate may require a reasonable sum by way of an excise for granting such license. Cincinnati v. Bryson, 15 Ohio, 625, 45 Am. Dec. 593 (1846).

Where a municipal corporation is authorized to regulate a given subject and require those who do any act or carry on any business to obtain a license, a reasonable fee for the license and the labor or expense attending its issue may be properly charged, although the power to do so is not expressly given. St. Paul v. Dow, 37 Minn. 20 (1887); Jacksonville v. Ledwith, 26 Fla. 168, 9 L. R. A. 69 (1890).

See, as to the requirement of reasonableness, which appears to be applicable to municipal corporations only, infra, IV. c. 4-7.

II. Constitutional restrictions as to amount.

Various constitutional provisions have been frequently interposed, sometimes successfully, as furnishing a limitation either directly or relatively, upon the discretion of legislative and municipal bodies in fixing the amount of license fees; such provisions applying of course, when deemed applicable, alike to state and to municipal licenses.

a. Provisions against discrimination.

Provisions against discrimination sometimes act as a limitation, preventing the imposition of a license fee upon one class of subjects relatively larger than that imposed upon another class.

Thus, a license tax of $300 per annum, imposed upon persons not permanent residents in the state upon the sale of any goods other than agricultural products and articles manufactured in the state, conflicts with the provision of the Federal Constitution that citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, where the tax imposed upon resident traders ranges from $12 to $150 per annum. Ward v. Maryland, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. ed. 449 (1871).

And a license tax imposed by statute upon vendors of patent rights or territory for the sale of patent rights or patented articles, of double the amount of that imposed upon other peddlers, is invalid as discriminating against peddlers of patent rights, as well as being a tax upon a patent right. Re Sheffield, 64 Fed. Rep. 838 (1894).

So, an ordinance imposing a license fee of $25 upon nonresident hawkers and peddlers, and only $10 upon those residing in the city, is illegal in so far as it imposes a larger tax on nonresidents. State v. Orange, 50 N. J. L. 399 (1888).

And a license fee of $100 imposed upon keepers of meat shops in one part of a city, and of $25 in other parts, is a tax for revenue purposes, and unconstitutional as such for discrimination between different portions of the city. St. Louis v. Spiegel, 75 Mo. 148 (1881).

So, an ordinance imposing a license fee upon transient merchants doing business in the town, designed to discriminate in favor of resident merchants and against all others, conflicts with the provision of the Federal Constitution giving power to Congress to regulate commerce between the states, and with that of the state of Iowa, that laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation. Pacific Junction v. Dyer, 64 Iowa, 38 (1894).

But a license tax imposed by a city, of $2 per year upon hand carts, of $3 for buggies, and so on for vehicles of a different character, and finally of $30 per year for a six-horse omnibus, is not unconstitutional because of discrimination or as being in violation of natural rights. St. Louis v. Green, 7 Mo. App. 468 (1879).

And a license tax of $85, imposed by statute on persons dealing in distilled liquors or retailing spirituous liquors on land, is not unconstitutional for unjust discrimination because a tax of only $50 is levied on persons following a like occupation on steamboats, though such steamboats ply between places in a single parish only. Kaliski v. Grady, 25 La. Ann. 576 (1879).

And Ga. act Feb. 16, 1876, requiring persons employed in hiring laborers in the state for employment outside its limits to procure a license and pay $100 therefor for revenue purposes, is not unconstitutional as discriminating between residents and nonresidents. Shepherd v. Sumpter County Comrs. 59 Ga. 539, 37 Am. Rep. 394 (1877).

See also, as to fixing different rates for different classes of callings, infra, II. c. and III. And see generally, as to discrimination in fixing municipal license fees, infra, IV. b.

And see, in connection with this subdivision, the principal case, STATA, TOX v. FRENCH.

Discrimination against nonresidents by imposing license taxes is not considered here further than it depends upon the amount of the charge. Many other cases decide that such burdens which are placed only upon nonresidents are unconstitutional.

As to discrimination against foreign corporations, see note to Cone Export & C. Co. v. Poole (S. C.) 24 L. R. A. 239 (1894).

b. Provisions against violation of contract obligations.

Licenses are not contracts which cannot be changed within the constitutional prohibition against violation of contract obligations, and when required for regulation they do not violate a

The respondent here, Sam Toi, appeared in the district court, and filed a petition praying for a writ of mandamus, in which petition he set forth as follows: That appellant is the treasurer of Lewis and Clarke county, and that it was his duty to issue licenses when tendered the fees therefor; that respondent is a male person, a resident of the county, and engaged in the laundry business, other than a steam laundry, and that he is employing male persons other than himself in such business; that he tendered to the said treasurer the sum of $10, and demanded that the treasurer issue to him a license for the conduct of the laundry business; that the treasurer refused to issue said license unless the respondent paid him the fee of $25, as required by section 4079, Pol. Code.

The county attorney filed a demurrer to this petition, upon the ground that it did not set up facts sufficient to warrant the issuing of the writ of mandamus. The demurrer was overruled, and the writ was issued, commanding the treasurer to receive from the respondent the sum of $10, and issue to him a license for the conduct of said laundry business. From this judgment the respondent below appeals. There are some other matters set up in the petition for the writ, which will be noticed as the subject is treated in the opinion below.

Mr. H. J. Haskell, for appellant:

The license is uniform on all persons engaged in carrying on the same class of laundries.

contract not to tax, but the rule is different where they are exacted for the purpose of revenue.

Thus, a license to sell liquor is a mere permit to engage in that business, and not a contract guaranteeing that the state will not increase the amount required to be paid therefor. Hadtner v. Williamsport, 15 W. N. C. 138 (1888).

And the same was held in Moore v. Indianapolis, 120 Ind. 483 (1889), with reference to the power of a municipality to raise the price of a license for the unexpired period before its expiration.

So, a franchise conferred by the legislature on private persons to construct a railroad track through the streets of a city and run cars thereon, prescribing certain conditions to be performed by the grantees, is not a contract which will exempt the occupation of operating the road from a tax imposed by the city under a power to license and regulate occupations. San José v. San José & S. O. R. Co. 58 Cal. 475 (1879).

And a provision in the charter of a city railroad company that the company shall pay such license for each car run as is paid by other passenger railroad companies in a city, which is $30, is not a contract that the license fee should never exceed such sum. Union Pass. R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 101 U. S. 423, 25 L. ed. 913 (1879).

Nor do a license fee of $5 on each car of a railroad company, imposed by a city, and a subsequent bond required by ordinance for faithful compliance with regulations, etc., given by the railroad company as a condition for the consent to its occupancy of its streets, constitute a contract with the city that such license fee shall not be varied or increased. Johnson v. Philadelphia, 60 Pa. 445 (1869).

And the right of a municipality to require payment of a license fee of $50 per year for each boat used, under a charter authorizing it to license, tax, and regulate ferries, is not affected by a provision in the charter of the ferry company that it should be subject to the same taxes as should be imposed on other ferries and under the same regulations and forfeitures, where other ferries are required by general law to pay to the county not less than $5 nor more than $300, such charge being a license fee and not a tax. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 103 Ill. 560 (1882).

In Howland v. Chicago, 103 Ill. 500 (1884), it was said that it was decided in Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, supra, that a license fee exacted for the mere purpose of revenue, for a license to do that which the exactor had no power to forbid, is not a tax in the sense of the Constitution.

An imposition by a municipal council of a license tax upon the cars of a railroad company within its limits for the purpose of raising revenue, however, would be an invasion of the chartered rights of a company and void where its charter subjected it to certain regulations of the municipality with relation to paving, grading, etc., and exempted it from other municipal control. Johnson v. Philadelphia, supra.

And a municipal requirement of an annual license fee of $60 for large cars and $25 for small cars, imposed upon a street-railroad company, which regulated nothing except to prohibit the running of the cars without such payment, is not a measure of regulation, but the imposition of a tax upon the company in derogation of its rights to property acquired under a precedent contract for the use and occupation of the streets. New York v. Second Ave. R. Co. 32 N. Y. 231, 34 Barb. 43 (1855).

Nor can a municipal corporation exact an additional license fee from a telephone company for the purpose of revenue only, where such companies are required to pay to the state annually a license fee for carrying on other business, which is declared to be in lieu of all taxes for any purposes authorized by the laws of the state. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Oshkosh, 63 Wis. 82 (1884).

a. Provisions requiring equality and uniformity.

The provision found in the Constitutions of most of the states, requiring taxation to be equal and uniform, is the one which has been most frequently interposed with a view to limiting the license fees imposed upon one class or locality so as to be uniform with those imposed upon others; but while there is some conflict of authority, the great majority of the decisions have declined to give that effect to the provision, though they have placed such refusal upon different grounds.

Thus, it has been held that a license fee is not a tax within constitutional restrictions upon the power to tax.

This is the rule of the principal case, STATE TOI, v. FRENCH.

And this was decided in Chilvers v. People, 11 Mich. 43 (1862), with reference to a fee for the privilege of running a ferry.

And in Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 103 Ill. 560 (1882), with reference to a license fee of $50 annually for each boat, required of a ferry.

And in People v. Thurber, 13 Ill. 554 (1852), with reference to a license fee of 8 per cent on the amount of premiums charged by persons acting as agents for foreign insurance companies.

And in Braun v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 126 (1884), with reference to an ordinance requiring a license fee of $100 of bankers and of $25 of commission merchants, brokers, and money changers.

So, in Charity Hospital v. Stickney, 2 La. Ann. 550 (1847), a charge of $520 annually, imposed on theaters for the benefit of a charity hospital, was attacked as unconstitutional, but upheld on the ground that the exaction was the price of a license, and not a tax.

And a license tax imposed upon liquor dealers is

The legislature is authorized to divide a business into classes for the purpose of imposing a license tax.

People v. Henderson, 12 Colo. 869.

If it operates on all alike who fall into the same class, the constitutional requirement that "taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects" is satisfied.

Even within the class taxed, however, there may be rules of distinction, and these are perfectly admissible, provided they are general rules and are observed.

not a state tax and is not therefore unjust or unequal because levied on all dealers alike without regard to the amount of business done by each. Youngblood v. Sexton, 22 Mich. 406, 20 Am. Rep. 654 (1875).

Nor is Idaho act 1881, § 1, providing for the payment of $500 per year, or a proportionate amount for each fraction of a year, for a license to sell intoxicating liquor in towns in which a designated vote was cast for governor at the last general election, and $800 in all other cities and towns, and $100 for licenses for hotels outside of cities, towns, villages, and hamlets, within Idaho Const. art. 7, §§ 2, 5, requiring equality and uniformity of taxation upon the same classes of subjects. State v. Doherty, 2 Idaho 1105 (1892).

And a statute requiring a license fee of $10 of all liquor dealers in addition to all other licenses required by law, and providing that the moneys received therefrom shall constitute a fund for the foundation and maintenance of an asylum for inebriates, is within the police powers of the legislature and not in violation of the constitutional provisions against unequal taxation. State v. Cassidy, 22 Minn. 812, 21 Am. Rep. 765 (1875).

And Ala. act Jan. 18, 1884, authorizing and requiring the probate judge of the county to collect a tax of $50 on licenses for the retailing of spirituous liquors in the city of Mobile, for the use of the Mobile school commissioners, is a police regulation which may be graduated by the populousness of the community in which the privilege is to be exercised, and by the profitability of the employment, and not subject to the objection that it is not levied equally throughout the taxable district. Ex parte Marshall, 64 Ala. 266 (1879), Stone, J., dissenting.

So, a municipal requirement of a building license and that a fee of 50 cents shall be paid for a license to erect, enlarge, or add to any building under a power to make by laws regulating the erection of buildings, is not a tax for revenue purposes, and is not therefore subject to the objection that it is unequal in its operation and operates as a restraint of trade. Welch v. Hotchkiss, 39 Conn. 140, 12 Am. Rep. 383 (1872).

And a license fee imposed upon merchants or dealers in wines and liquors, estimated upon the amount of their gross annual sales, is a tax upon the thing and not upon the persons, and is not subject to objection for want of uniformity. Williamsport v. Stearns, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 351, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 625 (1892); Allentown v. Gross, 122 Pa. 319 (1890).

But such a fee imposed upon merchants, created by adopting the classification made by the appraiser of mercantile taxes, is void for want of uniformity where the classification adopted exempts persons whose annual sales do not reach a certain amount. Williamsport v. Stearns, supra.

And a requirement of a license fee from peddlers, classifying them as foot peddlers, peddlers with one-horse cart or wagon, and peddlers with two-horse cart or wagon, charging a different rate for each, is a police requirement and a valid exercise of a power to regulate, and not in conflict with a constitutional requirement of uniformity of taxation upon all of a class. Kneeland v. Pittsburgh (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 421 (1887).

So, many of the cases have laid down the rule, without either denying or affirming the application of the constitutional provision, that license fees are equal and uniform so long as the tax imposed is the same upon all the members of a particular class.

Thus, the constitutional requirement as to uniformity of taxation does not prevent a municipality from discriminating in fixing rates for licenses for the transaction of different classes of business, and imposing a higher rate upon one class than upon another. Ex parte Hurl, 49 Cal. 557 (1875).

A license tax upon different industries, varying in amount upon each, but being the same upon the subjects of the same class, is not unconstitutional for want of uniformity. Hadtner v. Williamsport, 15 W. N. C. 138 (1893).

And an ordinance imposing a license tax of a fixed sum upon each of various occupations named does not violate the constitutional rules requiring uniformity because it does not graduate the amount required to be paid by persons pursuing the vocation according to the amount of business done. Templeton v. Tekamah, 22 Neb. 542 (1891).

So, the rule of uniformity prescribed by Ill. Const. art. 981, authorizing the general assembly to tax liquor dealers, etc., by general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operates, permits it to classify the different kinds of liquor dealers included in the general description, and impose differential taxes upon such classes so long as the tax imposed is the same upon all the members of the particular class. Timm v. Harrison, 109 Ill. 598 (1884).

And Ill. act July 1, 1883, prohibiting cities, towns, and villages from granting licenses for keeping dram shops except upon payment of a sum not less than $500 per annum, or not less than $150 per annum, when the license is for the sale of malt liquors only, does not conflict with the principle of uniformity prescribed by the Illinois Constitution, the fee being the same for all members of the particular class. Timm v. Harrison, 109 Ill. 598 (1884).

Nor is a law fixing the fee for a license of a liquor dealer at $50 per quarter, and for one who sells at a way-side inn or station at $10 per quarter, and exempting physicians and apothecaries, unconstitutional and void for want of uniformity, as there is uniformity as to each class. Territory v. Connell (Ariz.) 16 Pac. Rep. 200 (1888).

So, a license tax imposed upon express companies, of various amounts in different cities in proportion to the number of inhabitants in each, is not unconstitutional as not of uniform operation and therefore does not deprive any person of his property without due process of law, or deny to any person the equal protection of the law in violation to the 14th amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

The classification made of laundries other than steam laundries is valid.

throughout the state, as it operates uniformly as to all persons standing in the situation which is held to be the test of such taxation. Osborne v. State, 33 Fla. 162, 25 L. R. A. 120, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 731 (1894).

And La. act 1886, No. 101, providing for a license fee of $600 to be paid to both the city and the state by all banks the capital of which is less than $500,000, is not unconstitutional for want of equality and uniformity, as the fee required is equal and uniform as to all banks constituting that class. State v. Traders' Bank, 41 La. Ann. 329 (1899).

Nor is a license tax imposed by a municipality upon merchants, the amount of which is graduated according to the amount of their monthly sales, unequal and therefore unconstitutional, as it applies uniformly to all persons in the same category. Sacramento City & County v. Crocker, 16 Cal. 119 (1880).

And an ordinance charging a license fee upon vehicles graded in amount from $3 to $25, with reference to the character of the particular vehicle and the use to which it is put and the number of horses used therewith, enacted under a power to license vehicles and charge not more than $30 nor less than $2, is not void for want of uniformity, as it acts uniformly on all the subjects of a particular class. Smith v. Louisville (Ky.) 6 S. W. Rep. 911 (1889).

So, the same result has been reached in other cases by a general holding that the rule of equality and uniformity was not violated without stating the grounds.

This was done with reference to a law requiring a license fee of $35 from proprietors of bar-rooms, etc., on land, and of only $50 from proprietors of bars kept on steamboats, in State v. Rolle, 30 La. Ann. 991, 31 Am. Rep. 224 (1878).

And with reference to a license tax of $250 for pursuing the occupation of junk dealers, when the license tax imposed upon ordinary dealers was only $100, in New Orleans v. Kaufman, 29 La. Ann. 288, 29 Am. Rep. 628 (1877).

And with reference to an occupation tax of $250 upon persons dealing in stocks and bills of exchange in towns or cities exceeding 5,000 inhabitants and of $50 in towns and cities of less population, in Texas Bkg. & Ins. Co. v. State, 43 Tex. 636 (1875).

And with reference to a license tax imposed upon keepers of private markets when no such tax was imposed upon persons selling meats, etc., in the public markets, in New Orleans v. Dubarry, 33 La. Ann. 481, 30 Am. Rep. 273 (1881).

And the same rule has been applied when the exaction was designed for the purpose of revenue as well as for regulation.

Thus, in Wiley v. Owens, 39 Ind. 429 (1872), it was held that a fee charged by a city for a license designed for the purpose of revenue as well as regulation is not invalid within the constitutional requirement of uniformity and equality of taxation, because it is larger than the fee charged for a similar license in other cities.

The action of the legislature in the classifying of laundries for the purpose of imposing a license tax, as steam laundries and laundries other than steam laundries, is justified, if justification were needed, by their different nature, character, means, and methods of doing business.

Those affected by the proviso are not necessarily Chinese; it applies to all alike who carry on the class of laundries mentioned therein.

Ex parte Thornton, 12 Fed. Rep. 538; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 118 U. S. 708, 28 L. ed. 1145.

And in Hadtner v. Williamsport, 15 W. N. C. 188 (1883), it was held that a license tax which is greater upon some employments than upon others, imposed under a power to tax as well as to regulate, cannot be judicially declared invalid because of inequality.

In Denver City R. Co. v. Denver, 2 Colo. App. 84 (1892), however, it was held that a license tax of an amount greater than the amount necessary to defray the expense of police supervision imposed by a city without valuation upon property subjected to general taxation and used in the business licensed, under a statute authorizing it to license, regulate, and tax any lawful occupation, violates Colo. Const. art. 10, § 8, requiring taxes to be uniform and to be levied and collected under general law prescribing a just valuation.

And an insurance company required to pay a license tax of $1,000 upon an agency maintained in New Orleans cannot be required to pay a second tax because it has established a second office therein auxiliary to the first, for the accommodation of persons residing at a distance from the main office, without contravening the constitutional requirement of uniformity of taxation. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Blandin, 24 La. Ann. 112 (1872).

And a city ordinance, fixing the amount of a license tax upon insurance companies upon the basis of the amount of premiums received by them, contravenes the requirement of La. Const. art. 112, of uniform taxation, and cannot be enforced. New Orleans v. Home Mut. Ins. Co. 23 La. Ann. 449 (1871).

And a city having power to exact a license fee from tugs and barges, which makes a reduction of 40 per cent on vessels owned by residents thereof, must, under Mo. Const. art. 10, § 8, requiring that the tax shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, make a similar reduction as to all boats taxed. St. Louis v. Consolidated Coal Co. 112 Mo. 83 (1892).

The contrary rule, that the constitutional provision is applicable, however, was adopted by the earlier Louisiana cases.

Thus, license taxes imposed by municipalities on persons pursuing the same calling or profession must be equal under the constitutional provision requiring uniformity of taxation. New Orleans v. Home Mut. Ins. Co. supra.

And a license imposed by a parish upon retail liquor dealers, the amount of which is regulated by the amount of business done, one sum being charged when the business is more than a specified amount and another when it is less, conflicts with that provision. East Feliciana v. Gurth, 26 La. Ann. 140 (1874).

So, a statutory provision authorizing the levying and collecting of a specific tax on drays, wagons, carriages, etc., in proportion to the number of animals used in drawing any particular vehicle, is unconstitutional for want of uniformity, whether the imposition is regarded as a tax or a license, as licenses are required to be uniform upon the same professions or callings. State v. Endom, 28 La. Ann. 663 (1871).

And a license tax varying in amount according to the number and character of vehicles and the number of horses used to draw them, and not upon the business or vocation or upon the value of the property, if it be intended as a property tax, conflicts with the constitutional provision. Cullinan v. New Orleans, 28 La. Ann. 102 (1876).

In State v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. 40 La. Ann. 468 (1888), however, it was held that La. Const. 1879, art. 206, requiring license taxes to be graduated, exempts them from the constitutional requirement of equality and uniformity.

As to the Louisiana rule subsequent to the taking effect of the Constitution of 1879, see later Louisiana cases supra, this section, and infra, III.

d. Direct restrictions as to amount of levy.

Direct restrictions as to the amount of taxes which can be levied do not apply to licenses unless they are imposed for the purpose of revenue, but a constitutional restriction as to the amount of the license fee is of course imperative.

Thus, a license tax is not a property tax, and is not therefore unconstitutional, when it, together with the ad valorem tax permitted by the Constitution, exceeds the constitutional limitation on the amount of tax that can be levied. Morehouse v. Brigham, 41 La. Ann. 666 (1890).

But a municipal ordinance exacting fees for keeping a butcher's stand or selling articles within the corporate limits but without the market place, imposes a tax for revenue, and is not a contribution legally authorized in the exercise of the police power, under La. Const. art. 248, with reference to the regulation of the slaughtering of cattle and other livestock, and is therefore invalid if in excess of the limitation. Mestayer v. Corrige, 38 La. Ann. 707 (1886).

And a municipal corporation cannot exceed the limit prescribed by La. Const. art. 206, and impose a license fee for the sale of alcoholic and spirituous liquors greater than that required by the general assembly on the ground that it is a police regulation, within La. Const. art. 170, authorizing the general assembly to regulate their sale and use. State v. Chase, 38 La. Ann. 287 (1881).

So, the requirement by a municipality of a license fee of $25 per month for a traveling agent is unauthorized and invalid, under La. Const. art. 206, prohibiting any political corporation from imposing a greater license tax than is imposed by the 30 L. R. A. general assembly for state purposes, when no license is imposed upon that calling by the legislature. New Orleans v. Graves, 34 La. Ann. 840 (1882).

But a license tax levied by a city, which does not exceed that levied upon the same occupations in the city by the state in accordance with the provision of the Louisiana Constitution, is not rendered invalid by the fact that the state has invalidated her license tax by illegal discrimination between persons pursuing the same business in different subdivisions of the state. New Orleans v. Ponchartrain R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 619 (1890).

And police juries are not restricted in their action, under a statute giving them exclusive power to make such laws and regulations for the sale or prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors as they may deem advisable, and requiring them to adopt such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the law in regard to licenses exacted by them for that purpose, to the amount exacted by the state for the same. Jones v. Grady, 25 La. Ann. 586 (1873).

So, a license fee imposed upon owners of hacks, of $3 annually for each hack, and of different sums ranging from $2.50 to $12 upon owners of other vehicles, which is intended as a license tax under the police power, and the leading and primary purpose of which is for regulation, is not invalid as being in excess of the Texas constitutional limitation of one half the occupation tax imposed by the state upon the same class of subjects, though as a secondary purpose it provides a fund for improving the streets. Ex parte Gregory, 20 Tex. App. 210, 54 Am. Rep. 518 (1886).

But a municipal exaction of $30 for the privilege of running a hack, and of $5 for running a buggy within the city for hire, cannot be regarded as a license proper to meet the necessary expense of numbering, registering, and otherwise providing for their government, but is an occupation tax and invalid as such under the provision of the Texas Constitution, where such amount is in excess of half the rate levied by the state. Ex parte Gregory, 1 Tex. App. 758 (1877).

And an annual license tax of $25 on every vehicle used for transporting passengers or baggage, drawn by two animals, is invalid under that provision, where the general law levies $1 annually for each stall and $1 for each hack or other vehicle in every livery or feed stable, but imposes no specific tax on public vehicles other than those in livery and feed stables. Ex parte Slaren, 3 Tex. App. 663 (1878), following Ex parte Gregory, supra.

e. Miscellaneous provisions.

An annual license tax imposed upon artists, photographers, etc., of $35 in cities of over 3,000 inhabitants and $30 in cities of between 500 and 3,000 inhabitants, and $5 in towns of less than 500 inhabitants, does not conflict with a constitutional prohibition against class legislation. State v. Schlier, 3 Heisk. 281, 3 Heisk. 455 (1871).

And a license tax of $2.50 per day, required by a municipality of hawkers and peddlers of merchandise kept by merchants or manufacturers in the city, is not subject to objection as class legislation. Cherokee v. Fox, 34 Kan. 16 (1885).

And the ordinance of Mobile passed March 2, 1893, requiring every express company doing business in that city and whose business extends beyond the limits of the state to pay an annual license of $500, if within the limits of the state $100, and if within the limits of the city $50, is a tax for the license to do business, and does not impose an import or export duty, and is not a regulation of commerce, foreign or interstate, and is not in conflict with either the Federal or state Constitution. Osborne v. Mobile, 44 Ala. 493 (1870); Southern Exp. Co. v. Mobile, 49 Ala. 404 (1873).

So, a municipal requirement of a license fee of not more than $300 from any person selling spirituous liquors by retail within 1 mile of the town is a police regulation, and not unconstitutional as taking private property for public use, though it would be so if it were regarded as a tax for municipal purposes upon property outside of the municipal limits. Falmouth v. Watson, 5 Bush, 600 (1899).

But Ala. act Jan. 22, 1879, as amended December 8, 1890, providing that no person shall employ or contract with or in any other way induce laborers to leave designated counties without first paying such counties a license tax of $250, is prohibitory and unconstitutional as impairing the laborers' right of free emigration. Joseph v. Randolph, 71 Ala. 499, 46 Am. Rep. 347 (1882).

And a license tax levied upon goods brought from another state cannot be upheld as an imposition for inspection where the amount is more than is required for inspection and the proceeds are applied to other uses. American Fertilizing Co. v. North Carolina Board of Agriculture, 43 Fed. Rep. 606, 11 L. R. A. 179, 3 Intern. Com. Rep. 532 (1890).

III. Graduation of license fees.

La. Const. art. 217, provides that the general assembly shall graduate the amount of license taxes.

This provision, not indicating any standard of graduation, leaves it to the legislature to determine the method to be adopted in effecting it. State v. Traders' Bank, 41 La. Ann. 329 (1889); New Orleans v. Ponchartrain R. Co. Id. 519 (1889); State v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. 40 La. Ann. 463 (1888).

And the judiciary has no authority to interfere in the absence of any rule to guide its investigation and scrutiny. State v. Traders' Bank, and New Orleans v. Ponchartrain R. Co. supra.

Thus, the division by the general assembly of companies and persons pursuing the business of insurance into different classes according to the amount of premiums collected, and the levying upon each class a different license tax, greater upon those receiving a larger amount than upon those receiving a less, are a sufficient graduation. State v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. supra.

And that a license law requires smaller insurance companies to pay a larger tax in proportion to their premiums than larger companies does not render it unconstitutional under that provision, there being no requirement that the tax shall be in proportion to the business done, though it may impugn its justice. Ibid.

So, a license tax of $1,000 imposed upon places for concert, dancing, and variety performances, in cities having a population of more than 25,000, and of $500 in cities and towns having less than that number, is properly graduated and equal and uniform as to each class, within the requirement of the Louisiana Constitution. State v. Schoonhausen, 37 La. Ann. 43 (1885); State v. O'Hara, 38 La. Ann. 94 (1884).

And a license tax of a specified sum on peddlers of a particular kind of goods is not subject to the objection that it is not sufficiently graduated. McClellan v. Pettigrew, 44 La. Ann. 368 (1892).

Nor is a license tax upon a business as a whole, which is duly graduated, rendered unconstitutional for want of graduation by a requirement of a license fee of not less than $50 for an additional business, as the addition of the $50 when the additional business is done does not destroy the original graduation. New Orleans v. Clark, 42 La. Ann. 9 (1890).

But the constitutional provision with reference to graduation does not require license taxes to be equal and uniform as to all corporations transacting the same kind of business, and does not prevent the imposition of a different tax upon domestic corporations from that imposed on foreign ones. New Orleans v. Ponchartrain R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 519 (1889).

The power to graduate license fees, however, is not dependent upon constitutional authority, but has been upheld universally within proper limits in other states in the absence of any constitutional requirement or authority.

Thus, a municipal council has the right to grade and class and fix the rate of licenses granted by it, but in doing so it must keep within the limits fixed by charter or other statutory provisions. Kniper v. Louisville, 7 Bush, 599 (1870).

And a city authorized to license insurance companies may properly vary the amount charged therefor to correspond with the incomes of the different companies licensed. Burlington v. Putnam Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 102 (1870).

Nor can a citizen doing a general business at the place of his domicile escape payment of a license tax imposed upon merchants by the municipal

De Witt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears that the legislative assembly divided laundry licenses into three classes, as follows: Steam laundry, $15; one male laundryman, $10; male laundryman employing one or more other persons, $25. The respondent contended in the lower court—a contention which prevailed—that this legislation is unequal and not uniform, and therefore void, under the Constitution. The legislature is not required to tax all property and occupations equally or uniformly, unless so commanded by the Constitution. Cooley, Taxn. p. 870, chap. 6, quoting Butler's Appeal, 73 Pa. 448; Rome v. McWilliams, 52 Ga. 251; Decker v. McGowan, 59 Ga. 805. See also Singer Mfg. Co. v.

Wright, 88 Fed. Rep. 121. Constitutions of a state are distinguished from the Constitution of the United States, in this: "The government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; the national Constitution being the instrument which specifies them, and in which authority should be found for the exercise of any power which the national government assumes to possess. In this respect it differs from the Constitutions of the several states, which are not grants of powers to the states, but which apportion and impose restrictions upon the powers which the states inherently possess." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 10. Therefore a state legislature is not acting under enumerated or granted powers, but rather under inherent powers, restricted only by the pro-government because the amount of his tax is arrived at by reference to his profits. Ficklen v. Shelby County Tax. Dist. 145 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 601, 4 Intern. Com. Rep. 79 (1892).

And a charter provision authorizing the city council to license, tax, and regulate all such business and employments as the public good may require, authorizes the enactment of an ordinance requiring a license for carrying on the business of selling goods, wares, and merchandises at a fixed place, graduating the amount or the fee according to the amount of sales or business done. Ex parte Mount, 66 Cal. 448 (1885).

And a percentage on the gross receipts of a foreign insurance company doing business in a municipality may be properly taken as an equitable mode of ascertaining the amount of a license fee charged for the privilege of carrying on such business. Walker v. Springfield, 94 Ill. 364 (1890).

So, the classification of townships and cities by population for the purpose of fixing a minimum license fee for the sale of intoxicating liquors therein is valid. State v. Gloucester County Circuit Ct. Judge, 50 N. J. L. 585, 1 L. R. A. 36 (1888).

And a police regulation providing for a license may graduate the amount thereof by the number of votes cast for the governor at the last general election next preceding the date of the application therefor. State v. Doherty, 2 Idaho, 1105 (1892).

And a tax of $50 on licenses for retailing spirituous liquors for the use of the school commissioners is a police regulation, which may be graduated by the populousness of the community in which the privilege is to be exercised and by the profitability of the employment. Ex parte Marshall, 64 Ala. 266 (1879).

But the question of population, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount to be paid for a license to sell liquors, can only be determined from the last preceding census by the state or general government, under Wis. Laws 1885, chap. 296, § 1, providing therefor. State v. Keaough, 68 Wis. 135 (1887).

So, a license tax upon merchants is not a property tax, and therefore unconstitutional, because the amount thereof is graduated by the average amount of their stock. Newton v. Atchison, 81 Kan. 151, 47 Am. Rep. 436 (1883).

And the city council may provide that the license to be paid by laundrymen shall be in proportion to the number of persons employed by them under the charter of the city of Oakland, providing that licenses shall be discriminating and proportionate to the amount of the business done. Ex parte Sisto Li Protti, 68 Cal. 636 (1883).

And a municipal requirement under a power to establish and regulate market houses and to license and regulate fresh-meat stores, establishing market houses and requiring persons selling therein to pay rent but no license, and that persons keeping meat stores shall pay a license of $100, and forbidding them to sell game, fish, vegetables, and other articles of merchandises, and requiring a license of $50 from keepers of game or fish shops, is a mere classification of dealers with a license differing in amount, and properly graduated. Vosse v. Memphis, 9 Lea, 294 (1884).

So, a municipality has full power, under a charter authorizing it to license keepers of livery stables, to prescribe a rule that such license should be paid in proportion to the number of carriages kept for hire. Howland v. Chicago, 108 Ill. 500 (1884).

And Ky. act May 8, 1886, providing for a license tax in the city of Louisville for each vehicle running therein, of not more than $30 nor less than $2, authorizes the city council to fix the amount of the fee by ordinance within the specified limits at different amounts with reference to, and graded upon the character of, the particular vehicle, and the use to which it is put, and the number of horses used therewith. Smith v. Louisville (Ky.) 6 S. W. Rep. 911 (1898).

So, the amount of a fee charged by a municipal corporation for a building permit, may be graduated according to the estimated cost of the building, as the examination of the plans and specifications necessary to its issuance would require more labor and expense in the case of a large building than of a smaller one. St. Paul v. Dow, 87 Minn. 20 (1887).

And a license tax imposed upon hotels is not unreasonable or oppressive because the amount paid is graduated by the number of rooms which may be devoted to the accommodation of the public. St. Louis v. Bircher, 7 Mo. App. 169 (1879).

So, a license tax on vehicles, graduated at $5 on those drawn by one horse, and $8 on those drawn by two horses, and $12 on those drawn by three or more, is reasonable and valid. Gibson v. Coraopolis, 22 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 64, 8 Lane. L. Rev. 359 (1891).

And an annual license tax imposed upon artists, photographers, etc., of $35 in cities of over 3,000 inhabitants, and $20 in cities of between 500 and 3,000 inhabitants, is not unconstitutional as class legislation. State v. Schlier, 8 Heisk. 231, 8 Heisk. 455 (1871).

The right of a municipality, however, to require an annual license fee of more than $50 from the larger manufacturers depends, under a charter provision authorizing the requirement of a license of not less than $50 nor more than $500 and the grading and fixing of rates within the designated limits, upon the existence of the fact that all smaller ones within the city are charged at least $50; and an ordinance requiring brewers to pay 1-10th of 1 per cent on the amount of liquor manufactured, for a license, providing that each shall be required to pay at least $15 per annum, is unauthorized and invalid. Kniper v. Louisville, 7 Bush, 539 (1870).

visions of their sovereign Constitution. We therefore inquire whether our Constitution restrains the legislature from enacting such a law as §§ 4079, 4080, Pol. Code.

The respondent contends that the restraint is found in the following provisions of the Constitution:

"Sec. 1. The necessary revenue for the support and maintenance of the state shall be provided by the legislative assembly, which shall levy a uniform rate of assessment and taxation, and shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, except that specially provided for in this article. The legislative assembly may also impose a license tax, both upon persons and upon corporations doing business in this state." Art. 12.

"Sec. 11. Taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws and for public purposes only. They shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax." Art. 12.

The respondent argues that under these provisions the imposition of a license fee of $25 upon him, as a laundryman with a helper, while the laundryman without a helper and the steam laundryman pay a less license, is unconstitutional, in that it is not uniform and equal. We shall not decide whether this law is or is not a classification of the laundry business for license purposes, which the legislature may equality and uniformly, a large number of the decisions in which uphold provisions for a graduated fee.

IV. Limitations peculiar to municipal corporations.

Power to license, conferred upon cities, is not an unlimited or arbitrary power, but one to be exercised in conformity with the general law. Louisville v. Kean, 18 B. Mon. 9 (1856).

But it confers authority to impose an additional tax for the grant of a privilege besides that which is required to be paid to the state. Ibid.

And the municipality is not limited with reference to the amount which it may require to be paid therefor to that levied by the state on citizens generally. Perdue v. Ellis, 18 Ga. 586 (1855); Ex parte Burnett, 30 Ala. 461 (1857); Deits v. Central, 1 Colo. 223 (1871).

The limit is to be found in statutory and charter provisions, and in the general principle requiring municipal ordinances to be reasonable and in the nature and purposes of the power conferred.

a. Statutory and charter restrictions.

Statutory and charter restrictions upon the amount of license fees are, of course, applicable to municipal licenses only, and the question of their existence is usually one of statutory construction.

Thus, a municipal charter conferring power upon city authorities to levy taxes upon all subjects within its jurisdiction upon which a tax may be levied by the state, providing that the tax shall be apportioned in the same manner as the state tax, requires the city to follow the apportionment of occupation taxes assessed by the state in levying a license tax on such occupation. Marshall v. Sneider, 25 Tex. 480, 78 Am. Dec. 534 (1880).

And the Illinois insurance law, § 30 (Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 78), providing for taxation of foreign insurance companies, which shall be received in lieu of all town and municipal licenses, except that a license fee not exceeding 2 per cent on the gross receipts of the agents may be imposed in towns having an organized fire department, operates as a limitation upon the power of a city to impose more than 2 per cent on such receipts. Walker v. Springfield, 94 Ill. 364 (1880).

And the proviso of that act, permitting cities having an organized fire department to levy a license fee not exceeding 2 per cent of the gross receipts of foreign insurance agents, requires affirmative action by the city in fixing the rate, which may be less but not more than 2 per cent, and must be computed upon the gross, and not the net, receipts. Chicago v. James, 114 Ill. 479 (1885).

But an ordinance requiring all foreign fire and life insurance companies engaged in effecting insurance in the city to pay to the city treasurer the sum of $2 upon the hundred upon the amount of all premiums received during the half year, to be set apart for the maintenance of the fire department, and requiring agents of such companies to render an account of the premiums received under penalty of $200, is justified under a charter authorizing the city to license and regulate agents of such insurance companies, and is not rendered invalid by that act. Ibid.

So, Kan. act 1871, creating the insurance department, does not repeal or modify the act of 1870 authorizing cities of the first class to levy and collect a license tax on fire and life insurance companies or agencies, so as to exempt a foreign insurance corporation doing business in such a city, which pays to the superintendent of insurance under the provision of that law an amount greater than that paid by other insurance companies, from a license fee of $50 upon fire companies and $100 upon life companies, imposed by a municipal ordinance therein. Leavenworth v. Booth, 15 Kan. 627 (1875).

And La. act 1879, No. 27, providing that no parish or municipal corporation shall assess any license tax of over $500 upon any insurance company transacting business therein, and containing the usual repealing clause, is not retroactive, and does not repeal an ordinance of a municipality previously enacted under due authority, which had gone into effect, imposing a license tax of $1,000 on certain designated classes of companies. New Orleans v. Rhenish Westphalian Lloyds, 31 La. Ann. 781 (1879).

So, an ordinance enacted a few days after the enactment of Ill. act June 15, 1888, fixing the minimum license fee for keeping a dram shop at $500, but before it took effect, fixing fees for licenses issued thereunder previous to the taking effect of that law at $103, and providing that unless otherwise revoked they should extend to a time about nine months after such law took effect, is not a fraud upon the statute or invasion thereof, and licenses issued thereunder at a fee of $103 are valid. Swarth v. People, 109 Ill. 621 (1884).

And a liquor dealer in a city containing between 23,000 and 24,000 inhabitants is subject to a license fee of $500, under a statute fixing that rate for cities of the first, second, and third classes, and $300 for all other cities, where such city was one of the third class under an act dividing cities into three classes only, though by a subsequent act, subsequently held to be unconstitutional, cities were divided into seven classes, and those containing less than 75,000 inhabitants were put into the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh classes. Com. v. Smoulter, 126 Pa. 137 (1889).

But a brewer is a manufacturer of beer and subject to the license tax of $10 imposed upon manufacturers by La. act 4, Extra Sess. 1881, § 3, when his receipts are between $30,000 and $40,000, and not to that of $75 imposed upon persons engaged in distilling and rectifying alcoholic or malt liquors, imposed by § 9 thereof. State v. Weckerling, 38 La. Ann. 36 (1889).

make, even if it were held that the uniformity clause in the Constitution applied to such a license. Many cases might be cited upon this question. We shall decide this appeal without reaching a consideration of that point. A license fee is a tax sometimes, and for some purposes. Sometimes, and for some purposes, it is not a tax. Cooley, Taxn. pp. 572, 573, 592, 596, 600, 601; People v. Martin, 60 Cal. 153; Santa Barbara v. Stearns, 51 Cal. 499; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 245; Desty, Taxn. p. 305. The particular distinctions as to when a license fee is a tax and when it is not, we shall not discuss, further than to give the reasons for our opinion that this license fee under consideration is not a tax, as falling within the equality and uniformity provisions of the Constitution.

And a retail dealer upon whom a license fee of $5 was imposed under the provisions of the state license law of 1881, § 6, but who combines with his business the sale of liquors in less quantities than one pint, can only be required to pay a total license fee of $50 under the proviso thereof that no license shall issue to sell liquors in such quantities at a fee less than $50, as that proviso excepts him from the general rule prescribed by that act in such case requiring payment of four times the ordinary rate, that being less than $50. Jefferson Police Jury v. Marrero, 38 La. Ann. 896 (1886).

And a retail grocer who sells liquor in quantities less than five gallons in addition to his other business is subject to a license fee of not less than $50 under the proviso of the license act that the license for such additional business shall be as therein-after provided for in § 11, providing that no license shall issue for making such sales for less than $50, and the license will not be regulated by the provision of § 11 thereof for licensing hotels, bar rooms, and persons engaged in the sale of soda water, etc., such provision not being applicable to the business of a retail grocer. New Orleans v. Clark, 42 La. Ann. 9 (1890).

But statutory and charter restrictions upon the power to tax, like constitutional ones, do not apply to license fees required for the purpose of regulation.

Thus, the right to pass an ordinance fixing the price of a license to retail liquor at $500 per year is not limited, when otherwise duly authorized, by a charter provision allowing the city authorities to levy a tax not exceeding 50 per cent of the state tax, the license not being a tax. Perdue v. Ellis, 18 Ga. 586 (1855).

And U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 180, 181, and the act of Congress of 1873, § 3, limiting the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia to $1.50 per hundred, expressly confines the limitation to taxes upon real and personal property, and does not apply to taxes upon employments or occupations to be raised by licenses which may be exacted under police powers confided to municipalities. Cooper v. District of Columbia, 4 McArthur. 250 (1890).

So, a penalty of 2 per cent per month, imposed by city authorities for delinquency in the payment of license fees, is not prohibited by La. act 43 of 1871, § 9, amending the city charter of 1870, limiting penalties on delinquent taxes to 10 per cent per annum, as that provision applies to taxes only and not to licenses. New Orleans v. Ponchartrain R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 519 (1890).

But an ordinance requiring agents of foreign insurance companies to pay to the city 2 per cent of the premiums received, not granting permission to do business, but assuming that the authority already exists, does not provide for a license within the meaning of a charter provision limiting the amount

The Constitution provides that the legislature shall levy a uniform rate of assessment and taxation, and secure a just valuation for taxation of all property (art. 12, § 1), and that taxes shall be uniform, upon the same class of subjects, within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax (Id.). In a separate sentence in said section 1 it is provided that the legislative assembly may also impose a license tax both upon persons and upon corporations doing business in the state. But neither in this sentence of section 1, nor elsewhere, is it stated that licenses shall be uniform. If the Constitution does not require that licenses shall be uniform, they need not be. Judge Cooley says, in his work on Taxation: "It has been seen that the sovereignty may, in the discretion of license fees. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Peoria, 156 Ill. 430 (1895).

In Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Peoria, supra, the court distinguished Walker v. Springfield, 94 Ill. 364 (1880), in which a sum charged an insurance company was said not to be a tax but a fee paid for a license, saying that there is not authority in that case or any other to which its attention had been called for holding that such a requirement is a license.

Such restrictions with reference to licenses, however, are imperative, and must be strictly complied with.

Thus, a municipal council must, in the exercise of a power to grade, fix, and class licenses, keep within the limits fixed by charter or other statutory provisions. Kniper v. Louisville, 7 Bush, 599 (1870).

And a city having authority by its charter to demand license fees from certain classes of business not to exceed $500 per annum cannot require the payment of a percentage on all business done which might amount to more than $500, and no recovery can be had under such an ordinance even for a less sum than such limit. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Peoria, 156 Ill. 430 (1895).

And an ordinance requiring a license fee of $5 for every three days for selling goods by sample, enacted under a charter provision authorizing a license fee of not less than $5 or more than $500, is invalid as the licensee might sell for so long a period for the license as to make the amount greater than the maximum amount fixed by the charter. Darling v. St. Paul, 19 Minn. 389 (1872).

So, the Arkansas revenue act of March 13, 1833, §§ 4, 6 directing an annual county tax of $400, upon liquor dealers supersedes the former provisions fixing the price of licenses and investing the county court with a discretion as to the amount, and an excess exacted by it may be recovered from the county. Drew County v. Bennett, 43 Ark. 364 (1884).

And a power conferred upon a municipality to increase the price of licenses does not authorize the increase of a penalty imposed for violation of the requirement of a license, where the amount of the penalty is fixed by statute. Schroder v. Charleston, 2 Treadway Const. 726 (1815).

And a municipal ordinance of a township in Canada, imposing a duty of £25 upon a tavern, is invalid when not referred to the electors at the meeting duly convened, as required by 16 Vict. chap. 184, § 4, whenever the fee imposed exceeds £10. Re Barclay, 12 U. C. Q. B. 86 (1855).

And a municipal ordinance requiring a license fee of $50 for every passenger railroad car and $25 for small one-horse cars bases the fee on the size of the cars and not upon the manner in which they are propelled, and a change by a railroad company of the motive power of smaller cars from one horse of its legislature, levy a tax on every species of property within its jurisdiction, or, on the other hand, that it may select any particular species of property, and tax that only, if in the opinion of the legislature that course will be wiser. And what is true of property is true of privileges and occupations also; the state may tax all, or it may select for taxation certain classes and leave the others untaxed. Considerations of general policy determine what the selection shall be in such cases, and there is no restriction on the power of choice unless one is imposed by Constitution. In another chapter it has been shown that constitutional provisions requiring the taxation of property by value have no application to the taxation of other subjects, and do not, therefore, by implication, forbid the taxation now under consideration." Page 570. These remarks of Judge Cooley are taken from the opening sentence of his chapter entitled "Taxation of Business and Privileges." See also chapter 6 of the same work, as to a general discussion of the impossibility of absolute uniformity.

In the case of People v. Coleman, 4 Cal. we find, on page 54, 60 Am. Dec. 581, that the counsel arguing in favor of the uniformity and equality of license fees makes the following remarks: "'How this is to be done,' says the learned counsel, 'is no part of our province to decide; nor are we to say whether it is possible to devise an occupation tax which would be equal and uniform, unless it be a tax levied equally and for the same amount upon all oc-to two does not make it liable for more than the $25 tax on such cars. New York v. Twenty-Third Street R. Co., 62 Hun. 545 (1891).

But a charter provision requiring rates of license for the transaction of business to be proportionate to the amount of business done, and that the license shall be discriminating, only requires that after the selection of a business as a subject for license, the sum exacted from each person following that business shall be fixed by the amount of business done by each. Ex parte Hurl, 49 Cal. 557 (1875).

And an ordinance requiring the payment of $5 per day for a license for auction houses is not rendered invalid by a statute providing that license taxes shall be at such rate per year as shall be just and reasonable. Fretwell v. Troy, 18 Kan. 271 (1877).

So, one who refuses to apply for or take out a license to sell intoxicating liquors, and continues to sell in violation of the law requiring it, cannot complain while thus continuing to sell that a fee of $1 for the clerk in addition to the license fee is in excess of the amount allowed by statute. Moore v. Indianapolis, 120 Ind. 433 (1889).

And interest at the rate of 2 per cent per month may be added by a city to an unpaid license tax imposed by it under La. act 20 of 1882, § 63, providing that the city council may impose an annual license tax on trades, professions, and callings, and act 119 of 1882, authorizing them to enforce the collection of taxes due them. New Orleans v. Ponchartrain R. Co., 41 La. Ann. 519 (1889); New Orleans v. Firemen's Ins. Co., Id. 1142 (1889).

So, in State v. Schonhausen, 37 La. Ann. 42 (1885), in which an appeal was taken from a judgment for a license tax of $1,000 for keeping a place for a concert, dancing, and variety performance, manifestly for delay, 10 per cent on the amount of the license was adjudged as damages for a frivolous appeal.

So, an application for a license is a proceeding within the purview of an ordinance providing that no action or proceeding pending at the time any ordinance shall be repealed shall be affected in any way by such repeal, so that the city authorities cannot hold an application in abeyance for the purpose of repealing the ordinance under which it was made and enacting another, thus exacting another higher license fee. State v. Baker, 33 Mo. App. 98 (1888).

b. Must not be discriminating.

The effect of constitutional provisions upon discriminating license fees, which is applicable alike to state and municipal licenses, is treated supra, II. a. Provisions against discrimination. But the principle of municipal law requiring municipal ordinances to be reasonable, operates to prevent improper discriminations in fixing the rates for municipal licenses.

Thus, authority conferred upon municipal authorities to levy license taxes upon privileges, does not authorize them to create a privilege for the purpose of taxing it or to discriminate between persons exercising the same privilege by taxing one at a higher rate or in a different mode from another. Nashville v. Althorp, 5 Coldw. 554 (1868).

And a municipal ordinance passed under a general power exacting a license for selling goods, fixing a much larger rate of license for selling such as are not in the city or in transitu to it, than for such as are within it or in transitu to it, is unjust, unequal, partial, oppressive, and in restraint of trade, and therefore invalid. Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642 (1878.)

So, an agent of a mercantile firm from another state taking orders by sample within a city is liable to taxation therein, if at all, as a merchant only, and a municipal requirement of a license fee of $300 per annum for the privilege of selling goods by sample in a city declaring it a separate avocation is invalid as discriminating against merchants selling by sample. Nashville v. Althorp, supra.

And a municipal ordinance providing that any person who shall sell or contract to sell in a designated city or county, or cause to be sold, or solicit the sale or purchase of, any goods, wares, or merchandise, or other property with designated exceptions which is still in original packages, without at the time having the goods at or in the said city or county, or a bill of lading or receipt of a common carrier showing that the goods therein named had been shipped and were in transitu to such city or county, shall pay a license in proportion to the amount of business done, is obnoxious to the objection that it is unjust and oppressive in that it discriminates between merchants of the same place against one who deals in goods outside the corporate limits and not actually in transitu, and obstructs commercial intercourse between the seaports and interior, and is in restraint of trade, exacting a heavy tribute from the owner of goods outside the corporate limits and not in transitu as a condition on which he will be allowed to offer them for sale therein. Ex parte Frank, supra.

And an ordinance imposing a prohibitive license fee on hawkers and peddlers, which practically exempts residents, is invalid for discrimination between residents and nonresidents. Brooks v. Mangin, 86 Mich. 576 (1891).

So, in Columbia v. Beasley, 1 Humph. 232, 34 Am. Dec. 646 (1839), it was said that municipal corporations may tax privileges in such proportion as they choose, but the inequality must not be such as to make the tax oppressive on a particular class.

And in McGrath v. Newton, 29 Kan. 384 (1883) an ordinance levying a license tax on a large number of different kinds of business at different rates, in some instances charging transients more than persons permanently located, was attacked upon the ground that it was in restraint of trade and dis-cupations. All that we maintain is that an occupation tax which is not equal and uniform violates the Constitution."—In reply to which the court remarks: "Is, then, the clause under consideration so vague as to be wholly unsusceptible of a practical meaning, and the force of the provision to be defeated from a want of some indefinable equality and uniformity existing in the imagination of learned counsel, but so subtle in its character as to defy the ordinary use of language in its description? In construing this section, force and meaning must be given to every part of it. We cannot suppose the convention intended to enact, as a part of the fundamental law of this state, a provision so doubtful and ambiguous, and at the same time so completely calculated to paralyze the energies and prostrate the resources of the state government. . . . The occupation of the humble artisan, with no capital but his labor, the reward of whose toil secures to him only a scanty subsistence, must be taxed equally with the [occupation of the] richest merchant, banker, or broker, or if not equally, at least the state has no right to release the miserable pittance so cruelly wrung from his hard earnings." In that case it was held that the uniformity clause of the Constitutions did not apply to license fees upon occupations. We do not concur in all that was said in deciding that case. We have omitted a portion of the remarks from our quotation, and added a parenthesis which the language seems to need. The California supreme court criminated against certain kinds of business, and that it was oppressive and unreasonable, but was upheld upon the ground that at least some of the items were legal, and that, owing to a misjoinder of parties having no community of interest, the judgment below would have to be affirmed, though the conclusion was reached that some of the taxes were void.

And a license fee of $50 per day, imposed on transient dealers under a police power, is invalid as discriminating between goods manufactured in the wholesale and manufacturing parts of the city and goods held for sale by dealers in the retail streets. Glaser v. Cincinnati, 81 Ohio L. J. 243 (1893).

But when the discrimination is between different classes, and consists of nothing more than a reasonable graduation of the license, the validity of the imposition is not affected.

Thus, a county ordinance is not invalid because it fixes a less rate of license for the business of selling liquors at a wayside tavern or watering place than for the same business carried on in a village, town, or city. Amador County v. Kennedy, 70 Cal. 453 (1893).

And an ordinance requiring a license for keeping a dramshop is not invalid because the price therefor is differential according to the street upon which the shop is located, all persons being left to apply for a license in whatever locality they choose. East St. Louis v. Wehrung, 46 Ill. 362 (1868).

And a city ordinance levying an annual license tax of $30 payable quarterly, upon druggists having permits from the probate court to sell intoxicating liquors, and an annual license tax of $5 upon druggists not having such permits, under statutes authorizing the levy of license taxes upon various kinds of business and occupations, is not illegal and void so far as it levies a greater tax upon druggists having such permit than upon those not having it. Tulloss v. Sedan, 81 Kan. 165 (1893).

Nor is a municipal ordinance requiring a license tax of $2,500 and a hospital tax of $50 of keepers of bar rooms or coffee houses who conduct concert saloons where theatrical plays are performed in the same room or building, unconstitutional and void as discriminating against their business by charging largely in excess of other business of the same character, because coffee houses are only required to pay $75 and theatrical plays $250. Goldsmith v. New Orleans, 31 La. Ann. 646 (1879).

And an ordinance requiring a license for exhibitions is not invalid because it requires the payment of a smaller fee for a license for a month than would be required for three weeks by the week. Webber v. Chicago, 50 Ill. App. 110 (1892), affirmed in 148 Ill. 313 (1894).

So, a license fee of $2.50 per day required by a municipality of professional hawkers and peddlers for selling merchandise similar to that kept by merchants or manufacturers in the city, is not objectionable as being partial and discriminating. Cherokee v. Fox, 34 Kan. 16 (1893).

And an ordinance imposing a license fee upon transient merchants is not to be regarded as discriminating against nonresident merchants merely because there may be no resident merchants who are compelled to pay the fee. Ottumwa v. Zekind (Iowa) 29 L. R. A. 734 (1895).

But ordinances fixing license fees with a view to protect the home merchants against a transient one cannot be passed under a power to license and regulate. Ottumwa v. Zekind, supra (dictum).

And a license tax imposed upon persons engaged in raising, grazing, herding, or pasturing sheep, of $50 for every 1,000 sheep, required by a county ordinance, is not invalid as discriminating, special, unequal, or partial. Ex parte Miranda, 78 Cal. 365 (1887).

So, in Los Angeles v. Southern P. R. Co. 61 Cal. 59 (1882), a license tax of $420, charged against a steam railroad company having a depot in the city, was upheld under attack upon the ground that its business extended beyond the city limits.

See also supra, III., Graduation of license fees.

c. Under a general power to regulate.

1. What may be included in the fee.

A few of the cases have adopted and acted upon the theory that the fee for a license, required for the purpose of regulation only, should be limited to a sum sufficient to meet the necessary expenses incident to its issue.

Thus, in State v. Long Branch Comrs. 42 N. J. L. 364, 36 Am. Rep. 518 (1890), it was said that a fee for a license may be exacted under a grant of power for regulation only, but it should not exceed the necessary or proper expense of issuing the license.

And in Mobile v. Yuille, 3 Ala. 137 (1841), the court doubted the validity of a provision for the forfeiture of bread of less weight than the ordinance required, and exacting from the baker as a price for his license a sum beyond what was necessary to compensate for issuing and registering it; but the case was decided on other grounds.

And in State v. Herod, 29 Iowa, 123 (1870), it was held that a charge of a license fee of $5 for every vehicle used for the purpose of carrying passengers, upon persons engaged in such business, is not unreasonable when it is scarcely, if any, more than is necessary to pay the clerk's fine connected with the registry of the vehicles.

But the general rule is that a license tax imposed for regulation is intended as a means of carrying the regulation into effect. Vansant v. Harlem Stage Co. 59 Md. 330 (1882) (dictum).

And that a power to license as a means of regulation implies the power to charge a fee therefor, sufficient to defray the expense of issuing the license and to compensate the city for any expense has not followed that case, in whole. People v. McCreery, 84 Cal. 438. But the principle that the uniformity clause does not apply to license fees has been maintained in California. Ex parte Hurl, 49 Cal. 557. It was again said in Santa Barbara v. Stearns, 51 Cal. 490: "A license charge or fee for the transaction of business is, in our opinion, a tax, within the meaning of the term 'tax,' as employed in those sections [referring to sections other than the uniformity clause]. It is not a tax within the meaning of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution [which is the uniformity section of the California Constitution]. . . . People v. Coleman, 4 Cal. 46, 60 Am. Dec. 581; People v. Raymond, 84 Cal. 492; Sacramento City and County v. Ocker, 16 Cal. 119; Taylor v.

Palmer, 81 Cal. 240; Emery v. San Francisco Gas Co. 28 Cal. 845; Emery v. Bradford, 29 Cal. 75; Ex parte Hurl, 49 Cal. 557; Cooley, Const. Lim. 201." See also San José v. San José & S. C. R. Co. 58 Cal. 475; Ex parte Miranda, 78 Cal. 375; Ex parte Sisto Li Protti, 68 Cal. 635; People v. Thurber, 18 Ill. 554; East St. Louis v. Wehrung, 46 Ill. 392; Slaughter v. Com. 18 Gratt. 787; Baker v. Cincinnati, 11 Ohio St. 534; Kleizer v. State, 15 Ind. 449.

The alleged inequality or nonuniformity of this classified laundry license does not seem to be such as to grant a monopoly, or such as to be prohibitory of a legitimate trade or occupation. We are of opinion that the first sentence of section 1, article 12, and the whole of sec-incurred in maintaining such regulation. Re Wan Yin, 10 Sawy. 532 (1886); Jacksonville v. Ledwith, 26 Fla. 163, 9 L. R. A. 69 (1890); Vansant v. Harlem Stage Co. supra (dictum); Mankato v. Fowler, 32 Minn. 364 (1884) (dictum).

And the power to regulate and inspect justifies the imposition of such fees and charges as will cover the expense of inspection as well as the police supervision necessary to prevent the business to be regulated from becoming harmful to the public. Jacksonville v. Ledwith, 26 Fla. 163, 9 L. R. A. 69 (1890).

Thus, shows and performances require inquiry as to the character of those who propose to exhibit, and as to the nature of the thing to be exhibited, and the exhibition may require additional attention from those entrusted with the public peace to prevent disorder and disturbances, the burden thus devolved on the public officials requiring perhaps an increase in their number or compensation for the benefit of exhibitors, and so may justly be charged a license fee of an amount greater than the expense of filling up a blank. Baker v. Cincinnati, 11 Ohio St. 534 (1880).

And a grant of municipal authority to regulate the vending and inspection of meats, etc., justifies the imposition of such fees as will cover the expenses of the inspection of the articles offered for sale as well as of the police supervision of the business necessary to prevent its becoming harmful to the public. Jacksonville v. Ledwith, supra.

And the power to regulate the soliciting from travelers of patronage for hotels, conferred upon municipal corporations by Manst. (Ark.) Dig. § 751, gives them the right to charge a license fee sufficient in amount to cover the expense of the license and of the enforcement of such police superintendence as may be lawfully exercised over the business. Fayetteville v. Carter, 52 Ark. 301, 6 L. R. A. 609 (1890).

So, in Van Hook v. Selma, 70 Ala. 361, 45 Am. Rep. 85 (1881), the rule was laid down that the amount exacted for a license, when designed for regulation and not for revenue, is not to be confined to the expense of issuing it, but that a reasonable compensation may be charged for the additional expense of municipal supervision over the particular business or vocation at the place where it is licensed.

And the expense of issuing and of regulation have been said to constitute the extreme limit.

Thus, in Jacksonville v. Ledwith, 26 Fla. 163, 9 L. R. A. 69 (1890), it was said that no more can be charged for a license than the necessary expense of issuing it and of the labor of officers and other expenses caused to the public by the business licensed.

And in St. Louis v. Boatmen's Ins. & T. Co. 47 Mo. 150 (1870), and St. Louis v. Marine Ins. Co. Id. 163 (1870), it was held that a power to license insurance companies limits the right to charge a fee 30 L. R. A.

therefor to such an amount as will cover the necessary expenses of issuing it and the additional labor of officers and the expense thereby incurred.

And in Burlington v. Putnam Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 102 (1870), it was said the license should be charged for as such, and only to such extent as may reasonably compensate the city for issuing and enforcing the license and for the care exercised by it under its police authority over the particular person licensed.

And in Moore v. Minneapolis, 43 Minn. 413 (1890), it was said that a charge of $1 for the clerical work of issuing a license, in addition to the fee prescribed by the ordinance providing for it, is unauthorized; but the recovery for the sum thus paid was refused because the complaint did not properly allege a cause of action therefor.

But the power to impose licenses for municipal purposes carries with it power to consider and determine the nature of the occupations, trades, and business to be licensed, and to discriminate between the business which may be useful and beneficial to the community and that which may be immoral or disorderly in its nature and tendency, and fix the fees therefor at such sums as shall be equitable and just. Re Guerrero, 60 Cal. 89 (1886).

And the license charged should not ordinarily be as great in case of occupations, trades, and professions which are beneficial to the community as in case of those not useful or beneficial, especially when immoral in their nature and tendency. Van Hook v. Selma, 70 Ala. 361, 45 Am. Rep. 85 (1881) (dictum).

In granting licenses the items which may be taken into consideration as elements in fixing the cost are the value and material in merely allowing and issuing the license, the value of the benefit of the license to the person obtaining the same, the value of the inconvenience and cost to the public in protecting such business and in permitting it to be carried on in the community and in some cases an additional amount imposed as a restraint upon the number of persons who might otherwise engage in the business. Leavenworth v. Booth, 13 Kan. 627 (1875) (dictum).

Thus, where the occupation, like peddling, is liable to degenerate into a public nuisance if not restrained, it is a legitimate exercise of the police power to impose a license fee large enough to act as a restraint upon the number of persons who might otherwise engage in it, though the sum exacted is greater than the expense of issuing a license and of police supervision over the business. Duluth v. Krupp, 46 Minn. 435 (1891).

And a municipal requirement of a license to peddle or deliver milk and of a fee of not less than $500 or more than $10 for every vehicle used for that purpose, under a power to license such persons as shall be best calculated to secure a supply of tion 11, article 12, are upon the same subject, and must be read together, and that they refer to taxation, and the equality and uniformity thereof, and that the last sentence of section 1, article 12, upon licenses, does not fall within the uniformity provision.

The laundry license fee is not obnoxious to the provisions of section 1 of the 14th amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 184 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1025; Pacific Exp. Co. v. Seibert, 142 U. S. 839, 35 L. ed. 1035, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 810.

It is also set up in the petition for the writ of mandamus, and, of course, admitted by the demurrer, that the relator below, and respondent here, is a subject of the emperor of China, and that the provision of the law requiring a fee of $25 from a male laundryman with one assistant was meant and intended to affect only Chinamen; that Chinamen are engaged in the class of laundry business falling within the $25 fee; that steam laundries employ a large number of persons, and make greater profits than the petitioner or his countrymen; and that he will not be able to conduct his business in competition with the steam laundry, if he is required to pay the license fixed by the laws cited. The fact that Chinamen are engaged in the hand laundry business is purely fortuitous. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 83 Fed. Rep. 121. The law, in its terms, applies to all male laundrymen, of every condition and nationality. If the equality and uniform-pure and wholesome milk, is a means of regulation and control and a proper restraint upon persons by whom milk is offered, and within the scope of the power granted. People v. Mulholland, 83 N. Y. 324, 37 Am. Rep. 568 (1880).

So, a license fee charged for the keeping of dogs is not invalid because more than the sum required for the expense of issuing it, as dogs are liable by running mad and destroying sheep to do great mischief, and the license fee may be fixed therefor with a view to restraints as well as regulation. Tenney v. Lenz, 16 Wis. 566 (1863).

And in Cole v. Hall, 103 Ill. 30 (1882), a license fee imposed by a municipality, of $1 for each dog, upon the owner thereof for the purpose of indemnifying the owners of sheep in case of damage committed by dogs, was upheld on that ground.

And a license fee required for keeping a saloon may be fixed at such an amount as will produce a considerable revenue in excess of the amount required for regulation, where the object is to restrain the number of places and keep the business within control. Kitson v. Ann Arbor, 26 Mich. 325 (1873).

So, a sufficient sum may be charged for a license to wholesale liquor dealers to restrict the persons selling as well as to compensate the municipality for additional police expenses that may directly or indirectly result from the traffic, as a license to wholesale dealers for police supervision, as well as in case of licenses authorizing sales in smaller quantities. Dennehy v. Chicago, 120 Ill. 627 (1887).

Thus, a municipal ordinance fixing the price of a retail license for the sale of spirituous liquors for one year at $125 is not designed to raise revenue, and is in no proper sense a tax, but a part of the police regulations, the fee being intended to prevent the indiscriminate opening of establishments for the sale of liquor thought to be dangerous to the public peace and morals. Burch v. Savannah, 42 Ga. 596 (1871) (dictum).

And a municipal requirement of a license of $50 per quarter or $200 per year for the sale of spirituous liquors will not be declared illegal when it does not appear but what that amount is necessary to properly regulate the business by confining it to fewer and more responsible persons, or in some other way tending to the preservation and enforcement of good order and the general welfare of the city. Ex parte McNally, 73 Cal. 632 (1887).

So, in Dennehy v. Chicago, supra, a license of $500 per annum charged to wholesale liquor dealers, was upheld.

The only license fee that can be required for ordinary legitimate kinds of business, like that of butcher, baker, auctioneer, or the like, which are not liable to become public nuisances, however, should be a sufficient sum to pay the cost of issuing the license and defray the expense of necessary police supervision, and it should not be competent to 30 L. R. A.

attempt to restrain the number of persons engaging in them by the imposition of a large fee. Duluth v. Krupp, 46 Minn. 436 (1891) (dictum).

Thus, a license tax of $500 imposed upon railroad ticket brokers or scalpers under a power to license, tax, and regulate is excessive, exorbitant, and illegal, where it would have the effect of prohibiting the business, as it is not per se injurious to the public. Hirshfield v. Dallas, 29 Tex. App. 242 (1890).

Nor is an annual license fee of $25 for selling vegetables in the streets of a city authorized under a power to regulate, where that sum is much in excess of what is necessary to cover the expense of its issue, as the business is not pernicious but beneficial, and there is little occasion for police supervision. St. Paul v. Traeger, 25 Minn. 243, 28 Am. Rep. 462 (1878).

And the occupation of an emigrant agent does not belong to that class which is so inherently harmful or dangerous to the public that it may be restricted or prohibited by the requirement of a prohibitive license fee or otherwise, where the occupation consists merely in hiring laborers in the city to be employed beyond its limits. State v. Moore, 118 N. C. 697, 23 L. R. A. 472 (1895).

So, in Marmet v. State, 45 Ohio St. 77 (1887), the general rule was laid down that power to regulate by license and to compel the payment of a reasonable fee may be maintained where a special benefit is conferred at the expense of the general public, or the business imposes a special burden on the public, or where the business is injurious to or involves danger to the public.

And in Perdue v. Ellis, 18 Ga. 586 (1855), in which an ordinance fixing the price of a retail liquor license at $500 was attacked on the ground that it was in restraint of trade, the court intimated its opinion that the price of a license ought to vary according to the profits of the business and other circumstances, but the ordinance was upheld on the ground that it was duly authorized by charter provision and therefore valid.

So, a license tax upon the business of running drays, imposed under a power to license and regulate, will not be held void as in restraint of trade and the levy of a tax, where the employment gives the draymen or hackmen special privileges which they enjoy to the prejudice of the city in the injury necessarily done to her streets and pavements of an amount far greater than the price of a license. Cincinnati v. Bryson, 15 Ohio, 625, 45 Am. Dec. 593 (1846).

And it is competent for a city council in fixing the sum required for a license to look at the probability that the city might be put to an expense in litigation and to other expenses arising out of the business licensed, as well as at the expediency of fixing such prices as to prevent persons from embarking in the business who could not furnish such evidence of their responsibility as that required by ity provisions of the Constitution do not apply to the license fee under consideration, the subjects of the emperor of China are certainly in no different or better condition to make complaint than the subjects of any other foreign power who may be residing within the state, or even the citizens of the United States themselves.

We are of opinion that the district court erred in issuing the writ of mandate. The questions which we have determined in this opinion are the only ones presented upon the appeal, and upon them is rested the decision. It is ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the case be remanded, with directions to dismiss the writ.

Pemberton, Ch. J., and Hunt, J., concur.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Iowa

V. A. WHEELOCK, App't.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A reasonable license fee charged upon itinerant vendors of drugs or ar-the payment of the fee. St. Paul v. Colter, 12 Minn. 41, 90 Am. Dec. 278 (1866).

And that a license tax imposed upon a telegraph company is wholly disproportioned to the usual, ordinary, or necessary expenses of municipal officers of issuing licenses and other expenses thereby imposed by the municipality, is not sufficient as a defense against the payment thereof where the liability imposed upon the city by the erection of telegraph poles is not considered. Chester City v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 154 Pa. 464 (1893).

But a license fee of an amount much greater than the cost of controlling and supervising the licensee cannot be sustained on the ground that demands might be made against the municipality imposing it on account of the licensee. Philadelphia v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 40 Fed. Rep. 615, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 728 (1899).

See also, as to a larger license fee than is necessary to meet expenses of regulation, supra, IV. c. 3, Distinction between measures for revenue and for regulation; IV. c. 7, What impositions are reasonable.

And see infra, 2, 3, of this section, as to the effect of fixing a license fee at a figure which will produce revenue.

2. Must not be for revenue.

A power to license and regulate does not confer authority to tax for revenue purposes. Vansant v. Harlem Stage Co. 59 Md. 380 (1882); Van Hook v. Selma, 70 Ala. 361, 45 Am. Rep. 85 (1881); Jacksonville v. Ledwith, 26 Fla. 163, 9 L. R. A. 69 (1890); Burlington v. Putnam Ins. Co. 31 Iowa, 102 (1870); Littlefield v. State, 42 Neb. 223, 28 L. R. A. 568 (1894); State v. Long Branch Comrs. 42 N. J. L. 364, 36 Am. Rep. 518 (1880); State v. New Brunswick, 48 N. J. L. 175 (1881); State v. Hoboken, 41 N. J. L. 71 (1879) (dictum).

And a license tax imposed by a city under its police power is invalid where the fees required are not for the purpose of paying the costs of labor and material in issuing the license and it is clearly intended as a means of revenue. Jackson v. Newman, 59 Miss. 385, 42 Am. Rep. 307 (1882); Van Hook v. Selma (dictum); State v. New Brunswick, and State v. Hoboken, supra.

And a power to grant licenses for the privilege of carrying on trades and regulating the price thereof is a police power which does not give the right to use a license as a mode of taxation for revenue, and the fee must be reasonable for the purpose of regulation. State v. Bean, 91 N. C. 554 (1884).

articles intended for the treatment of diseases, who publicly profess to cure or treat diseases, is not an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce, although the medicines sold are in original packages brought from another state.

2. A license fee of $100 per annum, charged upon an itinerant vendor of drugs professing to cure or treat all diseases, is not unreasonable.

And a charter provision, giving the city court exclusive jurisdiction to license innkeepers within the city limits, does not authorize the imposition of a tax on innkeepers for the license issued. Essex County Freeholders v. Barber, 7 N. J. L. 78 (1823).

Thus, in Jackson v. Newman, supra, a fee of $40 per year exacted by a city for a license for hack driving under its police power was held to be invalid as clearly intended as a means for raising revenue.

And a power to license insurance companies does not confer a right to charge a license fee therefor with a view to revenue, unless that seems to be its manifest purpose, but is limited to such a charge for the license as will cover the necessary expenses of issuing it and the additional labor of officers and the expense thereby incurred. St. Louis v. Boatmen's Ins. & T. Co. 47 Mo. 150 (1870); St. Louis v. Marine Ins. Co. Id. 163 (1870).

And a power to grant or refuse licenses to insurance companies does not justify a municipal requirement of the payment by insurance companies of 1 per cent of the premiums into the city treasury in addition to the sums required for licenses, such an exaction being a tax. Burlington v. Putnam Ins. Co. 31 Iowa, 102 (1870).

And a municipality authorized by charter provision to appoint measurers of coal, wood, etc., brought in for market and sold therein, and to make them a reasonable allowance and make such regulations as may be necessary and proper for carrying the same into effect, and inflict penalties for breach of such regulations, does not authorize the levy of a tax on coal, etc., for revenue purposes. It has power to tax thereunder only so far as is necessary to defray charges of inspection and measurement when required. Collins v. Louisville, 2 B. Mon. 184 (1841).

So, a grant of authority to regulate the vending of meats, etc., does not give power to tax the occupation of vending any of the named articles. Jacksonville v. Ledwith, 26 Fla. 163, 9 L. R. A. 69 (1890).

And a charter provision authorizing a municipality to license and regulate hawkers, peddlers, and others confers police power for the purpose of regulation only, and ordinances passed thereunder requiring a larger amount are in effect revenue measures and illegal. State v. New Brunswick, 48 N. J. L. 175 (1881).

A market, being a franchise or technical privilege, is not taxable except for regulation, under a charter provision authorizing taxes for the purpose

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Shelby County convicting him of being an itinerant vendor of drugs and nostrums without a license, contrary to the provisions of the statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pfau & Young and Whitney Brothers, for appellant:

The powers vested in Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes is a power to prescribe the rule by which that commerce is to be governed, and is a power complete in itself, acknowledging no limitations other than those prescribed in the Constitution.

Leisy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 100, 84 L. ed. 128, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 86; Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23; Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678; Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 81 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 828.

While, by virtue of its jurisdiction over persons and property within its limits, a state may provide for the security of the lives, limbs, health, and comfort of persons and the protection of property so situated, yet a subject-matter which has been confined by the Constitution exclusively to Congress is not within the of revenue upon all property and privileges taxable by the state for state purposes, and licensing, taxing, and regulating auctioneers and certain other designated employments and all other privileges taxable by the state, the term "all other privileges" meaning others of the same kind as those designated. Jacksonville v. Ledwith, supra.

And a license tax of 25 cents per day for keeping a private butcher's stand within the corporate limits of a town cannot be imposed under police powers to regulate private markets or the selling of meats, etc., at private stands. Delcambre v. Clere, 84 La. Ann. 1050 (1882).

These cases and those in the following subdivision are to be distinguished from those under statutes or charter provisions conferring the power to tax as well as to regulate. Cases of the latter character are collected, infra, IV. e. Under a power to tax or license.

There is some apparent conflict between the cases in the above subdivision and some of those in the following one by which the rule is laid down that the mere fact that a measure for regulation incidentally produces revenue will not invalidate it when its primary purpose is regulation or restraint, but in view of the latter class of cases, and of the absolute impossibility of fixing a rate which will just suffice to regulate without the slightest variation, it is thought that the above cases must be taken as going no farther than to prohibit the use of a power to regulate either for the sole purpose of revenue or with revenue as one of its direct purposes.

3. Distinction between measures for revenue and for regulation.

A reasonable fee for a license issued under a power to regulate is not a tax but simply a sum collected of the party interested for the purpose of defraying necessary expenses attending its issuance. St. Paul v. Dow, 37 Minn. 20 (1887).

And a measure adopted by a city in the exercise of a power to regulate will be upheld by the courts when plainly intended as a police regulation and the revenue derived therefrom is not disproportionate to the cost of issuing the license and regulation of the business licensed. Littlefield v. State, 42 Neb. 223, 28 L. R. A. 588 (1894).

And a license fee charged by a city for keeping a stall for the sale of fresh meats outside of the public market is not a tax, but compensation demanded from those who will not sell in the public market, for the additional expense thereby caused. Ash v. People, 11 Mich. 347, 88 Am. Dec. 740 (1863).

Thus an ordinance requiring each owner of a dog to procure a collar and pay a tax of $2 for each dog owned by him is not a revenue measure though called a tax, but is a valid exercise of the power to regulate. Com. v. Markham, 7 Bush, 486 (1870).

palilty upon persons keeping stands in the market is not a tax, though so called in the ordinance providing therefor, but a price demanded for accommodations provided, which is justified under ordinary municipal powers. Cincinnati v. Buckingham, 10 Ohio, 227 (1845).

And a charge of $25 on each day's exhibition of a circus, imposed by statute, is a charge for a license to exhibit, and not a tax to which a percentage fixed by the board of police can be added for county taxes, under the Mississippi statute. Orton v. Brown, 35 Miss. 426 (1856).

And a license required for building, and a fee of 50 cents for each license to erect, enlarge, or add to any building, under a power to regulate the erection of buildings, is not a tax for revenue purposes. Welch v. Hotchkiss, 89 Conn. 140, 12 Am. Rep. 388 (1872).

If the fee required for a license is intended for revenue, however, its exaction is an exercise of the power of taxation. Home Ins. Co. v. Augusta, 50 Ga. 590 (1874) (dictum).

And the sum demanded for a license to pursue an employment when used as a means of supplying the public treasury is a tax on such employment which is unauthorized in the absence of the power to tax. Mays v. Cincinnati, 1 Ohio St. 206 (1853).

In Mays v. Cincinnati, supra, Cincinnati v. Buckingham, 10 Ohio, 227 (1845), was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the sum exacted was not a tax but rather a price demanded for the accommodations provided for the frequenters of the market by the city authorities.

So, the amount of a license fee or charge is to be considered in determining whether or not the exaction is really one for revenue or prohibition, instead of one for regulation under the police power. Atkins v. Phillips, 26 Fla. 231, 10 L. R. A. 158 (1890) (dictum).

And an exaction of a sum for a license in excess of what is necessary to cover public expenses, and graduated by the amount of business done, is a tax upon the business upon its face. State v. Long Branch Comrs. 42 N. J. L. 364, 36 Am. Rep. 518 (1890); Re Wan Yin, 10 Sawy. 532 (1885).

Thus, a license fee required of draymen, which is so large as not to be necessary to secure the objects of the grant of power and as to have been principally for revenue, is in effect a tax, and not within a charter power to regulate drays, etc. Fort Smith v. Ayers, 43 Ark. 82 (1884).

And an ordinance imposing a license fee of 25 cents per wagon on wagons run for hire, and an additional license tax of $2 for each six months for the privilege of exercising the vocation, is as a matter of law one for revenue purposes, and invalid when enacted under police power. Knox City v. Thompson, 19 Mo. App. 523 (1885).

So, a fee of $75 for an original license, imposed by a municipality upon owners of passenger omnijurisdiction of the police power of the state, unless placed there by congressional action.

Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Huse, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527; Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 446, 29 L. ed. 691; Robbins v. Shelby County Tax. Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694; Leisy v. Hardin, supra.

Whenever a particular power of the general government is one which must necessarily be exercised by it, and Congress remains silent, this is not only not a concession that the powers reserved by the states may be exerted as if a specific power had not been elsewhere reposed, but, on the contrary, the only legiti-mate conclusion is that the general government intended that the power should not be affirmatively exercised.

Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557, 30 L. ed. 244; Robbins v. Shelby County Tax. Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694; Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 86.

The license is in effect a tax upon the goods shipped and sold by the licensee, upon the property of a nonresident while in the hands of the owner, and, before the same has become a part of the mass of the property of the state buses upon each omnibus used within the corporate limits, and $50 for the annual renewal thereof, is unreasonable and excessive, and invalid as an attempted exercise of the power of taxation not granted by the statute. Vansant v. Harlem Stage Co. 59 Md. 380 (1882).

And a license fee exacted from gardeners, of 25 cents for every load of vegetables sold in a public market, will be regarded as a measure for creating revenue and cannot be justified under the police power, where the presence of the gardeners and their wagons does not cause additional expense to the city but tends to increase her revenue. State v. Blaser, 36 La. Ann. 368 (1884).

So, an ordinance requiring an annual license fee of $100 for the privilege of engaging in the fish and crab business at a designated market, enacted under a power to regulate markets and sell, lease, or dispose of the stalls and stands therein, is invalid as an effort to raise revenue under guise of the police power, where it is far in excess of the expense of issuing the license and regulation of the calling. State v. Rowe, 73 Md. 548 (1890).

And a license fee of $3 per month exacted for the privilege of selling butcher's meat was held to be a tax for revenue purposes, and not an exercise of police power conferred upon the corporation, and therefore illegal, in State v. Bean, 91 N. C. 554 (1884).

And a license fee of $25 for a saloon and $50 annually for peddling with a wagon, required of liquor dealers in addition to other licenses, is a revenue measure, and invalid as against one having a general license to sell beer in the county. Du Bolstown v. Rochester Brewing Co. 9 Pa. Co. Ct. 442.

So, a license fee charged for the privilege of building vaults in the streets in front of the licensee's dwelling, which is graduated by the capacity of the vault, is a tax or assessment and not a regulation, within a charter provision authorizing the regulation of the building of vaults. State v. Hoboken, 83 N. J. L. 280 (1890).

So, a license fee of $250 per month or $25 per day for shorter periods, exacted from transient merchants by ordinance, is excessive and invalid as an attempted exercise of the taxing power, the fee not being required for regulation, and the business not being injurious or liable to become a nuisance. Ottumwa v. Zekind (Iowa) 29 L. R. A. 734 (1896).

Ottumwa v. Zekind, supra, distinguishes Decorah v. Dunstan Bros. infra, IV. c. 7, upon the ground that in that case the license tax was imposed upon auctioneers and not on transient merchants, and that auctioneers require more supervision.

And a license tax cannot be upheld as a provision for inspection with respect to goods brought from another state, when the amount of the tax is in excess of what is required for the purposes of inspection and the proceeds are applied to other uses. American Fertilizing Co. v. North Carolina Board of Agriculture, 43 Fed. Rep. 608, 11 L. R. A. 179 (1890).

The fact that a city derives a revenue incidentally from a reasonable exercise of its police power in licensing, regulating, and controlling a business, however, is no serious objection to such control. Mankato v. Fowler, 33 Minn. 384 (1884) (dictum); State v. Hoboken, 41 N. J. L. 71 (1879) (dictum).

And a reasonable license fee imposed under a power to regulate is not necessarily invalid because it incidentally produces revenue. St. Paul v. Colter, 12 Minn. 41, 90 Am. Dec. 278 (1866).

And a license fee will not be regarded as a revenue measure because fixed at a rate designed to prevent the indiscriminate engagement in the business licensed, where it is one which is dangerous to the public peace and morals. Burch v. Savannah, 42 Ga. 596 (1871) (dictum).

Thus, a reasonable charge for a license imposed by a municipality upon a railroad within its limits as a police regulation is valid and reasonable though it incidentally augments the receipts of the treasury. Johnson v. Philadelphia, 60 Pa. 445 (1890).

So, in Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 365, 27 L. ed. 419 (1882), it was said that the power to license is a police power though it may be used for the purpose of raising revenue.

But it must appear that the means adopted are such as are reasonably necessary to accomplish the purpose of regulation. State v. Hoboken, supra (dictum).

And a requirement of a license fee of $50 for large cars and $25 for small ones, of a street-railroad company, which regulates nothing but to prohibit the running of the cars until the fee is paid, is not a measure of regulation but the imposition of a tax. New York v. Second Ave. R. Co. 32 N. Y. 261, 34 Barb. 43 (1865).

So, a license fee for keeping a butcher's stand or selling articles within the corporate limits and without the market place is a tax for revenue, and not a contribution legally authorized in the exercise of the police power. Mestayer v. Corrige, 88 La. Ann. 707.

Where the leading and primary purpose is regulation, it is a license and not a tax, though, as a secondary purpose, it is designed to produce revenue. Ex parte Gregory, 20 Tex. App. 210, 54 Am. Rep. 516 (1886).

Numerous cases illustrating as to what is reasonable for the purpose of regulation and what will be deemed an attempted exercise of the taxing power, will be found infra, IV. c. 7, What impositions are reasonable.

4. Must not be unreasonable or in restraint of trade.

The amount of a license fee exacted by a municipality for the transaction of a business in it, under a general power conferred by its charter, must be reasonable and not oppressive, partial or in restraint of trade. Ex parte Frank, 53 Cal. 608, 29 Am. Rep. 642 (1878); Bloomington v. Wahl, 46 Ill. 439 (1868).

seeking to tax it, is a measure regulating interstate commerce, and therefore void.

Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 811, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 184; Robbins v. Shelby County Tax. Dist. and Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, supra; Cook v. Pennsylvania, 97 U. S. 568, 24 L. ed. 1015; State Freight Tax Case, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 282, 21 L. ed. 146; Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, supra; Ratterman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 127 U. S. 411, 32 L. ed. 229, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 59.

The smallness of the license or tax does not eliminate its regulative character.

Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 429, 6 L. ed. 685; State Freight Tax Case, 82 U. S. 232, 21 L. ed. 146.

The purpose for which the license for selling proprietary medicine in the state of Iowa is exacted does not render the statute constitutional if in effect it lays a burden upon interstate commerce.

State Freight Tax Case, supra.

Because the statute in question is indiscriminate it is not for that reason constitutional, in so far as it applies to the facts in the case at bar.

Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U.

And it must not create oppressive monopolies but must be calculated to advance the general welfare of the inhabitants of the municipality. Bloomington v. Wahl, supra.

The amount of a license fee adopted under a power to grant licenses for the privileges of carrying on trades and regulating the price therefor, must be reasonable for the purpose of regulation. State v. Bean, 91 N. C. 554 (1884).

And an ordinance purporting on its face to be for the levying and collection of a license tax, but which is a clear and palpable attempt to destroy and prohibit a legitimate and commendable business, is invalid and cannot be enforced. Lyons v. Cooper, 30 Kan. 324 (1888).

And the invalidity of an ordinance fixing the price for a license to retail liquors at a prohibitory figure is not affected by the fact that a dealer who had submitted to its terms had done a prosperous business. Ex parte Burnett, 30 Ala. 461 (1857).

5. Reasonableness, by whom determined.

What is a reasonable license fee must depend largely upon the sound discretion of the city council with reference to all the circumstances of the case. Re White, 43 Minn. 250 (1890) (dictum); Manakato v. Fowler, 32 Minn. 364 (1884).

And the courts will not interpose and declare a license tax to be unjust and unreasonable unless a flagrant case of excessive and oppressive abuse of power by the city authorities in levying the tax is established. Lyons v. Cooper, supra.

So, in Osborne v. State, 33 Fla. 162, 25 L. R. A. 120, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 731 (1894), a doubt was expressed as to whether judicial action could be based even upon a showing that the imposition was prohibitive or destructive to the business on which it was imposed.

But the courts have power to inquire into the reasonableness of a fee exacted in the exercise by a municipality of a power to regulate, though considerable latitude will be allowed for the exercise of legislative discretion. Littlefield v. State, 42 Neb. 223, 23 L. R. A. 588 (1894).

The city authorities are primarily at least the judges of what is a reasonable fee for a license, and it is not within the legitimate province of a court to fix the precise amount to be charged, but it is the right and duty of the courts to decide whether the amount so fixed is unreasonable or excessive. Vansant v. Harlem Stage Co. 59 Md. 380 (1882) (dictum).

And it belongs to the court to determine what are reasonable regulations made by a municipality within the power granted by charter. State v. Orange, 50 N. J. L. 369 (1889); Kip v. Paterson, 26 N. J. L. 298 (1867) (dictum); Glaser v. Cincinnati, 31 Ohio L. J. 243 (1893).

And whether the circumstances incident to the inspection or regulation of occupations justify the imposition of a rate prescribed by ordinance for a legitimate purpose, is a proper subject of testimony where the validity of the ordinance is in question. State v. New Brunswick, 43 N. J. L. 173 (1871) (dictum).

But evidence of the population of the city and county and of the annual sales of liquor and the profits therefrom is inadmissible on a jury trial in an action for violation of an ordinance imposing a license tax on liquor dealers claimed to be unreasonable and prohibitive in amount, the question of the reasonableness of the ordinance being one for the court. Elk Point v. Vaughn, 1 Dak. 118 (1875).

6. Presumption of reasonableness.

The amount required to be paid for a license demanded under a power to regulate, however, will be presumed to be reasonable unless the contrary appears. Fayetteville v. Carter, 52 Ark. 301, 6 L. R. A. 509 (1890); Van Hook v. Selma, 70 Ala. 361, 45 Am. Rep. 85 (1881); Littlefield v. State, 42 Neb. 223, 23 L. R. A. 588 (1894).

The judiciary will not declare such a requirement void unless from its inherent character or from previous proofs adduced it is shown to be unreasonable. Littlefield v. State, and Van Hook v. Selma, supra.

Every fair intendment should be made in favor of its reasonableness. Vansant v. Harlem Stage Co. 59 Md. 380 (1882) (dictum).

Whether it was intended as a regulation or a tax, see State v. Long Branch Comrs. 43 N. J. L. 364, 36 Am. Rep. 518 (1880) (dictum).

And where a municipal government imposes a license charge in the exercise of its police power on a business which, for the protection of the health of the community, requires daily inspection and supervision, the amount of the charge will be presumed to be reasonable and not a tax for revenue, unless the contrary appears on the face of the ordinance or is established by proper evidence. Atkins v. Phillips, 26 Fla. 231, 10 L. R. A. 158 (1890).

Thus, a municipal requirement of a license fee of $500 for the privilege of selling intoxicating liquor cannot be held as a matter of law to be so large as to render it void as unreasonable and prohibitory. Wiley v. Owens, 39 Ind. 429 (1872).

And it cannot be judicially assumed that a city ordinance requiring the payment of $50 every ninety days for the privilege of retailing spirituous liquors in quantities less than one quart in the city of Oakland is a virtual prohibition of the sale of such liquors. Ex parte Hurl, 49 Cal. 557 (1875).

And an ordinance exacting a license fee of $10 from all persons engaged in selling merchandise, enacted under a power to license for the purpose of regulation, will be held to be valid in the absence of anything to show that the amount exacted was unreasonable or in excess of the amount necessary for that purpose. Van Hood v. Selma, 70 Ala. 361, 45 Am. Rep. 85 (1881).

Neither will the court say as a matter of law that

S. 507, 31 L. ed. 714, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 825; Robbins v. Shelby County Tax. Dist. 120 U. S. 429, 30 L. ed. 694; State Freight Tax Case, supra.

The right to tax applies equally as well to the principal as to the agent.

Robbins v. Shelby County Tax. Dist. supra.

Interstate commerce cannot be interdicted or regulated under cover of police power.

Leisy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 100, 84 L. ed. 128, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 36; Cooley v. Port Wardens, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299, 13 L. ed. 996; Robbins v. Shelby County Tax. Dist. and Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra.

Messrs. Milton Remley, Attorney General, and Thomas A. Cheshire, for appellee:

The state has power to levy a tax upon occupations.

State v. Blair (Iowa) 60 N. W. Rep. 486; Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754; Hinson v. Lott, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 148, 19 L. ed. 387; Woodruff v. Parham, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 128, 19 L. ed. 582; Nathan v. Louisiana, 49 U. S. 8 How. 73, 12 L. ed. 992; Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678; Ward v. Maryland, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. ed. 449; Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 499, 25 L. ed. 562; Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 103 Ill. 574; Corson v. State, 57 Md. 268; Marshalltown v. Blum, 58 Iowa, 184, 43 Am. Rep. 115; Pacific Junction v. Dyer, 64 Iowa, 38.

a license fee of $100 per boat is not within a power conferred upon a municipality to regulate and license. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 365, 27 L. ed. 419 (1882).

And a license fee of $5 per annum for each skiff kept for use is not so plainly unreasonable that an ordinance requiring it will be held void, when there is nothing in the record from which it can be seen that such price is not entirely fair and just. Poyer v. Desplaines, 22 Ill. App. 576 (1887).

Nor is a license fee of $12.50, required under a power to regulate the soliciting from travelers of patronage for hotels, conferred upon municipal corporations by Manaf. (Ark.) Dig. § 751, unreasonable. Fayetteville v. Carter, 62 Ark. 301, 6 L. R. A. 509 (1890).

So, a license fee of $60 per annum for each car imposed by ordinance of the city of Chicago on street-car companies occupying its streets under a power to license, is not excessive or unreasonable upon its face. Allerton v. Chicago, 9 Biss. 552 (1880).

Neither is a license fee of $100 for one year, $60 for six months, $5 for one month, and $5 for one day, for peddling within the city of Duluth. Duluth v. Krupp, 45 Minn. 435 (1891).

Nor is a license fee of $10 for conducting an employment agency when the business is limited to the employment of females within designated counties, and of $150 when the business extends to the employment of males or of females elsewhere than in such counties. Moore v. Minneapolis, 43 Minn. 418 (1890).

And a municipal requirement of $10 per year for the privilege of peddling milk, and an additional fee of $2 per year for persons owning only two cows and delivering by hand, is not inherently unreasonable. Littlefield v. State, 42 Neb. 223, 23 L. R. A. 598 (1894).

There are New Jersey decisions, however, to the effect that the burden of proof of reasonableness rests with the municipality making the imposition.

Thus, an ordinance requiring a fee of 5 cents per load of all persons who sell hay or other produce and deliver the same within the city is unreasonable and illegal where it is not shown on the part of the city how the imposition will tend to promote good order. Kip v. Patterson, 26 N. J. L. 296 (1867).

And a license fee of $5 imposed on each hawker or peddler with the privilege of using one peddler wagon or cart under a police power is invalid, unless shown to be within the limit of the necessary or probable expense of issuing the license and inspecting and regulating the business licensed. State v. New Brunswick, 43 N. J. L. 175 (1881). But see State v. Long Branch Comrs. supra.

So, in Osborne v. State, 33 Fla. 162, 25 L. R. A. 120, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 731 (1894), a license for $200 for doing express business in a state of 15,000 inhabitants was held not to be excessive when not shown to be prohibitive or destructive to the business of express companies.

7. What impositions are reasonable.

By unreasonableness the courts do not simply mean that the tax must not be larger than the judges might think wise, though a tax might be held unreasonable because of its oppressiveness, as, for example, when a business of $1,000 a year was taxed $900. Cooper v. District of Columbia, 4 MacArth. 250 (1880).

Reasonableness cannot be determined by any hard and fast rules, but is relative, depending upon the cost of regulation, the character of the business regulated, and the circumstances of each particular case.

Thus, a city cannot in the exercise of its police powers exact an exorbitant tax from a person engaged in the sale of spirituous or fermented liquors at a place remote from the settled portion of the city, where no police supervision is ever made over such place. Salt Lake City v. Wagner, 2 Utah, 400 (1879).

In Falmouth v. Watson, 5 Bush, 600 (1880), however, it was held that municipal authority to exact payment of not more than $300 from any person selling spirituous liquors by retail within 1 mile of the town is a police regulation, and is not unconstitutional as taking private property for public use, though it would be so if it were a mere tax for municipal purposes outside the municipal limits.

But in Salt Lake City v. Wagner, supra, Falmouth v. Watson, supra, was distinguished on the ground that in the latter case the vending of ardent spirits was in such proximity to the town as to render its exercise liable to affect the good order of the local community.

So ordinarily a large license fee will be held unreasonable when no regulation is attempted or needed.

Thus, an ordinance entitling the city constable to $2 for each night of attendance, to be paid by the owners or exhibitors of every theater, is unreasonable and invalid, when his services are unnecessary, and a city tax of $50 per month was provided for by a previous ordinance under a general charter, the object of which is the preservation of good order within the city. Waters v. Leech, 3 Ark. 110 (1840).

And a municipal by-law requiring a license fee of from $5 to $30 per month, at the discretion of the president, for keeping a huckster's shop, enacted under a power to make prudential by-laws and regulations not contrary to law, is unreasonable and in restraint of trade where it is not shown that any restriction was necessary or that such shops could be an evil if conducted under proper regulations. Dunham v. Rochester, 5 Cow. 462 (1826).

And a license tax of $20 a year, imposed by a municipality upon proprietors of wash houses un-

The statute under which defendant was indicted does not discriminate against nonresidents.

State v. Gouss, 85 Iowa, 21; State v. Parsons, 124 Mo. 486.

The law in question is within the police power of the state as well as the taxing power.

Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 140, 63 Am. Dec. 625; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 84; Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 38, 21 L. ed. 894; Council Bluffs v. Kansas City, St. J. & O. B. R. Co. 45 Iowa, 342, 24 Am. Rep. 773; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, §85; Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23.

After the box, or barrel, or crate in which goods are shipped is opened, the articles contained therein, because done up in small boxes, bottles, or cans, cannot be called and treated as original packages.

Keith v. State, 91 Ala. 2, 10 L. R. A. 430; State v. Parsons, supra; Com. v. Schollenberger, 156 Pa. 201, 22 L. R. A. 155, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 488; Re Harmon, 43 Fed. Rep. 372; Smith v. State, 54 Ark. 248; State v. Chapman, 1 S. D. 414, 10 L. R. A. 432.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The conviction of the defendant was had under section 10 of chapter 75 of the Acts of the 18th General Assembly, as amended by section 2 of chapter 187 of the Acts of the 19th General Assembly and section 8 of chapter 83 of the Acts of the 21st General Assembly, which der a power to regulate, is an unreasonable and arbitrary exaction for the purpose of revenue, and invalid where there is nothing in the business or proposed regulation from which the city is likely to incur any special expense. Re Wan Yin, 10 Sawy. 532 (1885). But see principal case, State v. French, in this connection.

So, a license fee of $1,000 on the occupation of an emigrant agent, unaccompanied by any police regulation whatever, is unreasonable, prohibitive, and illegal. State v. Moore, 113 N. C. 697, 22 L. R. A. 472 (1893).

And an ordinance establishing a license fee of $3 for each vehicle drawn by two horses, and $1 for each vehicle drawn by one horse, enacted under a power to regulate and license vehicles, is invalid, as a revenue measure, where no attempt is made to regulate and all classes of business may be carried on by those who pay the license. Brooklyn v. Nodine, 26 Hun, 512 (1882).

And as a general rule, at least with reference to employments not requiring restraint, a fee which is disproportionate to the cost of regulation will be deemed unreasonable.

Thus, license fees imposed by municipalities upon a corporation occupying its streets, amounting in all to $1,600 per annum, is unreasonable and void in the absence of a power to tax, where the cost of supervising and controlling the corporation for the protection of persons and property had for several years been only $35 per annum. Philadelphia v. Western U. Tele. Co. 40 Fed. Rep. 615, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 728 (1889).

And a municipal ordinance imposing a license tax upon a railroad company of $15 for every one-horse car, and $25 for every two-horse car, which would amount annually to about $1,745, under a police power to regulate, is invalid as a revenue measure where there is nothing to show that such sum would be a reasonable compensation for inspecting and regulating the company's business. State v. Hoboken, 41 N. J. L. 71 (1879).

But in New Orleans v. New Orleans City & Lake R. Co. 40 La. Ann. 587 (1888), a license fee of $25 per year for carrying on and operating a horse and steam railway for the transportation of passengers was upheld under attack upon the ground that it was not a business, within the meaning of the law, which could be subjected to the payment of a license.

So, a license fee of 25 cents for every load of vegetables in carts or wagons sold at a public market, to meet the expense of issuing a license authorizing the licensee to back his wagon against the banquette, and of facilities afforded to gardeners of the city, is unreasonable where no shelter is afforded and such payments would amount to about $91 per year each. State v. Blaser, 36 La. Ann. 363 (1884).

And it cannot be deemed an exaction to meet 30 L. R. A.

expenses necessary for the preservation of order among wagons and teamsters where it is only imposed upon persons not occupying stalls therein. Id.

And a license fee of $10 per month, imposed solely on street peddlers of fresh meat selling less than a specified quantity in a village having no market and therefore no market regulations, would be excessive and unreasonable and in restraint of trade. Chaddock v. Day, 4 L. R. A. 809, 75 Mich. 527 (1899).

But a license fee of $15 per year for the right to sell meats in the city of Chicago would be sustained under a power to regulate, even if the narrow rule were followed that under the power to regulate the license fee cannot exceed the necessary or probable expense of issuing the license and of inspecting and regulating the business which it covers. Kinsley v. Chicago, 124 Ill. 359 (1888).

And a monthly license of $5 charged by a municipality for vending fresh meats outside of the public markets, at private markets, will not be deemed an abuse of power or an unauthorized attempt to raise revenue, where such sales require daily inspection and supervision for the protection of the public health. Atkins v. Phillips, 26 Fla. 231, 10 L. R. A. 158 (1890).

And a license fee of $5 for keeping a stall for the sale of fresh meats outside of a public market may be required by a municipal corporation in the exercise of its police power for the maintenance of the public health. Ash v. People, 11 Mich. 847, 83 Am. Dec. 740 (1863).

And in Ex parte Heylman, 92 Cal. 492 (1891), a municipal ordinance taxing a license fee for selling meat from vehicles or baskets at $75 per quarter, and for selling fish, vegetables, fruit, game, poultry, etc., from vehicles or baskets at $10 per quarter, was held to be valid, but the ground upon which it was attacked does not appear.

So, a license tax imposed upon water companies without regard to their respective use of the city streets or the labor cast upon the city by such use, or anything to indicate that the fee is exacted for any additional police supervision made necessary by such use, is not authorized by the police power conferred upon the city by the general welfare clause of its charter. Wilkesbarre v. Crystal Springs Water Co. 7 Kulp, 81 (1896).

But a city ordinance imposing upon telegraph companies a license tax of $1 per year for each pole is not so unreasonable in amount as to justify the court in interfering with the discretion of the municipal authorities. Chester City v. Western U. Tele. Co. 154 Pa. 464 (1893).

And in New Orleans v. Louisiana Sav. Bank, 31 La. Ann. 637 (1879), a license tax of $1,000, imposed by a city upon banks was upheld under a claim by a savings bank that such tax was included in a charter exemption from taxation except on real estate.

contains the following: "Any itinerant vendor of any drug, nostrum, ointment, or appliance of any kind intended for the treatment of diseases or injury, who shall by writing or printing or by any other method publicly profess to cure or treat diseases or injury or deformity by any drug, nostrum, or manipulation, or other expedient, shall pay a license of $100 per annum, to be paid to the treasurer of the commission of pharmacy. . . . Any person violating this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall upon conviction pay a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $200." In July, 1894, the defendant was engaged in the business of selling on commission proprietary medicines which were manufactured in the state of Minnesota by J. R. Watkins, and were owned by him until sold. He was a resident of Minnesota, and the medicines were placed in glass bottles, securely corked, sealed, and capped, and were brought into the state, and sold in the original packages in which they were placed by the manufacturer. The medicines as prepared, and as received in this state by the defendant, were a legitimate subject of commerce, and were not injurious to the public health. They were transported by Watkins from the place where they were manufactured to Harlan, in this state, where they were received by the defendant, and there offered for sale. In making the sales he traveled from place to place with a team and wagon, and, while so engaged, sold one of the packages to one M. B. Howe, in Shelby county,

And in Chicago Pkg. & P. Co. v. Chicago, 88 Ill. 221, 30 Am. Rep. 545 (1878), a charge of $100 per annum for a license for running a slaughter house was upheld, but the question upon which the case turned was that of the power to require it under a statute giving cities and villages power to regulate the management, etc., of such houses within their limit and to the distance of 1 mile beyond, where the slaughter house in question was situated outside the city but within the mile limit and in another town by which it was required to pay a license.

So, a fee of $300 for an auctioneer's license is unreasonable as a police regulation in a city of 6,000 or 7,000 inhabitants whose trade is chiefly local and at retail, and where it proves to have prevented all auction sales from the date of its requirement. Maukato v. Fowler, 32 Minn. 364 (1884).

And a license tax of $10 per day for not less than ten days, imposed upon persons selling or exposing for sale at auction any bankrupt or other stock of goods in a city containing more than 5,000 inhabitants, is invalid, as being oppressive, prohibitive, and unreasonable considering the nature of the business. Caldwell v. Lincoln, 19 Neb. 569 (1886).

But a license tax of $5 per day for sales by auction is not so high that the courts will adjudge it unreasonable and oppressive and in restraint of trade when the city contains more than 2,000 inhabitants and it is matter of common knowledge that permanent auction stores are scarcely ever found therein. Fretwell v. Troy, 18 Kan. 271 (1877).

And an ordinance authorizing the mayor to fix the amount of a license for selling at auction at not to exceed $25 for the first day of the auction and $20 for subsequent days, enacted under a power to regulate and license, is not subject to the objection that it is not definite as to the amount required to be paid, or unreasonable, oppressive, or in restraint of trade. Decorah v. Dunstan Bros. 38 Iowa, 96 (1874).

So, a city ordinance imposing a license fee on each carriage used in the streets, varying from $1 to $20 according to the kind of carriage and stand kept, is not authorized under a power to adopt rules and ordinances for the regulation of omnibuses, stages, etc., as the dissimilarity in the sums required precludes the assumption that it is required to meet the expenses incident to giving a license. Com. v. Stodder, 2 Cush. 522, 48 Am. Dec. 679 (1848).

In Com. v. Stodder, supra, Boston v. Schaffer, 9 Pick. 415 (1830), in which a money license for a theatrical exhibition was held valid, was distinguished upon the ground that power to make the imposition was clearly conferred by statute.

But a license tax on vehicles, graduated at $5 on those drawn by one horse, and $8 on those drawn by two horses, and $12 on those drawn by three or 30 L. R. A.

more, is not unreasonable. Gibson v. Cornopolla, 22 Pitts. L. J. N. S. 64, 8 Lanc. L. Rev. 359 (1891).

And $3 will not be deemed an unreasonable fee for issuing a license to a drayman or hackman and keeping the necessary registers, in the absence of any showing on the subject. Cincinnati v. Bryson, 15 Ohio, 625, 45 Am. Dec. 593 (1846).

And a license tax imposed by a municipality, of $10 for each vehicle drawn by more than two animals, is not unreasonable or in restraint of trade as to one who constantly uses heavy wagons with four-horse teams heavily loaded in the streets. Gartside v. East St. Louis, 48 Ill. 47 (1867).

And an ordinance requiring a license fee not otherwise unreasonable is not rendered unreasonable by the fact that the law requires the fees provided for to be used for other purposes and not for the purpose of enforcing the ordinance, funds for which are provided by taxation. Littlefield v. State, 42 Neb. 223, 28 L. R. A. 538 (1894).

So, a prohibitive license tax is usually deemed unreasonable, though it may be large enough to act as a restraint when the business is one which might become an evil if unrestrained.

Thus, an ordinance fixing a license fee for selling goods at retail from house to house at not less than $1 nor more than $25 for a fixed time, in the discretion of the mayor, is void for unreasonableness as the time for which the sum fixed may be changed is left wholly with the mayor, and he might fix so short a time as to amount to a refusal to license at all. State Center v. Barenstein, 65 Iowa, 249 (1885).

And an ordinance requiring a license fee of $25 per day for selling goods, wares, and merchandise at auction is invalid as being unreasonable, prohibitive, and in restraint of trade, and opposed to public policy. Sipe v. Murphy, 49 Ohio St. 536, 17 L. R. A. 184 (1902).

So, a municipal ordinance requiring a hawker or peddler who travels on foot to pay a license of $10 for the first day and $5 for each subsequent day, and if he travels with one horse, $20 for the first day and $15 for each subsequent day, and if he travels with two or more horses $25 for the first day and $15 for each subsequent day,—is invalid as unreasonable and in restraint of trade. Brooks v. Mangan, 36 Mich. 676 (1891).

And an ordinance requiring the payment of a license fee of $50 per day from each transient dealer doing business in the city, enacted under a police power, is invalid as being unreasonable, prohibitive, in restraint of trade, and against public policy, and tending to create a monopoly. Glaser v. Cincinnati, 81 Ohio L. J. 243 (1893).

And in People v. Russell, 49 Mich. 617, 48 Am. Rep. 473 (1883), it was held that a license fee of $15 per year, imposed upon peddlers by municipal ordinances, is unreasonable and excessive where the charter gives power to license and regulate but not to tax them.

in the condition in which it was sent from Minnesota. He did not at that or any other time represent himself to be a physician; nor assume to determine the ailments of the people; but he distributed printed circulars of Watkins', which represented the medicines to be a cure for certain diseases named in the circulars, and the defendant represented that the medicine sold by him was as stated in the circular. At the time the business described was carried on, and the sale specified was made, the defendant did not have a license as contemplated by the statute, nor was he a physician or registered pharmacist. At that time Howe was a resident of this state.

The appellant contends that the acts under which he was convicted are repugnant to that part of section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States which provides that the Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several states, and the only question we are required to determine is whether the claim thus made is well founded. The record clearly shows that it must be regarded, for the purposes of this case, as conceded that the defendant was an itinerant vendor of drugs and nostrums, without a license, within the meaning of the statutes of this state which we have set out, and that the medicines he sold were in the original packages in which they were shipped into this state. It is true that the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce among the several states is a power complete in itself to prescribe the rules

But in Re White, 48 Minn. 250 (1890), it was held that a license fee of $3 a day, required of hawkers or peddlers, cannot be said to be excessive in view of the character of the business and the short period for which such business usually runs.

And in Cherokee v. Fox, 34 Kan. 16 (1886), an ordinance requiring a license fee of $2.50 per day of professional hawkers and peddlers for selling or offering for sale any article of merchandise or traffic kept by any merchant or manufacturer in the city, at retail, was upheld when attacked as class legislation, and as partial and oppressive in its operation, and as making unjust discriminations and being inconsistent with public policy.

And in Chicago v. Barte, 100 Ill. 61 (1881), a license fee of $5 per annum, imposed upon persons engaged in selling and delivering milk from wagons or other vehicles was upheld, but the ground of attack was that it was not authorized by a charter conferring power to license and regulate hawkers and peddlers. See also, in this connection, the principal case, STATE v. WHEELLOCK.

So, a by-law of a town fixing the price of a license for retailing liquors at $1,000, is prohibitory in its nature and cannot be justified under a power to grant licenses, or as an exercise of one of the incidental powers of a municipal corporation. Craig v. Burnett, 32 Ala. 728 (1858); Ex parte Burnett, 30 Ala. 461 (1867).

But a municipal ordinance establishing a license tax of $25 per month for the sale of spirituous and fermented liquors is not void because unreasonable, oppressive, or in restraint of trade. Ex parte Benninger, 64 Cal. 202 (1883).

And a municipal ordinance of the city of Eureka, requiring a license fee of $30 per quarter or $200 per year for the sale of spirituous liquors, is not oppressive or unreasonable, or prohibitory of the business of retailing intoxicating liquors. Ex parte McNally, 73 Cal. 632 (1887).

So, a license tax of $150, imposed upon groceries, confectioneries, and coffee houses opened for the purpose of retailing spirituous liquors, under a power to tax privileges, will not be held to be oppressive or unequal where it does not appear that extensive improvements are not in progress and that other privileges are not also paying high taxes. Columbia v. Bealy, 1 Humph. 232, 34 Am. Dec. 646 (1839).

And a license fee of $100 for keeping a saloon, placing no restrictions upon the saloon keeper as to the stock he deals in, will not be held to be excessive, although the sale of liquor is prohibited by general law. Wolf v. Lansing, 63 Mich. 387 (1884).

And in Mason v. Lancaster, 4 Bush, 406 (1868), a fee of $125 exacted by a municipality for a liquor license under a charter provision conferring the right to license and providing that the tax therefor shall be fixed at not to exceed $200 per annum, was upheld, but the question considered was as to 30 L. R. A.

the constitutionality of the charter provision by which the power was delegated.

So, a license fee of $300 exacted by a municipality for keeping billiard tables, is not subject to the objection that it is extravagant, unreasonable, and prohibitive, as the business licensed is not a matter of necessity, but of mere pleasure or luxury. Re Neilly, 37 U. C. Q. B. 239 (1875).

And in Church v. Richards, 6 U. C. Q. B. 569 (1849), a municipal charge of £10 for keeping billiard tables in addition to the provincial duty was not looked upon as too burdensome.

So, a provision of a city ordinance imposing a license fee of $50 per day upon every transient dealer or person who opens a store or place for the temporary sale of goods, wares, and merchandise is an unreasonable exercise of a power granted to a city to provide for licensing transient dealers or persons opening temporary stores or places of sale, and is invalid. Glaser v. Cincinnati, 31 Ohio L. J. 243 (1899).

But in Wynne v. Wright, 1 Dev. & B. L. 19 (1834), a license tax of $20 on every vehicle employed by a person in carrying jewelry from county to county for sale was upheld under attack as being unconstitutional and invalid, but the question of amount was not raised.

And a requirement by a municipality that persons owning vehicles for hire within its limits, and who have paid their city licenses, shall obtain from the city plates which are required by ordinance for the convenient identification of the vehicles and pay therefor from 8 to 150 times their cost, is another license in disguise and is exorbitant and unreasonable. Walker v. New Orleans, 31 La. Ann. 828 (1879).

And a license fee of $50 per day, charged by the city of Chicago for the privilege of operating the Ferris Wheel, is unreasonable and invalid. Ferris Wheel Co. v. Chicago (Ill.) 27 Chicago Leg. News, 399 (1894).

But a license tax of $5 per month, imposed as a police regulation on each stall in a public market, is not excessive. Jacksonville v. Ledwith, 26 Fla. 163, 9 L. R. A. 69 (1890).

And a license tax of $63.50 for permission to give theatrical exhibitions for six months, and a fee of $1 for the officer issuing the license, is not an illegal exaction under power to license and regulate, as such exhibitions require inquiry as to their character, and may require additional attention to prevent disorder and disturbances. Baker v. Cincinnati, 11 Ohio St. 534 (1860).

In Baker v. Cincinnati, supra, Mays v. Cincinnati, 1 Ohio St. 268 (1853), was distinguished upon the ground that the extent of the power of taxation vested in the general assembly was not drawn in question in that case.

So, a license fee of $200 imposed upon pawnbrokers, will not be deemed unreasonable because of

by which that commerce is to be governed; that it is coextensive with the subject on which it acts, and cannot be stopped at the external boundary of a state, but enters it, and is capable of authorizing a disposition of articles of commerce so that they become a part of the common mass of the property within the state. Leisy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 100, 84 L. ed. 128, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 86. But it has been held that state laws which do not discriminate between residents and products of a state and those of another state; which are not designed to interfere in any manner with interstate commerce, as those which are in the nature of a simple tax upon sales of merchandise, imposed alike upon all persons, whether residents or nonresidents of the state,—are not repugnant to the constitutional provision in question. Thus, in Hinson v. Lott, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 148, 19 L. ed. 887, a statute which imposed a tax of 50 cents per gallon on each gallon of spirituous liquors offered for sale in the state, to be paid by the dealer introducing it, was sustained, it appearing that a like tax on such liquors produced in the state was exacted. In Woodruff v. Parham, Id. 128, 19 L. ed. 883, a tax imposed by the city of Mobile on auction sales and sales of merchandise was sustained as to sales of property brought from other states, and sold at wholesale in unbroken packages. In Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754, a statute of the state of Missouri requiring all peddlers of sewing machines, without regard to the place of growth or produce of its magnitude, as the question of amount does not admit of nice calculations, and the business of pawnbroking gives rise to heavy city expense. Van Baalen v. People, 40 Mich. 258 (1879).

And in Grand Rapids v. Brandy (Mich.), 64 N. W. Rep. 29 (1895), it was held that a license fee of $50 upon pawnbrokers, and of $25 upon junk dealers, under a power to license and regulate pawnbrokers, junk dealers, and dealers in second-hand goods, is not unreasonable.

And in Moore v. St. Paul, 48 Minn. 381 (1892), it was said that a uniform license fee of $150 per year for carrying on the business of an intelligence office for males would not be so excessive or unreasonable as to justify holding it void, but the ordinance in question was held invalid because it required that amount until the first of January next following the day of the application.

And in Ex parte Burnett, 80 Ala. 461 (1887), it was said that a municipal corporation may, in the exercise of its incidental powers, transcend the limit fixed by the general law upon the price of a license to retail liquors, provided its ordinances are not in their nature prohibitory.

The business of a railroad ticket broker or scalper, however, is not per se injurious to the public, and a license tax of $500 imposed upon it, which would have the effect to prohibit the business, is excessive and illegal. Hirshfield v. Dallas, 29 Tex. App. 242 (1890).

It is thought that a growing tendency on the part of the courts may be discovered from the cases, particularly the later ones, throughout this whole subject of limitations under a power to regulate, to break away from the strict rule that the fee must not exceed what is necessary for regulation. And to adopt the more liberal one that it must be reasonable in view of all the circumstances including the character of the business and the value of the privilege.

d. Under a power to restrain or prohibit.

The number of cases in which the question of the existence or extent of a limit upon the amount of license fees fixed under a power to restrain or prohibit is so small as to render it impossible to locate any general rules comprising the subject. It would seem, however, that it must necessarily be considerably wider than the limit under a mere power to regulate.

Thus, a municipal ordinance imposing a penalty for selling intoxicating drinks without a license, which exceeds that fixed by the general law, is not unreasonable or invalid under a charter provision empowering the municipality to suppress and prohibit the sale thereof as well as to license. Deits v. Central, 1 Colo. 323 (1871).

And an ordinance requiring hawkers and peddlers of meat to pay a license fee of $30, enacted under a power to restrain, regulate, or license hawking and peddling, is not an invalid exercise of the power, though the fee exacted is also a tax. Ballston Spa v. Markham, 58 Hun. 238 (1890).

And a license tax of $30 per annum, imposed upon bowling saloons under a power to regulate and restrain, is authorized. Smith v. Madison, 7 Ind. 86 (1855).

So, a considerable license fee imposed upon saloons is not an unreasonable restraint of trade although the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited by law, where it is required under a charter contemplating that public policy requires the business of keeping places of resort for eating and drinking to be restrained. Kitson v. Ann Arbor, 26 Mich. 325 (1873).

And a license fee may be required for keeping a saloon, of such an amount as will produce a considerable revenue in excess of the amount required for regulation, where the object is to restrain the number of places and keep the business within control. Ibid.

And an ordinance requiring a license fee of $800 per year for the sale of intoxicating liquor by the measure will not be declared invalid as unreasonable and amounting to a prohibition under a power to suppress and levy a license tax on liquor sellers, when there are no statutory restrictions as to the amount. Elk Point v. Vaughn, 1 Dak. 113 (1875).

So, the amount charged for a license to wholesale liquor dealers under a power to license, regulate, and prohibit the selling or giving away of any intoxicating or spirituous liquors is not a tax but a burden imposed as the price of a privilege which a municipality has power to restrict or deny altogether. Dennehy v. Chicago, 120 Ill. 627 (1887).

But authority under a municipal charter to license, control, regulate, or prohibit a business or traffic gives no power to impose a tax for revenue purposes,—especially where such tax discriminates against nonresidents. State v. Long Branch Comrs., 42 N. J. L. 364, 36 Am. Rep. 518 (1880).

And a license fee of $100 per quarter, exacted by a municipality for the privilege of selling spirituous and fermented liquor within a city but 3 or 3 miles away from the settled portion, where there are no streets, lots, or blocks, and where no police or other supervision is exercised, is not valid under a power to license, regulate, or restrain. Salt Lake City v. Wagner, 2 Utah, 400 (1879).

e. Under a power to tax and license.

The general assembly may constitutionally impose, or authorize the county courts to impose, a tax by conferring on them the power to grant licenses as a means of raising revenue for county purposes. Washington v. State, 18 Ark. 752 (1858).

And the state may confer power upon cities to require a license fee for carrying on a particular branch of business for revenue purposes, and such a license required by the city for such purpose is valid material of manufacture, to pay a tax, was sustained as against a peddler who sold machines made in Connecticut. In Webber v. Virginia, 103 U. S. 844, 26 L. ed. 565, it was said that there is no objection to state legislation requiring a license for the sale of sewing machines, by reason of the grant of letters patent for the invention, when there is no discrimination against nonresidents or their agents. In Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257, the power of a state to levy a tax on coal mined outside the state and brought within it to be there sold, was affirmed. In Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461, 39 L. ed. 223, a statute of the state of Massachusetts which prohibited the manufacture and sale of imitation butter, in imitation of yellow butter, produced from pure, unadulterated milk, or cream of such milk, was sustained, and held to apply to the prohibited article when brought for sale from another state, where it was manufactured. Some of these cases arose under the provision of the Federal Constitution which forbids states, without the consent of Congress, to lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, but all are applicable to the facts in this case. Some of the cited cases recognize the rule that state laws of the general nature of those approved are invalid so far as they discriminate in favor of the residents and products of the state, and against the residents and products of other states. There is no discrimination in the statutes of this state under consideration. They apply alike to itinerant though it operates incidentally as a tax upon the dealer or consumer. Wiley v. Owens, 39 Ind. 429 (1872).

So in United States Distilling Co. v. Chicago, 112 Ill. 19 (1884), citing Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 102 Ill. 560 (1882), it was said that license fees may be imposed for substantial municipal revenue.

And municipalities have power to impose licenses for the purpose of regulation or revenue or both, under Cal. Const. art. 11, § 11, 12, providing that they may make and enforce within their limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, and that the legislature may by general laws vest in the corporate authority thereof power to assess and collect taxes for municipal purposes. Re Guerrero, 69 Cal. 88 (1896).

And a statute authorizing municipal authorities to license and regulate empowers the municipality to exact licenses for the purpose of revenue as well as for the purpose of regulation, when the whole charter and the general legislation of the state warrant such construction. Ex parte Frank, 53 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642 (1878); San José v. San José & S. C. R. Co., 53 Cal. 481 (1879).

So, a charter provision empowering a municipal body to regulate and prohibit the sale of spirituous liquors and fix the amount of the assessment to be paid for a license, but directing that it be paid into the city treasury for the use of the city, confers power to tax and fix the fee with a view to revenue as well as regulation. State v. Plainfield, 44 N. J. L. 118 (1882).

And a charter provision empowering a municipal body to regulate and prohibit the sale of spirituous liquors and fix the amount to be paid for a license, directing payment into the city treasury for the use of the city, confers power to tax for revenue purpose. Ibid.

And a city may lawfully charge a license fee fixed with the view to raise revenue for the franchise or privilege of keeping a ferry for transporting persons across a river upon which it is situated, under a power to license, continue, and regulate ferries, and to prescribe a sum of money to be paid for licenses. Chilvers v. People, 11 Mich. 43 (1862).

If a power be granted with a view to revenue, the amount of the tax if not limited by charter is left to the discretion and judgment of the municipal authorities. State v. Hoboken, 41 N. J. L. 71 (1879) (dictum).

The taxing power knows no limit except the necessities of the public treasury and the discretion of the taxing power, and the amount of a license tax imposed for the purpose of revenue does not prove its invalidity. Fretwell v. Troy, 18 Kan. 271 (1877).

Before an authorized ordinance for the raising of revenue by license will be declared void on account of the amount thereof, it must appear that the necessities of the city do not require so large a revenue, or that there has been an unjustifiable attempt to discriminate against certain kinds of business by casting the whole burden of taxation upon them. Fretwell v. Troy, supra (dictum).

Thus, an ordinance imposing a license tax, the amount of which is graduated, being greater upon some employments than upon others, enacted under a power to tax as well as to regulate, cannot be judicially declared invalid because it is impracticable, unjust, or unequal. Hadtner v. Williamsport, 15 W. N. C. 138 (1883).

So, a power to license, tax, regulate, and restrain bar rooms and drinking shops authorizes municipal authorities to fix the terms and conditions upon which licenses shall issue, and fix the amount of the tax to be imposed. Portland v. Schmidt, 18 Or. 17 (1885).

And a city ordinance requiring the payment of a license fee of $30 per month for carrying on the business of selling intoxicating liquor, enacted under a power to license either for revenue or regulation, cannot be determined as a matter of law, from the amount thereof, to be oppressive, unreasonable, or prohibitory of trade. Re Guerrero, 69 Cal. 88 (1896).

Nor is a license fee of $300 for a saloon and $200 for a hotel invalid when required under such a power. State v. Plainfield, 44 N. J. L. 118 (1882).

And in Portland v. Schmidt, 18 Or. 17 (1885), it was held that the amount required to be paid for a liquor license under a power to regulate and tax is left to the determination of city authorities and cannot be controlled by courts unless it be of so large a sum as to make it evident that it was intended as a prohibition; and an exaction of $500 per year for a license to sell liquor was upheld.

And a license fee of $500 per annum imposed by ordinance upon each brewery and distillery, is valid under a statute authorizing cities and villages to tax, license, and regulate brewers, distillers, etc., and not subject to the objection that it is unreasonable, as under such a grant of power payment may be required for the privilege, and the amount would seem to be within the discretion of the body imposing it. United States Distilling Co. v. Chicago, 112 Ill. 19 (1884).

So, a license fee of $50 per year, required by a city of any person or corporation carrying on insurance business therein, is valid though charged for revenue purposes, where the power to tax as well as to license is given in express terms. St. Joseph v. Ernst, 95 Mo. 380 (1888).

And a municipal ordinance requiring every life and fire insurance company intending to do business in the city to first obtain a license to be paid for at the rate of $50 for fire insurance companies and $100 for life insurance companies is authorized and valid under the Kansas act of 1870 giving cities of the first class power to levy and collect a license tax vendors of drugs and nostrums produced in this state, and to those which come from without it; to residents and nonresidents of the state; to those who sell their own wares; and to those who act for others. The primary object of the acts is not to derive a revenue for the use of the state, but in large part, at least, to protect its citizens against solicitations and harmful practices of irresponsible and unknown traveling vendors of drugs and other articles intended for the treatment of diseases or injury, who, in carrying on their business, publicly profess to cure or treat diseases, injuries, or deformities, and thus promote the sale of their wares to the credulous. The prohibited act may be committed without any actual sale. State v. Blair (Iowa) 60 N. W. Rep. 486.

on fire or life insurance companies or agencies. Leavenworth v. Booth, 15 Kan. 637 (1875).

So, a license fee required of a ferry, of $50 for each boat for one year, is a charge for the privilege of carrying on a ferry business in the jurisdiction, and not a tax within constitutional restrictions upon the power to tax, and is justified under a charter provision giving the city power to license, tax, and regulate ferries. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 102 Ill. 500 (1882). Dickey, J., dissented on the ground that the city had no power to exact such a license fee for the mere purpose of revenue, for a privilege already held by irrevocable grant from the state.

And an ordinance requiring a license fee of $200 per annum of auctioneers, and requiring a bond with two sureties in the penal sum of $1,000 for the due observance of the conditions of the ordinance, and providing for forfeiture for violation thereof, is reasonable and valid under a charter provision giving power to tax, license, and regulate. Wiggins v. Chicago, 68 Ill. 372 (1873).

And N. J. act May 2, 1885, providing that the fees for certain licenses may be imposed for revenue, includes hawkers and peddlers, and authorizes the passage of ordinances imposing such fees for revenue. State v. Orange, 50 N. J. L. 369 (1888).

So, in Ex parte Miranda, 73 Cal. 365 (1897), it was held that a county ordinance of Mono county requiring all persons engaged in raising, grazing, herding, or pasturing sheep therein to annually procure a license and pay therefor at the proportionate rate of $50 for every 1,000 sheep in their possession or under their control, and providing that a violation thereof shall constitute a misdemeanor punishable by fine not exceeding $200, is not unjust, excessive, oppressive, discriminating, special, unequal, or partial, and is valid whether imposed for the purpose of revenue or regulation, or both.

And in Ex parte Gregory, 20 Tex. App. 210, 54 Am. Rep. 516 (1886), it was said that a license fee of $8 annually for each hack, imposed upon owners of hacks under a power both to license and tax, cannot be held to be excessive or unreasonable where it provides numerous regulations the enforcement of which must necessarily demand the constant services of the police and the careful attention and supervision of the municipal government.

But even under such a power it would seem that, at least so far as callings which are not obnoxious are concerned, the municipality must stop short of prohibition.

Thus, a county cannot impose a prohibitive license tax under a power to impose license taxes upon a business for the purposes of revenue and regulation. Merced County v. Helm, 102 Cal. 159 (1894).

And prohibitive ordinances are not authorized 30 L. R. A.

That the enactment of the laws in question was within the police power of the state is affirmed in principle by numerous authorities, some of which are of long standing, and cannot now be successfully questioned. In Re Bahrer, 140 U. S. 545, 35 L. ed. 572, it was said that "the power of the state to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in conservation and promotion of the public health, good order, and prosperity, is a power originally and always belonging to the states, not surrendered by them to the general government nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive. And this court has uniformly recognized state legislation legitimately for police purposes, as not, in the sense of the Constitution necessarily interfering upon any right under a power to tax, license, and regulate, nor are such as would be oppressive or highly injurious. Wiggins v. Chicago, 68 Ill. 372 (1873).

And a license tax of $500 per year, levied by ordinance upon druggists having a permit from the probate judge to sell intoxicating liquors, enacted under authority to levy and collect a license tax upon druggists which shall be just and reasonable, is not for revenue but for destruction, and is unreasonable and void when imposed in a city containing only 1,600 inhabitants, and in which the gross receipts of such a druggist are only about $1,000 per year. Lyons v. Cooper, 36 Kan. 324 (1888).

A charter provision authorizing a municipality to provide for licensing, taxing, and regulating vendors of lottery tickets, however, justifies the imposing of a license tax, although it may be so high as to amount in effect to a prohibition. Franco v. Washington, 5 Cranch, C. C. 607 (1840).

So, in Hirshfield v. Dallas, 29 Tex. App. 242 (1890), it was said that power to tax occupations for revenue seems to be limited in amount only by the nature and character of the occupation sought to be taxed and the extent to which the occupation may be injurious to the public.

1. When discretion is expressly conferred.

It is competent for the legislature within proper limits to leave the sum which should be required for licenses to the discretion of the municipal authorities. St. Paul v. Colter, 12 Minn. 41, 90 Am. Dec. 278 (1866) (dictum).

And a license tax imposed by a municipality endowed with discretion on the subject will not be declared unreasonable by the courts merely because they deem it unwisely large. Cooper v. District of Columbia, 4 MacArth. 250 (1880).

And evidence that the amount fixed by them is not reasonably necessary to regulate the business is not admissible, and it cannot be shown that it was imposed solely for the purpose of revenue. St. Paul v. Colter, supra.

So, a municipal requirement of a license fee is not invalid because excessive, or oppressive, or in restraint of trade, where it is authorized by the legislature and not forbidden by the Constitution. Ibid.

And it is not subject to the objection that it is so large as to be in restraint of trade where full power to impose it is granted. Cooper v. District of Columbia, supra.

And when the legislature confers upon a municipal corporation the power to pass ordinances of a special and defined character, if the power thus delegated be not in conflict with the Constitution, an ordinance passed in pursuance thereof cannot be impeached as invalid because it would have been regarded as unreasonable if it had been passed under the incidental powers of the corporation or un-which has been confided expressly or by implication to the national government." The cases of Bourman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 125 U. S. 465, 81 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823, and Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 86, upon which the defendant relies in this case, were considered, and the fact noted that the laws on which they were based "inhibited the receipt of an imported commodity or its disposition before it had ceased to be an article of trade between one state and another, or another country and this." In Plumley v. Massachusetts, supra, the case of Leisy v. Hardin, was again considered, and held not to be an authority for the claim that oleomargarine—a recognized article of commerce—may be introduced into a state, and there sold in original packages, without any restriction being imposed by the state upon such sale. The recent case of Emert v. Missouri, 156 U. S. 206, 39 L. ed. 430, fully sustains the conclusion we now reach. That case involved the validity of a statute of the state of Missouri which provided that no person should deal as a peddler without a license, as applied to a peddler of sewing machines manufactured in another state; and the review of the authorities, and the interpretation placed upon the constitutional provision involved, are in point.

The amount of the license fee required by the statutes under consideration is not excessive, and the regulations adopted by them are reasonable. The sale of drugs, nostrums, and other articles manufactured in another state, and brought into this state, whether brought der a grant of power general in its nature. Ex parte Chin Yan, 60 Cal. 78 (1882).

A municipal charter granting power to license certain callings and authorizing the municipal council to charge such sums therefor as they shall deem fit and reasonable, authorizes the use of the power for the purpose of taxation, and justifies an ordinance requiring a license fee larger than is necessary for the purpose of regulation, though it enumerates useful occupations which cannot usually be taxed under a power to license, and those of amusement without distinction. Adams Exp. Co. v. Owensboro, 85 Ky. 265 (1887).

Thus, a municipal ordinance fixing $500 as the fee for a retail liquor license is authorized and valid under a charter provision authorizing the passage of any by-law, regulation, or ordinance that shall appear necessary and proper for the welfare and interest of the city and for preserving peace, health, and good order, and the licensing of the sale at retail of intoxicating liquors and prohibiting such sale without a license, it being manifest that the intent was to entrust the whole matter to the city authorities. Perdue v. Ellis, 18 Ga. 586 (1856).

So, an ordinance prohibiting the sale of spirituous or intoxicating liquors within the city without having first obtained a license, enacted under a charter provision that licenses for vending spirituous liquors shall not be less than $75 nor more than $200 per year, is not invalid as in restraint of trade. Rochester v. Upman, 19 Minn. 108 (1872).

And in Goldsmith v. New Orleans, 31 La. Ann. 646 (1879), it was held that as the law lays down no rule by which the amount of a license tax upon bar rooms or coffee houses in which concert saloons are conducted shall be fixed, it is a question of expediency and of police regulation of which the city authorities are the sole judges, and the judicial tribunals have no power to control them in the exercise of this discretion.

So, a license fee of $200, imposed upon the business of vending butcher's meats, is not unauthorized, oppressive, or in restraint of trade, when required under a statute empowering municipalities to fix the fee for licenses at from $5 to $500. St. Paul v. Colter, 12 Minn. 41, 90 Am. Dec. 278 (1868).

And a fee of that amount for selling meat in a private stall, in addition to the 7½ per cent business tax levied upon all traders under another by-law, is not objectionable as being excessive in amount where the legislature authorized the city council to impose such charges as it should think reasonable without any reference to the payment being by way of indemnity for the trouble and expense of issuing the license. Pigeon v. Montreal Recorder's Ct. 17 Can. S. C. 496 (1890).

So, a municipal requirement of a license fee of $1,000, for theatrical exhibitions is authorized by a power to license such exhibitions on such terms 80 L. R. A.

and conditions as to the mayor and aldermen may seem just and reasonable. Boston v. Shaffer, 9 Pick. 415 (1830).

And there is no limit to the power of a city to impose fees for a license upon foreign insurance companies under a charter authorizing it to regulate agencies of all insurance companies and to license and regulate agents of insurance companies doing business in it, unless it might be that the ordinance imposing them should be reasonable. Walker v. Springfield, 94 Ill. 364 (1880) (dictum).

So, in Wiley v. Owens, 39 Ind. 429 (1872), it was held that when the statute conferring the authority does not limit the amount to be charged for a license, it may charge any amount deemed proper by the council, unless controlled by other considerations.

And in Wolf v. Lansing, 58 Mich. 367 (1884), it was held that where the power to fix a license fee is given by law to a municipal council, its discretion in fixing the amount is not reviewable by the courts.

And in Van Baalen v. People, 40 Mich. 268 (1879), it was held that municipal discretion in fixing the amount of a license fee will not be reviewed by the court, unless made a pretext for a violation of constitutional rights.

Some of the cases, however, have stopped slightly short of the broad rules above announced, on the theory that such a power can be abused and does not authorize absolute prohibition.

Thus, in St. Paul v. Colter, 12 Minn. 41, 90 Am. Dec. 278 (1868), and Denver City R. Co. v. Denver, 3 Colo. App. 34 (1892), it was held that the courts will not interfere with the discretion of municipal bodies in fixing the amount of license fees, unless there is an evident abuse of power.

So, that the discretion of the city authorities in fixing the amount of the license fee required of insurance companies doing business in the city, conferred by a power to grant or refuse licenses and charge such sums as they may deem expedient and just, will not be interfered with unless an abuse thereof clearly appears, was held in Burlington v. Putnam Ins. Co. 31 Iowa, 102 (1870).

In Marlon v. Chandler, 6 Ala. 309 (1844), however, it was held that an ordinance of a town prohibiting the retailing of spirituous or fermented liquor without first paying $1,000 for a license for one year, and providing for a penalty of $10 per day for selling without a license, is prohibitory in nature, but is authorized under a charter provision authorizing the corporation to grant licenses to retailers of spirits and liquors and to regulate and restrain them when deemed a nuisance.

And in Perdue v. Ellis, 18 Ga. 586 (1856), an ordinance imposing a license fee was upheld upon the ground that it was authorized by charter, although it was in effect a prohibition. F. H. B.

into this state in original packages or otherwise, is not prohibited; but such medicines may be brought into the state and sold freely. Their importation and sale are not in any manner prohibited. But if its owner select as their agent an itinerant who, to promote sales, publicly professes to cure and treat diseases, injuries, and deformities, it is proper that some evidence and guaranty of his responsibility be required. It was said in Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 19 Wheat. 448, 6 L. ed. 687, that "The right of sale may very well be annexed to importation, without annexing to it also, the privilege of using the officers licensed by the state to make sales in a peculiar way." So it may be said in this case that the right to sell, in original packages, medicines brought into this state from another, does not include the right to have it sold by an unlicensed itinerant, who, to make sales, professes knowledge of the art of healing. The statutes which apply to such sales are not, in any sense, regulations of interstate commerce, but a reasonable exercise of the police power of the state, which may be applied as well to articles of interstate commerce in the hands of a vendor, and offered for sale in the original packages, as to articles produced within the state.

We conclude that the judgment of the District Court is right, and it is affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

Ellen BAUM, Exec., etc., of J. F. Baum, Deceased, App't.,

v.

Mary Grace Devine LYNN.

(73 Miss. 982.)

1. Oral evidence as to the consideration recited in a written agreement is inadmissible when the stipulation as to the consideration is contractual, as in a case where a conveyance expressly recites that it is made for the settlement and release of specified claims.
2. Oral proof of a separate agreement, to show that the consideration of a conveyance which recited that it was in settlement and release of the claims of a guardian and ward against the grantor included also a release of the ward's claim against the guardian, is inadmissible.
3. An appellant cannot assign for error matters which affect other defendants who refused to join in the appeal.

(April 8, 1895.)

APPPEAL by defendant, administratrix of one of the sureties on plaintiff's guardian's bond, from a decree of the Chancery Court for Warren County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce the sureties' liability on the bond. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. Marshall for appellant.

Mr. L. W. Magruder for appellee.

Cooper, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In May, 1873, John A. Klein was appointed guardian to the appellee by the chancery court of Warren county, and gave bond as guardian in the penalty of $2,000, with George M. Klein and J. F. Baum, appellant's testator, as sureties. In May, 1874, the appellee became entitled to receive in distribution from the estate of a relative another considerable sum of money, and the chancellor required the guardian to execute an additional bond in the penalty of $6,100, which he did with the said George M. Klein and one D. W. Flowerree, now deceased, as sureties. The guardian, John A. Klein, died without having made a final account as guardian, and the appellee exhibited her bill in the chancery court of Warren county against the executrix of the guardian, and against George M. Klein, the surviving surety, and the personal representatives of the deceased sureties. The prayer is that the executrix of the guardian be required to render his final account as guardian, and that a decree be rendered against her therefor, and that decrees be made against George M. Klein, the surviving surety, and against the representatives of the deceased sureties, according to their liability. Upon final hearing the court found the guardian to be indebted to his ward in the sum of $6,247.80, for which a decree was entered against his representatives; and decrees were made against George M. Klein and Ellen Baum, executrix of J. F. Baum, for $2,000, the penalty of the bond on which they were sureties, and against George M. Klein and L. M. Lowenburg, administrator of the estate of D. W. Flowerree, for $6,100, the penalty of the bond on which they were sureties. From this decree Mrs. Baum alone appeals, and assigns error.

The objection most strenuously urged to the decree rests upon the following facts, proved or offered to be proved by appellant: The guardian had loaned a part of his ward's money to Mrs. Mary Irving. In June, 1884, the guardian being then dead and his estate hopelessly insolvent, the appellee, who then resided in the state of Texas, came to this state to look after the estate. On the 16th of June, Mrs. Irving made to her a conveyance in the following language: "This indenture made and entered into this day, the 16th of June, 1884, by and between Mary Irving, of the city of Vicksburg, county of Warren, and state of NOTE.—As to the admissibility of oral evidence respecting the consideration of a written contract, see note to Durkin v. Cobleigh (Mass.) 17 L. R. A. 270, presenting a large number of the authorities on the question.

As to such evidence of the consideration of a deed, see note to Velten v. Carmack (Or.) 30 L. R. A. 101.

Mississippi, party of the first part, and Mary Grace Lynn, of the state of Texas, party of the second part, witnesseth: That whereas, John A. Klein, late of the city of Vicksburg, did, on or about the 14th day of February, 1874, loan the said Mary Irving certain moneys then in his hands as guardian of the said Mary Grace Lynn, then Mary Grace Devine; and whereas, the said Mary Irving now desires to settle in full any balance that may be due her; Now, therefore, for and in consideration of the premises, and the consideration of the full acquittal, discharge, and release of the said Mary Irving from any and all liability to the said John A. Klein as guardian, or the said Mary Grace Lynn for and on account of said loans, and the further consideration of $10 in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the said party of the first part does hereby convey and warrant to the party of the second part, her heirs and assigns, in fee simple, the following-described real estate in the said city of Vicksburg,—describing the property, and concluding with the usual habendum. The appellant took the deposition of Mr. Irving, who was the husband of the grantor, she being now dead, and that of George M. Klein, and of Mr. Smith, the attorney who prepared the conveyance, all of whom testified that the conveyance was made by Mrs. Irving, and accepted by Mrs. Lynn, in full satisfaction and settlement, not only of the debt due by Mrs. Irving to Klein as guardian, but also in discharge and settlement of liability on the part of the guardian to his ward, which liability Mrs. Lynn agreed to discharge and release as a part of the consideration for the conveyance. The complainant moved to suppress these depositions, and objected to them when offered in evidence, upon the ground that it was incompetent to vary by parol proof the written contract of the parties as shown by the deed. It does not appear that the chancellor made any order on the motion to suppress, or ruled upon the objection interposed to the evidence when offered. As the note of evidence, however, shows that these depositions were read on the hearing, we assume that the chancellor held them to be competent. In opposition to this evidence the complainant introduced her own testimony and that of her husband, by which it is denied that the conveyance was accepted in discharge of any other obligation than that of Mrs. Irving and that of the guardian for the amount loaned to her. The defendant in turn objected to the testimony of the complainant on the ground that she was not a competent witness in a suit against the estate of a deceased person to establish her claim resting upon a transaction occurring in his lifetime. As the court below did not rule upon these objections, we cannot know whether it disregarded all the testimony, or, considering it, thought the fact not proved that Mrs. Lynn agreed to accept the conveyance in discharge and satisfaction of her entire demand against her guardian. The complainant is, however, entitled to the decree if, upon either of these reasons, it is correct. The textbooks and decisions abound in confused and confusing writing upon the subject of the admissibility of parol evidence introduced for the purpose of showing the consideration of written contracts, or of proving what are called "collateral contracts," i. e., contracts not evidenced by the written one, but which constitute the consideration upon which the written one in turn rests, or which are separate and disconnected from the written one, not covered by nor inconsistent with its terms. Mr. Stephen, in his admirable Digest of the Law of Evidence, p. 104, thus formulates the rule and its limitations: "When any judgment of any court or any other judicial or official proceeding, or any contract or grant, or any other disposition of property, has been reduced to the form of a document or series of documents, no evidence may be given of such judgment or proceeding, or of the terms of such contract, grant, or other disposition of property, except the document itself, or secondary evidence of its contents in cases in which secondary evidence is admissible. . . . Nor may the contents of any such document be contradicted, altered, added to, or varied by oral evidence. Provided that any of the following matters may be proved: (1) Fraud, intimidation, illegality, want of due execution, want of capacity in any contracting party, the fact that it is wrongly dated, want or failure of consideration, or mistake in fact or law, or any other matter which, if proved, would produce any effect upon the validity of any document, or any part of it, or which would entitle any person to any judgment, decree, or order relating thereto; (2) the existence of any separate oral agreement, as to any matter on which a document is silent, and which is not inconsistent with its terms, if from the circumstances of the case the court infers that the parties did not intend the document to be a complete and final statement of the whole of the transaction between them," etc. It is evident that the proffered testimony for the defendant is competent, if at all, either, (1) because it goes only to prove what was the real consideration of the conveyance, and therefore contradicts, not the contract, but a mere fact recited or admitted in the writing; or (2) because it tended to prove a separate oral agreement within the limitation expressed in clause 2 of the proviso as quoted from Mr. Stephen.

In Gully v. Grubbs, 1 J. J. Marsh. 387, Judge Robertson in an admirable and concise manner states the true principle upon which is based the rule of permitting oral evidence to be introduced to show the true consideration of a deed in opposition to that recited, as well as the limitation of the rule. In 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 880, this opinion is given at length as containing an accurate statement of the law. The writers upon evidence have strangely omitted any reference to it. Somewhat compressed, Judge Marshall's opinion may be thus stated: Wherever, in a deed, the consideration, or an admission of its receipt, is stated merely as a fact, that part of the deed is viewed as a receipt would be, and the statement is subject to be varied, modified, and explained; but, if the stated consideration is in the nature of a contract,—that is, if by it a right is vested, created, or extinguished,—the terms of the contract thereby evidenced may not be varied by parol proof, but the writing is its own sole exponent. Judge Robertson illustrates his own views by noting the difference between the mere statement of a fact (e. g. the admission of the receipt of the purchase price) and the vesting, creating, or extinguishing a right (e. g. by the execution of a release), in the following language: "A party is estopped by his deed. He is not to be permitted to contradict it. So far as the deed is intended to pass a right, or to be the exclusive evidence of a contract, it concludes the parties to it. But the principle goes no further. A deed is not conclusive evidence of everything it may contain. For instance, it is not the only evidence of the date of its execution, nor is its omission of a consideration conclusive evidence that none passed, nor is its acknowledgment of a particular consideration an objection to other proof of other and consistent considerations; and, by analogy, the acknowledgment in a deed is not conclusive of the fact. This is but a fact, and testing it by the rationality of the rule we have laid down, it may be explained or contradicted. It does not necessarily and undeniably prove the fact. It creates no right; it extinguishes none. A release cannot be contradicted or explained by proof, because it extinguishes a pre-existing right. But no receipt can have the effect of destroying per se any subsisting right. It is only evidence of a fact. The payment of the money discharges or extinguishes the debt. A receipt for the payment does not pay the debt. It is only evidence that it has been paid. Not so of a written release. It is not only evidence of the extinguishment, but is the extinguishment itself." The deed now under examination contains, as is clearly to be seen, no mere recital of a consideration paid or to be paid. Its recital is only of the facts necessary to be stated to intelligently apply the contract of the parties to the subject-matter. Having set out the relationship of debtor and creditor, and the history of the transaction from which it arose, the deed then proceeds to state what the parties agreed, contracted, and did in reference to the dissolution of the relationship. Mrs. Irving did something. She conveyed the land to Mrs. Lynn. Mrs. Lynn did something. She released the debt to Mrs. Irving. One transferred a right; the other released a right. If it be said that the release was a mere recited consideration for the conveyance, it may with equal accuracy be replied that the conveyance was a mere recited consideration for the release; and therefore, if one of the terms of the contract may be varied by parol, because it is a consideration, so also may the other for the same reason, and by this process a solemn and executed written contract would be totally eaten away. The true rule is that a consideration recited to have been paid or contracted for may be varied by parol, while the terms of a contract may not be, though the contract they disclose may be the consideration on which the act or obligation of the other party rests. When the stipulation as to consideration becomes contractual, it, like any other written contract, is the exclusive evidence, and cannot be varied by parol. Hubbard v. Marshall, 50 Wis. 322; Van Wy v. Clarke, 50 Ind. 259.

The testimony was not admissible for the purpose of proving a separate oral agreement as to which the writing was silent. In the 30 L. R. A. multitude of cases in which the question of the admissibility of extrinsic evidence to prove a separate oral agreement, made before or contemporaneously with a written contract is determined, decisions may be found which would warrant the introduction of the evidence offered by the defendant; but such decisions, we think, rest upon a misapplication of legal principles to the facts of the particular transaction. A very full collection of the authorities, accurately grouped, may be found in the note to Ferguson v. Rafferty (Pa.) 6 L. R. A. 88. We refer to only a few, which will illustrate the principle we are considering. Before referring to these cases, it is well to note that the rule excluding extrinsic evidence is "directed only against the admission of any other evidence of the language employed by the parties in making the contract, than that which is furnished by the writing itself." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 277. In Lindley v. Lacey, 17 C. B. N. S. 578, there was a written sale of the fixtures, furniture, and goodwill of a business. The seller was indebted to one Chase, who had entered an action against him. The written contract contained a clause authorizing Lacey, the buyer, "to settle the case of Chase v. Lindley." The plaintiff was permitted to prove that there was a distinct and separate promise by Lacey, in consideration of the plaintiff's signing the agreement, that he, the defendant, would pay the debt to Chase; the court saying that this was a distinct collateral agreement, not inconsistent with the written contract, and in fact constituting the consideration or condition on which Lindley executed the written agreement. In Ayer v. Ball Mfg. Co. 147 Mass. 46, a written order for goods, signed by the lawyer only, set forth the kind of goods, and the price, and contained stipulations for rebates. It was held that the writing was not intended to set forth the whole contract of the parties, and that evidence might be given of a parol contemporaneous contract by the seller to advertise the goods as inducing cause of the purchase. To the same effect are Honney v. Morrill, 57 Me. 868; Morgan v. Griffith, L. R. 6 Exch. 70; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Norwath, 108 Ind. 834; Basshor v. Forbes, 86 Md. 154; Wels v. Rhodius, 87 Ind. 1, 44 Am. Rep. 747. In some cases evidence of a parol contemporaneous agreement has been permitted to be proved, even though its effect was to vary, change, or reform the written agreement. In Erskine v. Adeane, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 756, the landlord executed a written lease, in which he reserved the right to keep game on the leased land. The tenant was permitted to recover damages for breach of contemporaneous oral agreement on the part of the landlord to kill some of the game. But in such cases it is said the oral agreement must be clearly and indisputably and precisely established. Thomas v. Loose, 114 Pa. 35; Cullmans v. Lindsay, 114 Pa. 166. This seems to be upon the principle of reforming the written agreement, and it may be doubted whether the evidence would be competent at law, in those jurisdictions in which legal and equitable proceedings are yet distinct. But if the parties have reduced their contract to writing in all its parts, it is not competent to add to its terms by extrinsic evidence; and the presumption is that a formal written contract was intended by the parties, nothing to the contrary appearing on its face, to contain their whole agreement. In Langdon v. Langdon, 4 Gray, 186, one Goodenow received the note sued on from the payee thereof, and executed the following writing: "Received a note [describing it] for which I am to collect and account to the said payee the sum of $110 when the note is collected, or return said note back to said payee, if I choose." After notice that the note was held by Goodenow, the maker paid the same to the payee. Goodenow sued on the note in the name of the payee for his use, and on the trial offered parol evidence of conversations had between the payee and himself, tending to explain and qualify the writing, and to show what the parties intended thereby. The court held the evidence incompetent, saying: "This paper, though called a receipt, and beginning with the word 'received,' is not a receipt for money, within the rule allowing a receipt to be controlled or explained by parol evidence. It was a written instrument stating the terms on which the possession of the note was intrusted to Goodenow." Parker v. Morrill, 98 N. C. 382, presented circumstances much like those of the present case. In that case, on a settlement between a court ward and her guardian, a release was executed in consideration that the guardian should invest a certain sum—agreed to be the balance due by him—in lands in his own name as trustee for the separate use of the ward. This the guardian did. After his death the ward brought an action to recover a balance claimed to be due in addition to the sum named in the release. The plaintiff alleged that the guardian in truth had in lands at the time of the release $2,500 belonging to her, but represented that he only had $1,500; that upon the guardian's agreement to invest this sum for the plaintiff, as stated in the written agreement, and that he would by his last will settle other property upon her, the plaintiff agreed to release him; and that he had died, not having made the provision in his will as stipulated. Evidence of the agreement to make provision by will for the plaintiff was excluded, the court saying: "When the parties to a contract in writing thus refer in it to matters constituent of it, it must be taken that the whole of the material parts of such matters are mentioned, nothing to the contrary appearing; and parol evidence will not be received to contradict, add to, take from, or modify what the parties have thus put in writing." The subject is fully discussed with great clearness by Judge Finch, in Elghmie v. Taylor, 98 N. Y. 288. The recitals of the conveyance now under consideration show very clearly that the minds of the parties were directed to the precise matter to which their negotiations referred. It was a settlement of a sum due by Mrs. Irving that was in view, and the language of the writing, while consisting perfectly with their understanding, when applied to this matter, is incapable of being so enlarged as to include the release of the general liability of the guardian, without importing a new element into the contract. No more precise and accurate statement of the rule has been made than that contained in the opinion of Judge Campbell in Cooke v. Blackburn, 58 Miss. 587, that: "Where parties embody their mutual agreements in a formal written instrument, it must be taken as containing all they then desired to preserve the evidence of, and that it is not competent afterwards, in a trial at law, to add to or subtract anything from it, by parol evidence of something which it should have contained or omitted." While the present proceeding is in chancery, the pleadings do not seek a reformation of the instrument, nor suggest any circumstances that would entitle the defendant to that relief. The same rule is therefore applicable as would be in a legal action. The appellant's contention that the rule excluding oral evidence to vary the terms of the contract cannot be applied here because her testator was not a party to the contract, is answered by the fact that the claim she asserts is under the contract. If appellant is a stranger to the contract, while she is not bound, she can take nothing by it. If she claims under the contract, she must take under and according to its terms. The first guardian's bond was not discharged by the second one, directed to be given when the ward's estate was augmented by a new inheritance. McWilliams v. Norfleet, 60 Miss. 987. The appellant cannot assign for errors matters which affect other defendants who refuse to join in the appeal. Code, § 4373.

We find no error in the decree, and it is affirmed.

J. A. SHINGLEUR & COMPANY et al.,
Appts.,
v.
WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

(73 Miss. 1080.)

A mistake in a telegram directing an agent to sell property, in reliance on which he makes a contract for such sale in his own name and not binding on the principal, will not give the latter a right of action, where he voluntarily carries out the contract after notice of the mistake, in order to protect his agent, instead of leaving the latter to his remedy against the telegraph company.

(June 3, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hinds County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's negligence in changing a telegram which had been delivered to it for transmission. Affirmed.

Plaintiffs were cotton brokers and had 500 bales of cotton for sale; they delivered a cipher message to defendant directed to their agents in Boston authorizing a sale at 8½ cents per pound; the company altered the word which signified 8½ so that as delivered it meant 8¼; the agents entered into a contract at that price and plaintiffs considering themselves bound by the contract delivered the cotton under it, thereby losing $470.

NOTE.—The decision in the above case, while somewhat unusual, is clearly based on the theory that the sender of a telegram has a right of action against the company for damages sustained on account of errors in the transmission of the message. On this point, see Western U. Tele. Co. v. Adams (Tex.) 6 L. R. A. 844; Milliken v. Western U. Tele. Co. (N. Y.) 1 L. R. A. 281; International Ocean Tele. Co. v. Saunders (Fla.) 21 L. R. A. 810 and (limiting the right) Western U. Tele. Co. v. Wood (C. C. App. 5th C.) 21 L. R. A. 706.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Calhoun & Green, for appellants:

Prior to the Constitution of 1890 declaring telegraph companies common carriers and liable as such, it was held that the telegraph company was liable for an injury resulting from the delivery of an altered message.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Allen, 66 Miss. 555.

The declaration that a telegraph company owed and performed a duty to the public in the reception and transmission of messages brings it clearly within the principle applied to common carriers, that it is contrary to public policy to permit a stipulation limiting liability for negligence, or for a smaller amount than the real injury.

Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Moss, 60 Miss. 1011, 45 Am. Rep. 428; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Abels, 60 Miss. 1017; Southern Exp. Co. v. Seide, 67 Miss. 609.

Alexander v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 66 Miss. 161, 3 L. R. A. 71; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Allen, supra; and Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Clifton, 68 Miss. 307,—all arose prior to the Constitution of 1890, and under these the principle of defendant's liability is established.

See also Gray, Communication by Telegraph, §§ 104 et seq.

But the case at bar is governed by § 195, Const. 1890, whereby telegraph companies are declared to be common carriers and liable as such.

The settled construction of the law of common carriers in this state at the time of the promulgation of the Constitution was that they could not stipulate by special contract against damages caused by their own negligence.

That the telegraph company was a foreign corporation is immaterial.

Messrs. Mayes & Harris for appellee.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first contention of appellee is that the sender does not make the telegraph company his agent in such sense that it renders him liable to the sendee in case an altered message is delivered to the sendee. The negative of this proposition is maintained by the English courts, which hold that the liability of the telegraph company arises out of the contract, and hence that the sendee, not being in privity with the company, can never sue the company.

Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Teleg. Co. Allen, Teleg. Cas. 437; Henkel v. Pape, Id. 567. This view is also urged with great clearness and power in Gray, Communication by Telegraph, §§ 63, 104 et seq., and in Bigelow, Torts, pp. 621-626, but the strongest reasoning in support of this view which we have found in any case, English or American, is in Pepper v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 87 Tenn. 554, 4 L. R. A. 660, decided in 1889. This case contains an exhaustive review of the authorities, and holds that the minds of the parties in case of an altered message have never met, and that neither can be bound to the other unless the telegraph company is the agent of the sendee, and this is repudiated on principle and authority. The English view, in so far as it predicates the right of the sendee to sue on contract alone, leads to one very manifestly unjust result, to wit, that since the sendee cannot sue the company (as held in Playford's Case, supra), nor the sender (as held in Henkel's Case, supra), he is remediless. According to what is called the "American doctrine" (Gray, Communication by Telegraph, § 104, note 3; Thompson, Electricity, § 426), the affirmative of the proposition under discussion is maintained; representative among the cases so holding being Rose's Case, Allen, Teleg. Cas. p. 337, in which case the principal was disclosed, and the agent not bound. In De Rutte v. New York, A. & B. Electro-Magnetic Teleg. Co. 30 How. Pr. 408, it was held that the party interested in the despatch, whether sender or sendee, was the one who really contracted with the company, and that such person could sue in contract. In Dryburg's Case, 35 Pa. 298, 78 Am. Dec. 388, the supreme court held that the company was the agent of both sender and sendee (upon very unsatisfactory reasoning), and hence either could sue in contract.

Turning from this view of the right of the sendee to sue the company in contract, and putting the right to sue on the ground that, in case of delivery of an altered message, upon which the sendee has acted to his damage, the sendee's right to sue is in tort for the injury to him, the wrong and the consequent damages, we find this view clearly and universally upheld by the American authorities. Gray, Communication by Telegraph, § 78; Thompson, Electricity, §§ 437, 428, 430, 448; Dryburg's Case, supra; Shawwood's Opinion; Rose's Case, Allen, Teleg. Cas. p. 340; Bigelow, Torts, pp. 614 et seq.; Pepper v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 87 Tenn. 554, 4 L. R. A. 660. Rose's Case, in so far as it held that the sendee could not sue in that case because the principal was the injured party, and could himself alone sue, is said by Mr. Gray (sec. 78) to be open to criticism, and is held unsound on that ground by other authorities. Mr. Thompson suggests in section 424 an additional reason why the sendee should be allowed to sue, and in section 427 puts the matter on the true ground. He says: "The true view, which seems to sustain the right of action in the receiver of the message, or in the person addressed, where it is not delivered, is one which elevates the question above the plane of mere privity of contract, and places it where it belongs upon the public duty which the telegraph company owes to any person beneficially interested in the message, whether the sender, or his principal, where he is agent, or the receiver, or his principal, where he is agent." This is the doctrine of this court in Allen's Case, 66 Miss. 549. This review of the authorities will sufficiently indicate how the courts, in dealing with this purely modern agency, have been groping their way in their search for the true ground of liability, uselessly conjuring up analogies that do not exist, and misled by the apparent applicability of the doctrine of agency as existing between private individuals. This view last above given discards absolutely the doctrine of agency, as applicable between private individuals, as suiting the case of the liability of the telegraph company to sendee or to sender. It treats the telegraph company as an institution sui generis, a system unto itself, an independent transmitter of intelligence, an independent contractor, or (as Mr. Bigelow and Judge Sherwood most simply and best put it) as an independent principal. It is liable to the sendee in tort alone, as principal. It is liable to the sender in contract or in tort, as principal. It is not liable to either as agent in any proper sense. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Brown, 108 Ind. 538; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hope, 11 Ill. App., at page 289, and authorities cited. "Whether the agency is general or special, the authority delegated governs in all questions arising between the principal and his agent, out of the agency. Whether the agency is general or special, a principal is responsible to a third person dealing bona fide with his agent, either where the agent acts within the scope of the authority actually conferred upon him by the principal, or where the agent acts within the scope of the authority which he has been held out by the principal as possessing. But whether the agency is general or special, a principal is not responsible to a third person dealing with his agent, where that agent acts beyond the scope of both these authorities. . . . It is clear that a telegraph company is actually authorized by its employer to communicate a certain message (and a certain message) only. It is also clear it seems that it is not held out by him as possessing an authority to communicate any, as distinguished from a certain message." Gray, Communication by Telegraph, § 105. The delivery, therefore, of an altered message, is the delivery of a message which the company, neither as general nor special agent, had, or was held out as having, any authority to deliver; and the liability to the sender is that of an independent principal. It is perfectly obvious that the company is not the servant of the sender; the sender has no authority to control the company as to the manner in which it does the act. Gray, Communication by Telegraph, §§ 104 et 30 L. R. A.

seq. The steady growth of this view is shown by the statutes of all the states imposing upon the company the duty of receiving and sending messages for all persons, with the various regulating provisions embraced in these statutes; thus making what had been, prior to such statutes, merely the duty imposed by the law from the peculiar nature of the business of telegraphy, after such statutes, a statutable public duty. And now we have gone the further and completer step indicated in section 195 of the Constitution of 1890; all which enforces the justness of the declaration in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Allen, 66 Miss. 555: "The courts then [in the early history of the English law, dealing with the common carriers], as the courts now, conscious of the needs of the public, expanded the principles of the law, fitted them to the exigencies of the occasion, and imposed a degree of liability unknown to other contract relations, but required for the safety and protection of the public."

It is also true that the sender may sue the company in tort as well as in contract, in the case of an altered message. Mr. Cooley says: "In many cases an action as for a tort or an action as for a breach of contract may be brought by the same party, on the same state of facts." Cooley, Torts, pp. 103, 104. So Mr. Bigelow says: "The fact that a contract existed, and was broken at the same time and by the same act or omission by which the plaintiff's cause of action arose, is only one of the accidents of the situation. The defendant owed, in respect of the same thing, two distinct duties; one of a special character to the party with whom he contracted, and one of a general character to others. . . . The duty, therefore, does not grow out of the contract, but exists before and independently of it." Again: "What does it mean when it is said that even this contractee [appellant here answering to the contractee] may sue in tort or in contract for his damages? Certainly nothing, unless that the original duty which the defendant, before the contract, owed to all alike still survives, even towards his contractee." And without prolonging this opinion on this point, it is sufficient to refer to Bigelow, Torts, pp. 586, 587, 614, and to the elaborate discussion in Rich v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 382. But, whether looked at in the light of contract or of tort, plaintiff's case comes inevitably to this: That plaintiff, at a time when he knew fully of the mistake in the telegram, and when he could have delivered or refused to deliver the cotton, and when the minds of plaintiff and of Appleton, Dickson & Co. never having met, and there being, as to this sale, no contract made between them, plaintiff was, therefore, under no legal liability to deliver the cotton, nevertheless, acting on the "sentiment" that he would himself protect his agent (already fully protected by the liability in tort of the company to such agent), and maintain his business credit, did deliver the cotton, anyhow, and having done so, now seeks to hold the company,—can the action be maintained? The only case holding that the action can be maintained, so far as our research has gone, is Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Shottor, 71 Ga. 767, 768. The facts in this case are identical with those in Pepper v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra, where the court, after an elaborate review of the American authorities, says: "As already stated, Mr. Gray not only shows that upon principle the English holding is the correct one, but, while listing the cases above mentioned as indicating a contrary view, he states that most of them are dicta. There is but one case referred to by him, . . . which directly adjudges that the sender of a telegram is bound to the receiver by the terms of the message as negligently altered by the company. That is the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Shotton, 71 Ga. 760. With great respect for the high character of that learned tribunal, we cannot approve the line of reasoning pursued, nor the conclusion therein reached. . . . The learned judge delivering the opinion places his conclusion in part on the fact that in England the government has charge of the telegraph lines, and upon the idea that a merchant, or business man, would lose credit and commercial standing were he to refuse to make good to his correspondent the contract contained in his message as delivered. We cannot see how the fact of governmental charge of the telegraph system can make any difference, for in this country the sender is as impotent to control and direct the movements and conduct of the telegraph company as if it were under the government. . . . Nor can we see how the commercial standing of the sender who remits his correspondent to his recourse on the telegraph company for such injury as may result from the erroneous message can be affected." So the case of Harrison v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Tex.) 10 Am. & Eng. Corp. (as, 600, is a case directly in point, and stronger in its facts for plaintiff than this case. There plaintiffs, in Texas, wired Latham, Alexander & Co., in New York, to purchase 100 bales of cotton. As delivered, the telegram directed them to sell 100 bales. Latham, Alexander & Co. sold without plaintiff's knowing anything of the error, and a loss resulted of $129.50, which later, on settlement with Latham, Alexander & Co., plaintiffs paid, claiming they were compelled to pay. The court says: "The mistake which occasioned the loss . . . was a mistake of the telegraph company, and not of plaintiffs, and plaintiffs were not bound to pay or make good said loss to Latham, Alexander & Co.

and if they made such payment, were not responsible or liable therefor: they could not hold the company liable over to them for repayment." This, too, in a case where the loss had been sustained without knowledge on plaintiff's part of the error. To the same effect are Henkle v. Pape, Allen, Teleg. Cas. p. 567, and Verdin v. Robertson, Id. 697. It is not necessary to go so far, and we express no opinion as to what would be the law had plaintiff here not known, before he acted, all about the mistake. In Pepper's Case and Shotton's Case the goods had been shipped to the place of residence of the sendee, and loss to some extent was inevitable to the sendee. As held in Pepper's Case, it was the plaintiff's duty, in view of all the circumstances, to make the loss as small as possible, and that he could then recover for such loss, as being himself to that extent—a loss thus legally sustained—the injured party. Mr. Gray correctly remarks (Communication by Telegraph, p 185, note) that Shotton's Case put the liability upon a "moral and not a legal, ground." Here appellant had shipped no goods, had incurred no legal liability, had merely to refuse to comply with the terms of a contract he had never made, and remit Appleton, Dickson & Co. to their adequate remedy against the company. His payment was voluntary and gratuitous, and cannot, on any sound or just principle, create for him a cause of action where none existed prior to such voluntary payment. The declaration in this case recognizes the fact that plaintiff would have to be legally bound to Appleton, Dickson & Co., and alleges that plaintiff was so bound. Appellant, in his testimony, says: "There was no agreement that they (Appleton, Dickson & Co.) could or could not enforce a contract with us to deliver cotton where there was a mistake in a telegram. That is a mere business obligation, and we had to fulfil or lose our credit. It was a moral sentiment. It was to our interest to do it." Under the view we have taken, it becomes unnecessary to consider the stipulations in the telegram, nor section 195 of the Constitution. The judgment is affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

AMERICAN WATERWORKS COMPANY, Pfif. in Err.,

v.

STATE of Nebraska ex rel. W. L. WALKER.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. A demurrer to a pleading admits the truth of the facts well pleaded, for the purpose of determining their sufficiency as a cause of action or defense, but it does not admit the correctness of the conclusions of law drawn therefrom by the pleader.

*Headnotes by RAGAN, C.

NOTE.—For power to compel corporation to furnish water supply to individual, see note to Rushville v. Rushville Nat. Gas Co. (Ind.) 15 L. R. A. 321; also Wood v. Auburn (Me.) 29 L. R. A. 376, 30 L. R. A.

2. A private corporation which procures from a municipal corporation a franchise for supplying the latter and its inhabitants with water, and by virtue of which franchise it is permitted to and does use the streets and alleys of such municipal corporation in the carrying on of its business, becomes thereby affected with a public use, and assumes a public duty. That duty is to furnish water at reasonable rates to all the inhabitants of the municipal corporation, and to charge each inhabitant, for water furnished, the same price as charges every other inhabitant for the same service under the same or similar conditions.

3. Such a corporation has a right to adopt all such rules for its convenience and security as are reasonable and just, and to decline to furnish water to any inhabitant who refuses to comply with such reasonable rules.

4. For such a rule to be valid and enforceable, it must, in itself, be lawful and just, and must not be discriminatory in its nature.

5. A rule of a private corporation engaged in supplying a city and its inhabitants with water in pursuance of a franchise granted by such city provided: "Water rents will be due and payable on the first days of January and July of each year, in advance, at the company's office. . . . If not paid within thirty days after they fall due, the water will be turned off, and not turned on again until all back rents are paid, including a charge of $1 for turning the water off and on." Held, that so much of said rule as required a patron in default for water rents to pay $1 as a condition precedent to his right to again be furnished with water was unreasonable and discriminatory and void.

6. A patron of such corporation failed to pay his water rent on July 1. His default continued to August 17, when the corporation shut the water off from the patron's premises. August 18 the patron tendered the corporation the water rent fixed by its rules from July 1 to December 31, and requested that the water might again be turned on, but refused to pay the $1 required by the rule for turning on and off the water. Held, (1) that the corporation would be compelled, by mandamus, to turn the water on the patron's premises; (2) that the inability of the corporation to collect the $1 from the patron by the ordinary process of law, because of the latter's insolvency, afforded no excuse to the corporation for not supplying the patron with water.

The Webster Telephone Case is in point.

State v. Nebraska Teleph. Co. 17 Neb. 126, 53 Am. Rep. 404.

Ragan, C., filed the following opinion:

The state of Nebraska, upon the relation of W. I. Walker, filed an application in the district court of Douglas county against the American Waterworks Company (hereinafter called the "water company") for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the water company to furnish the relator water for use at his residence in the city of Omaha. The relator alleged in his application that the water company was a corporation doing business in the city of Omaha; that it was a common carrier and furnisher of water to the city of Omaha and its inhabitants; that it had secured a franchise from the city, in and by which it had the right to use the streets, alleys, and public grounds thereof for laying its water mains and erecting its hydrants; that it was in the possession and use of the streets and alleys of said city for the purpose of supplying said city and its inhabitants with water; that the relator occupied a dwelling on Davenport street, in said city, near which dwelling the water company had a water main; that the water company had furnished him water at his premises since the 10th of February, 1890, at the rate charged by the water company, of $11 per year; that he had always paid his water rents promptly on the 1st days of January and July in each year, as required by the rules of the company until the 1st day of July, 1891; that his water rents were paid up to the last day mentioned; that on said date there became due to the water company $5.50, being the water rents from that date to the 1st day of January, 1892; that he was absent from home on the 1st of July, 1891, and remained absent until about the 1st of August of that year; that, by reason of the press of business, he forgot, after his return, to pay his water rents, until the 17th day of August, when the water company shut the water off from his residence; that on the 18th of August he went to the office of the water company, in the city of Omaha, and tendered it the rent from the first day of July, 1891, to the 1st day of January, 1892, and requested the water company to turn on the water at his residence; and that the water company refused to do so. The answer of the water company to the relator's application, so far as material here, alleged that the relator had actual notice of the rules and regulations of the water company; that these rules were reasonable; that they were proper and necessary for carrying on its business and supplying water to its customers, and were enforced against all citizens and customers alike; that among such rules and regulations was the following: "Water rents will be due and payable on the first days of January and July of each year, in advance, at the company's office. . . . If not paid within thirty days after they fall due, the water will be turned off, and not turned on again until all back rents and charges are paid, in cluding a charge of $1 for turning the water off and on;" that the relator refused to comply with this rule by paying the sum of $1, as required by it, for turning the water off and on at his premises; and that relator was insolvent. The relator submitted a demurrer to this answer, which the district court sustained, and issued the writ prayed for.

1. It is insisted that the judgment of the district court is wrong because the answer alleges, and the demurrer admits, that the charge of $1 demanded of relator for turning off and on the water was a reasonable charge; that the rule itself was reasonable and proper, and necessary to the carrying on of respondent's business; and that relator was insolvent. But we are of opinion that all these averments of the answer, except the one as to the insolvency of the relator, are mere conclusions of law. "A demurrer to a pleading admits the truth of the facts well pleaded, for the purpose of determining their sufficiency as a cause of action or defense, but it does not admit the correctness of the conclusions of law therein set out." Smith v. Henry County, 15 Iowa, 385; Branham v. San José, 24 Cal. 585.

2. The allegation in the answer that the relator was insolvent, we think, tendered an immaterial issue, as will be seen further on.

3. The water company, though a private corporation, by virtue of the franchise granted it by the city of Omaha, and its user of such franchise, became affected with a public use. By accepting such franchise, and entering upon the business of furnishing water to the city and its inhabitants, it assumed a public duty. That duty was to furnish water at reasonable rates to all the inhabitants of the city, and to charge each inhabitant of the city, for water furnished, the same price it charged every other inhabitant for the like service under the same or similar conditions. Williams v. Mutual Gas Co. 52 Mich. 499, 50 Am. Rep. 386; Shepard v. Milwaukee Gas Light Co. 6 Wis. 539, 70 Am. Dec. 479. And we have no doubt but that the water company had and has the right to prescribe all such rules and regulations for its convenience and security as are reasonable and just; and to refuse to furnish water to any inhabitant who refuses to comply with such reasonable rules and regulations. But such rules must be reasonable, just, lawful, and not discriminatory. Shepard v. Milwaukee Gas Light Co. supra. Is the rule pleaded by the respondent in its answer a reasonable and valid one, with which relator must have complied, as a condition precedent to his right to compel respondent to furnish him water? It is to be observed that the rule provides that, if default shall be made in the payment of water rents, the water shall be turned off, and that it will not be again turned on until two things are done: First, all back rents and charges paid; second, the payment of $1 extra for turning off and on the water. As the relator in this case tendered to the respondent the water rents from the 1st of July, 1891, to the 1st of January, 1892, the question whether that part of the rule requiring one in default for water rents to pay such rents, as a condition precedent to his right to have the water turned on again, is not necessarily involved in this case. The precise inquiry here is whether that part of the rule is reasonable which requires one in default for water rents, in order to procure the use of water, to pay this charge or penalty of $1. To be valid and enforceable, it must, in itself, be lawful and reasonable and just, and it must not discriminate between persons similarly situated. The reasonableness and validity of the rules of private corporations which had assumed the performance of public duties, or by reason of the acceptance of franchises, and engaging in the business of serving the public by supplying it with water, gas, etc., had thereby become public-service corporations, have been frequently before the courts; but, so far as we know, no court has suggested a test for determining whether or not the rules of such a corporation are reasonable. In Tacoma Hotel Co. v. Tacoma Light & W. Co. 8 Wash. 816, 14 L. R. A. 969, 28 Pac. Rep. 517, it is said in the syllabus: "A rule of a water company which requires water rates to be paid quarterly, adds a penalty of 5 per cent in case of default of payment for ten days, and provides that after a default for fifteen days the water shall be shut off from the premises, is a reasonable regulation." In Williams v. Mutual Gas Co. (Mich.) 18 N. W. Rep. 236, it was held: "The requirement of a deposit of money to guarantee the payment of the price of the gas used is not an unreasonable one, and the company may discontinue furnishing the gas unless complied with." In Shiras v. Ewing, 48 Kan. 170, it was held that "a rule of a water company, giving it the right to shut off water from the premises of a consumer who wastes it, is reasonable." In People v. Manhattan Gas Light Co. 45 Barb. 136, the right of a gas company to refuse to furnish a customer with gas until he paid his past-due gas bills was affirmed. In Shepard v. Milwaukee Gas Light Co. supra, the reasonableness of several rules of the gas company was considered. The ninth rule authorized the company, by its inspector, to have free access, at all times, to buildings and dwellings, to examine the whole apparatus, and for the removal of the meter and service pipe. The court said: "This regulation is too general and cannot be upheld, or at least a party cannot be required to subscribe to it, to entitle him to be furnished with gas." Rule 14 provided that the company should have the right at any time to shut off the gas, if it should find it necessary to do so to protect itself from fraud. The court said: "Here the company assumes the whole power to decide upon the question of abuse or fraud, either in fact or anticipation without notice, without trial, of their own mere motion. This summary jurisdiction would not be given to any of the judicial courts in any case, but upon the most urgent emergency. . . . It is no hardship for the company to resort to the same tribunals, upon like process, for protection against fraud as the law provides for individuals." Rule 16 provided that, after the admission of gas into the fittings, they should not be disconnected or opened, either for alteration or repairs or extensions, without a permit from the company, which might be obtained at the company's office free of expense, "and any . . . person who may violate this regulation will be held liable to pay treble the amount of damages occasioned thereby."

The court said: "It is not to be allowed that the gas company can impose penalties in this way, or make the submission to such penalties a condition precedent to the right of the citizen to be furnished with gas. It is singular if the legislature has given to the gas company the right to inhibit the citizen from altering the arrangement of his gas apparatus in his dwelling without its assent first had and obtained, or from extending the same; and still more singular that the company should claim the sovereign right to inflict penalties upon him for doing so." In Gas Light Co. of Baltimore v. Colliday, 25 Md. 1, it was held that the gas company could not refuse to furnish gas to a person because he refused to pay a former gas bill, or a bill contracted for gas used on other premises. See Lloyd v. Washington Gas Light Co. 1 Mackey, 381; New Orleans Gas Light Bkg. Co. v. Paulding, 12 Rob. (La.) 878. In Sickles v. Manhattan Gas-Light Co. 64 How. Pr. 38, a dispute arose between the gas company and the consumer; and it was held that the latter was entitled to have his rights investigated by the courts, and that the company would be enjoined from cutting off the gas until a trial of the case could be had. In Rockland Water Co. v. Adams, 84 Me. 472, a rule of the water company provided that users of water should be liable to pay rent for the whole year, whether they actually used it for that length of time or not, and the payments for water should be made yearly in advance; and this rule was held to be unreasonable and void.

In State v. Nebraska Teleph. Co. 17 Neb. 126, 52 Am. Rep. 404: "During the year 1888, Webster had a telephone in his office, but the telephone company, for some reason, neglected to furnish him a list of its subscribers residing in the city of Lincoln, and other cities and villages reached by its telephone lines. When Webster's telephone rent became due, he refused to pay for that part of the time he had used the telephone, and during which he had been deprived of the list of subscribers. A dispute arose between Webster and the telephone company and the company removed its telephone from Webster's office. Some time after that, Webster requested the telephone company to put a telephone in his office, and tendered the company the sum charged its regular subscribers for such work. It does not appear that Webster tendered his telephone rents in advance, nor that the rents were payable in advance, but it appears from the report of the case that Webster was financially able to pay the telephone rents when they matured. The telephone company refused to put in the telephone, alleging that the telephone had been removed from Webster's office by reason of his refusal to pay his rents. Webster then applied to this court for a mandamus to compel the telephone company to furnish him a telephone, and the court awarded the writ. The court said: "It is insisted that the conduct of the relator—the refusal of Webster to pay the rent of the telephone which had been removed from his office—now relieves respondent from any obligation to furnish the telephone. We cannot see that the relations of the parties to each other growing out of their past transactions, can have any influence upon their rights and obligations in this action. If relator is indebted to respondent for the use of its telephone the law gives it an adequate remedy by an action for the amount due. If the telephone company has become such a public servant as to be subject to the process of the courts in compelling it to discharge public duties, the mere fact of a misunderstanding with those who desire to receive its public benefits will not, alone, relieve it from the discharge of those duties. While either, or perhaps both, of the parties may have been in the wrong so far as the past is concerned, we fail to perceive how it can affect the rights of the parties to this action." This case is decisive of the question under consideration, and also disposes of the issue of relator's insolvency, tendered by the answer of respondent. In the Webster Telephone Case respondent refused to furnish a telephone because it alleged that Webster was indebted to it for the rent of a telephone previously furnished to and used by him, and which had been removed because of his failure to pay the rent. In the case at bar the water company refused to furnish relator water because it alleged that the relator was indebted to it for having turned off the water from his premises while he was in default in paying his water rent. The cost and expense of turning off and on the water for a patron enters into, and forms a part of, the semi-annual water rent paid in advance by such patron under the rules of the company. It would be unjust to permit the water company to exact payment for this service a second time. An enforcement of the rule would compel a citizen who had once made a default in his water rent, though he afterwards paid all such rents, to pay a greater price or rate for water than that paid by another citizen for the same water under the same conditions.

We reach the conclusion that the respondent in this case has shown no sufficient excuse for not furnishing the relator with water, and that the rule invoked by it to stay the process of the courts is unreasonable and discriminatory in its nature, and therefore void.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

not appearing to have been used in a different sense, denotes a period terminating with the day of the succeeding month numerically corresponding to the day of its beginning, less one. If there be no corresponding day of the succeeding month, it terminates with the last day thereof.

3. The provision of section 895 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the exclusion of the first day in computing the time within which an act is to be done, was intended to establish a uniform rule, applicable alike to the construction of statutes and to matters of practice.

4. The penalty for murder in the first degree was, by section 8 of the Criminal Code, as originally adopted, death by hanging. By an act approved April 8, 1893, passed without an emergency clause, said section was so amended as to provide that the penalty for the crime therein denounced shall be death by hanging or imprisonment for life, in the discretion of the jury. The legislature of 1893 having adjourned on the 8th day of April of that year.—Held, that said amendment took effect on the 9th day of July following.

5. When the defendant in a criminal prosecution is adjudged guilty of the crime charged, and subsequently procures a reversal of the judgment of conviction on account of error by the trial court, he will be held to have waived his right to object to further prosecution on the ground that he has been once put in jeopardy.

6. While the practice of confining persons convicted of capital offenses from the date of sentence until the day of execution has prevailed from time immemorial, such confinement is not a part of the penalty, although a necessary incident thereof, and the power of the court in that regard does not rest upon any positive provision of statute.

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment convicting defendant of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.
Messrs. Mahoney, Minahan, & Smith and Estelle & Hoeppner, for plaintiff in error:

It was the duty of the jury, in the event that they should find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, to state in their verdict whether the punishment should be death or imprisonment for life.

Laws 1893, chap. 44.

If the act of 1893 governs this case, the pretended verdict returned is no verdict and cannot support a sentence.

In the absence of constitutional or legislative restrictions, all laws take effect as soon as they are approved.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 187.

Section 24, article 8, of our Constitution provides that "no act shall take effect until three calendar months after the adjournment of the session at which it passes, unless in case of an emergency, etc."

The session at which the act of 1893 was passed adjourned April 8, 1893, and the act in question therefore took effect on the 9th day of July, 1893.

Div. 233; Lacon v. Hooper, 6 T. R. 224; Bis Cont. § 1339.

At the time of the adoption of our Constitution the term "month," used alone, would have been ambiguous, and it was to avoid that ambiguity that the phrase "calendar month" was used. The ambiguity pertains, however, wholly to the length of the period and not to the time when it commenced running.

The provision itself very clearly indicates when the period should commence running. It says, "three calendar months after the adjournment of the session." This can only mean three calendar months after the day of adjournment.

On the 29th of December the court pronounced sentence on plaintiff in error, by the terms of which he was to be confined in the county jail of Douglas county, in solitary confinement until the 6th of April, 1894, and then hanged. Under that sentence he was taken to the jail of Douglas county and kept in solitary confinement until the following day, when he was brought into court, the sentence vacated and a new sentence pronounced, fixing his execution at a later date, and his imprisonment at solitary confinement for a different period. This second sentence was absolutely without authority, for the reason that the punishment prescribed by the first being partly borne, the power of the court over it was exhausted.

That the judgment of December 29, whereby the prisoner was sentenced to be hanged on the 6th of April, 1894, is erroneous, is not open to debate. Section 503 of the Criminal Code contains the following provision: "When any such conviction is of an offense the punishment whereof is capital, at least 100 days shall intervene between the date of such sentence and judgment, and the day appointed for the execution thereof." The sentence pronounced gave the prisoner but 97 days intervening between the day of sentence and the date fixed for execution.

This error did not occur during the trial; it was an error in the pronouncing of the judgment itself. A new trial, therefore, could not cure it.

Since there is no legal verdict under the law in force at the time of the homicide, the court can have no authority to pronounce sentence.

Plaintiff in error was informed against, was placed on trial, and was put in jeopardy of his life.

To put him on trial again before another jury would be a second jeopardy unauthorized by the law.

Messrs. A. S. Churchill, Attorney General, George A. Day, and George H. Hastings, for defendant in error:

The effect of legislation has led to the common use of the word "month" in the sense of the calendar month, without the use of the word "calendar."

The word calendar then must have been used in the Constitution for a different purpose than simply to designate a solar month. The purpose and intent were that three months as enumerated in the calendar should elapse after the month in which the session of the legislature which passed the act should adjourn.

Post, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, Barney McGinn, was at the September, 1898, term of the district court for Douglas county adjudged guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree, which judgment has been removed into this court for review by means of a petition in error, to which further reference will hereafter be made. The prisoner is by the information charged with feloniously and maliciously wounding with intent to kill one Edward McKenna, on the 29th day of July, 1898, from which he, the said McKenna, died two days later, on the 31st day of July. It is unnecessary to examine at length the evidence adduced in support of the allegations of the information. It is sufficient for the purpose of this investigation that the dates of the assault and the death of the deceased were proved as charged by the state. The jury, at the close of the trial, returned a general verdict of murder in the first degree, without assessing the penalty therefor, to which exception was taken both by way of motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, and which suggests the first questions presented for our consideration. Prior to the act approved April 8, 1898, entitled "An Act to Amend Section Three (3) of the Criminal Code . . .," the only penalty for murder in the first degree was death by hanging. But by section 1 of the act above mentioned, section 3 of the Criminal Code was so amended as to read thus: "And upon conviction thereof shall suffer death or shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary during life, in the discretion of the jury." By section 2 of said act the original section is repealed, with a saving clause in the following language: "Provided, however, that such repeal shall not be construed to apply to any offenses committed prior to the taking effect of this act nor shall the same affect any convictions or prosecutions held under said original section." Sess. Laws 1898, p. 886, chap. 44, § 2. The contention of counsel for the prisoner is that the act of 1898 took effect previous to the date charged in the information; hence the district court should have required the jury to fix the penalty, and that it accordingly erred in receiving the verdict over their objections. The constitutional provision which bears upon the subject is found in section 24 of article 8, as follows: "No act shall take effect until three calendar months after the adjournment of the session at which it passed, unless in case of emergency, to be expressed in the preamble or body of the act, the legislature shall by a vote of two thirds of all the members elected to each House otherwise direct." The twenty-third session of the legislature adjourned on the day the act in question was approved, to wit, April 8, 1893; therefore the precise question presented is, When did the constitutional period of three calendar months after the adjournment of that session terminate? The term "month," at common law, whether employed in statutes or contracts, unless a different meaning was apparent from the context, was held to mean a lunar month of twenty-eight days, except in ecclesiastical affairs and as applicable to commercial paper. 2 Bl. Com. 141; Bishop, Cont. § 1839; Migotti v. Coleill, L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 283; Lacon v. Hooper, 6 T. R. 224; Churchill v. Merchants' Bank, 19 Pick. 533; Guaranty Trust & S. D. Co. v. Green Cove Springs & M. R. Co. 189 U. S. 187, 35 L. ed. 116. In this country many of the earlier cases follow the rule of the common law. Vide Ellis's Case, 8 N. J. L. 286; Loring v. Halling, 15 Johns. 119; Stackhouse v. Halsey, 8 Johns. Ch. 74; Redmond v. Glover, Dudley (Ga.) 107. Later cases have, as a rule, construed the word "month," when it does not appear to have been used in a different sense, to mean a calendar month. Glore v. Hare, 4 Neb. 183; Brown v. Williams, 84 Neb. 876, and cases cited. In order to avoid the confusion arising from conflicting constructions of the term, thirty-five states and territories have by legislative enactment declared the term "month," when used without qualification, to mean a calendar month; and in England the common-law rule was abolished by statute in 1860 (13 & 14 Vict. chap. 21). It is said by counsel for the prisoner, referring to the facts of this case, that "the authorities without exception support our contention that the three calendar months should be computed as commencing to run on the 9th day of April and terminating on the 8th day of July." And as that proposition presents the issue to be determined, we will proceed to examine some of the cases cited as bearing upon the subject. In Glore v. Hare, supra, it was held that an appeal taken on the 22d day of August from a judgment rendered February 21 is not within the six months prescribed by the act governing appeals to this court. In Brown v. Williams, supra, a note executed on the 2d day of January was held within the exception contained in section 44 of the assignment law (Comp. Stat. chap. 6), being a debt created within nine calendar months previous to a general assignment made on the 2d day of October following. In Snyder v. Warren, 3 Cow. 518, 14 Am. Dec. 519, fifteen calendar months was computed from August 15, 1823, to November 15, 1823. In McGuire v. Ulrich, 2 Abb. Pr. 28, the statute required one month's notice to quit before suit brought. The notice was given April 18 and it was held that a calendar month had intervened before the commencement of the action, to wit, May 25. In Guaranty Trust & S. D. Co. v. Green Cove Springs & M. R. Co. supra, the first publication of notice was made August 9, the answer day named being December 1 following. After computing the time at 114 days, the court says the time is "more than four lunar months, but eight days less than four calendar months."

We now come to a class of cases having a more direct bearing upon the question at issue. In Com. v. Maxwell, 27 Pa. 444, the statute provided that in case of vacancy in the office of judge of the common pleas, a successor should be chosen "at the first general election which shall happen more than three calendar months after the vacancy shall occur." Act April 27, 1852, p. 465. The presiding judge died July 15, 1856, and the general election for that year occurred October 14. It was held that the statutory period had not intervened, and that the respondent, who was chosen at the election held on the day last mentioned, was not entitled to the office. In Minard v. Burtis, 88 Wis. 267, we observe this language: "It is also said that the notice was not given one calendar month before the action was commenced; that, having been given April 4, it would not be complete until June 1. We cannot adopt this view. If given the proper number of days before action brought, as contained in the calendar month in which it was given, as in this case, it was sufficient." The leading case of Lester v. Garland, 15 Ves. Jr. 248, arose under the will of Sir John Lester, providing that the testator's sister, Sarah Pointer, should, within six calendar months after his death, give security that she would not at any time intermarry with A, or that in case she did so intermarry, she would within six calendar months thereafter pay certain bequests therein made. The testator died January 12, and the security given July 12 was held to satisfy the requirement of the will, Grant, M. R., saying: "The question is whether the day of Sir John Lester's death is to be included in the six months or to be excluded. If the day is included she did not, if it is excluded she did, give the required security before the end of the last day of the six months: and therefore did comply sufficiently with the conditions." Hardy v. Ryle, 9 Barn. & C. 603, was an action against a justice of the peace for illegally detaining the plaintiff after the expiration of his term of imprisonment. The defendant relied upon a statute of limitations which required the action to be brought "within six calendar months after the act committed." The court, after a review of the authorities, says: "The question . . . depends upon this: whether the 14th day of December—the last day of the plaintiff's imprisonment—is to be included or excluded. . . . If it is to be included, the action was not commenced in time; if it is to be excluded, it was." South Staffordshire Tramways Co. v. Sickness & Acci. Assur. Assn. [1891] 1 Q. B. 402, was an action on a policy of insurance for twelve calendar months from November 24, 1888. It is said that November 25, 1887, was the first, and November 24 1888, the last day covered by the policy. And to the same effect are Young v. Higgon, 6 Mees. & W. 49; Watson v. Pears, 2 Campb. 294; Radcliffe v. Bartholomew [1892] 1 Q. B. 161; Gross v. Fowler, 21 Cal. 393; Savings & L. Soc. v. Thompson, 82 Cal. 347. But perhaps the most satisfactory of reported cases is Migotti v. Colvill, L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 238, which was an action against the governor of the Middlesex house of correction for false imprisonment. It appears that the plaintiff was on the 31st day of October sentenced to imprisonment for the period of one calendar month, and to the further term of fourteen days, to commence on the expiration of the first sentence. The decision turned upon the question when the first sentence terminated, and Lord Denman, after an exhaustive examination of the subject, concludes as follows: "On the whole, I am of opinion that a sentence of imprisonment for one calendar month passed on any given day of any given month is to be held to begin to run from the first moment of that day and to expire upon arriving at the first moment of the corresponding day in the succeeding month. If there be no such corresponding day by reason of the succeeding month not having so many days as in the preceding month, then, by analogy to the law established in the case of bills of exchange, I think the calendar month should be held to expire at the last moment of its last day." The other judges, Cotton, Bramwell, and Brett, concur in separate opinions; the latter using the following language: "I am of opinion that the term a 'calendar month' is a legal and technical term, and that we are bound to interpret its legal and technical meaning. The meaning of the phrase is that, in computing time by calendar months, the time must be reckoned by looking at the calendar, and not by counting days; and that one calendar month's imprisonment is to be calculated from the day of imprisonment to the day numerically corresponding to that day in the following month, less one." It is true the precise question was not presented in every case cited, as the same result would, in some instances, have been reached by extending the period to the end of the month. But they are nevertheless instructive, as tending to sustain the assertion of counsel that in no case except in Minard v. Burtis, supra, was the rule applied by the district court contended for. The natural and necessary deduction from the authorities above cited is that the term "calendar month," as used in the Constitution, had, prior to the adoption of that instrument in 1875, received a definite interpretation, and is to be computed, not by counting days, but by looking at the calendar, and terminates with the day numerically corresponding to the day of its commencement, less one, in the following month; and such is evidently the sense in which it is employed in the Constitution.

The authorities are not, as will be observed, harmonious upon the question whether the first day—in this instance, the day of the adjournment of the legislature—is to be included in the prescribed period. That question is, however, not an open one in this state. Indeed, it is clear that section 895 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that "the time within which an act is to be done as herein provided shall be computed by excluding the first day and including the last," was intended to establish a uniform rule, applicable to the construction of statutes as well as to matters of practice. Monell v. Tervilliger, 8 Neb. 860; McGavock v. Pollock, 13 Neb. 585; Spencer v. Haug, 45 Minn. 231. It follows that the period of three calendar months after the adjournment of the legislature of 1898 terminated at midnight of the 8th day of July of that year. It follows, too, that the act amendatory of the Criminal Code relating to the penalty for murder in the first degree was the law of the state on the 29th day of July, and should have governed in the trial of this cause. The attorney general, however, relies upon a practical construction of the provision under consideration adverse to the view above stated. That contention has for its basis the opinion of Hon. George H. Hastings, attorney general, in response to an inquiry addressed to him by the secretary of state on the 29th day of April, 1891. We have examined with care the opinion referred to, but are unable to accept the conclusion of the learned author, for reasons already appearing. A practical exposition of a constitutional provision by the officers charged with its execution is, as said by us in State v. Holcomb, 46 Neb. 88, entitled to great weight, and will, in case of doubt or ambiguity, especially when long acquiesced in, generally be adopted by the courts. But that rule can have no application to the case at bar. There is not alone an absence of evidence tending to prove that the construction of the attorney general was acquiesced in by the executive officers or the people of the state, but it is a fact, verified by the records of this court, and of which we are required to take notice, that the question has, ever since the date of the opinion mentioned, been the subject of judicial controversy.

Of the many questions presented during the able and instructive arguments with which we have been favored in this case, it is necessary to notice two only, in addition to those already examined, and which are both included in the proposition that it is our duty to discharge the plaintiff in error, instead of remanding the cause for trial de novo. It is asserted by counsel that the plaintiff has been once in jeopardy, within the meaning of the bill of rights, and that the trial then had is a bar to further prosecution for the crime charged. If the question were an open one, to be determined by the application of fundamental principles, the argument of counsel could not be lightly disregarded. Indeed, we can conceive of no course of reasoning which does not lead logically to the conclusion contended for. As said by Mr. Bishop (1 Bishop, Crim. L. 1044): "The court is the power that brings the jeopardy upon him [the prisoner]; and, when the Constitution declares that this power shall not put him in jeopardy twice, it is a mockery to say that it may bring him into as many jeopardies as it will, provided it violates the law each time." But the author, at sections 998 and 999 of the same volume, admits the contrary to be the firmly established rule. To attempt an examination of the cases holding that the accused in a criminal prosecution, by procuring a reversal of the judgment of conviction, waives his right to object to a second trial on the ground that he has been once put in jeopardy, would be a work of supererogation. It is sufficient that the question has been definitely determined by this court in Bohanan v. State, 18 Neb. 57, 58 Am. Rep. 791. See also United States v. Harman, 68 Fed. Rep. 472. The other contention, that the prisoner should be discharged, is based upon the following facts: On the 29th day of December, 1893, the district court, on overruling the motion for a new trial, pronounced its judgment, by which the prisoner was to be executed on the 6th day of April following, and in the meantime remain in solitary confinement in the jail of Douglas county. On the next day, to wit, December 30th, he was again brought into court, and an order made setting aside the judgment previously entered, and a second sentence pronounced, by which April 13, 1894, was named as the day of execution. The second sentence, like the first, provided that the prisoner should, from the date thereof until the day of his execution, be confined in the jail of Douglas county. It is argued that the second sentence is not irregular merely, but absolutely void, for the reason that the punishment prescribed by the first had been suffered in part by the prisoner, and the power of the court over the subject thereby exhausted. In the brief of counsel for the prisoner his position is thus tersely stated: "The solitary confinement imposed upon the prisoner was as much a part of his sentence as was his execution. The only authority that the sheriff had to imprison him during that day and until called into court the following day was the sentence pronounced on the 29th of December. All previous commitments had expired. Their purpose had been served. The judgment and sentence of the court were the only authority on which the imprisonment could be legally justified from the 29th to the 30th of December, and the imprisonment of plaintiff in error under that sentence from the 29th to the 30th of December was the infliction of a part of the punishment covered by the sentence, and a part, too, that the court had legal authority to impose." That argument, although plausible, is not convincing. The first sentence was, it is conceded, irregular, the time intervening between the date thereof and the day of execution being less than 100 days, as prescribed by law. Crim. Code, § 503. But, having reached the conclusion that the verdict was also irregular, and should have been set aside on the motion of the prisoner, the power of the district court to correct its judgment in prosecutions for felonies will not now be examined. This court in Re Fuller, 34 Neb. 581, held that the term of imprisonment of one sentenced to the penitentiary runs from the date of sentence, and not from the date of his delivery to the warden. But that was a construction of section 518 of the Criminal Code, and not involving the question now under consideration. It is by section 547 provided, in substance, that the death penalty shall be inflicted in the immediate vicinity of the jail, in an inclosure to be prepared under the direction of the sheriff. Although the confinement of the prisoner from the time of sentence until the day of his execution is a practice which has prevailed from time immemorial as a necessary incident to the judgment, it is, strictly speaking, no part thereof, and the power of the court in that regard does not rest upon any positive provision of statute. The precise question appears to have been seldom raised, and the cases cited cannot be said to sustain the proposition contended for. In People v. Meservoy, 76 Mich. 223, as well as People v. Kelley, 79 Mich. 320, the sentence was imprisonment in the penitentiary, and, in accordance with the rule adopted by this court in Fuller's Case, supra, was held to have commenced on the day it was imposed. In Re Tyson, 18 Colo. 482, 6 L. R. A. 472, the statute of 1889 provided that all persons convicted of crimes punishable by death should be delivered to the warden of the penitentiary, and by him kept in solitary confinement until the day of execution. The statute in force at the time of the homicide, like ours, provided merely that every person convicted of murder in the first degree should suffer death. Tyson, having been convicted of murder in the first degree, was delivered to the warden under the act of 1889, whereupon he sought his discharge by means of a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that the provision for solitary confinement was in the nature of an ex post facto law. In disposing of that contention the court says: "Aside from this, the defendant is imprisoned for the purpose only that he may be produced at the time set for his execution, the confinement being no part of the punishment, but simply an incident connected therewith, referable to penal administration as its primary object." The same statute was before the Supreme Court of the United States in Re Medley, 184 U. S. 160, 88 L. ed. 885, where it was held, but without controverting the proposition that the imprisonment is not a part of the sentence proper, that the provision therein for solitary confinement was in the nature of an ex post facto law as to crimes previously committed. We are satisfied with the reasoning of the Colorado court, and do not hesitate to adopt the conclusion reached by it, so far as applicable to the facts of the case before us.

Although it has been our endeavor to examine the merits of the question presented, we must not be understood as conceding it to be an open one at this time. We have, on the other hand, no reason to doubt the soundness of the practice long prevailing in this state, by which one committed to the penitentiary is, by procuring a reversal of the judgment of conviction, considered to have waived his right to insist that the partial execution of the sentence is a bar to further prosecution. And such, while not expressly decided, logically follows from the rule asserted in Bohanan v. State.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings by the district court.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

ST. LOUIS TRUST COMPANY et al.,
Appts.,
v.

W. H. H. RILEY, by Next Friend.

(70 Fed. Rep. 82.)

Preference over a mortgage debt in respect to the receiver's earnings cannot be given a claim for damages caused by negligence of a street-railway company before the appointment of the receiver, in a suit to foreclose the mortgage on the street-railway property.

(September 30, 1896.)

APPPEAL by the representatives of the mortgage bondholders from an order of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas rendered in the suit by the St. Louis Trust Company et al. against the Capital Street-Railway Company et al. for the foreclosure of certain mortgages, which order directed the receivers to pay out of the earnings of the property in their possession the amount of a judgment which had been recovered by petitioner against the owners of the mortgaged property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. U. M. Rose, W. E. Hemingway, and G. B. Rose for appellants.

Mr. William G. Whipple, for appellee:

Being clearly within the conventional period of six months prior to the appointment of the receiver, this claim was properly directed to be paid out of the earnings of the railroad during the receivership.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Is a claim for damages caused by the negligence of a street-railway company, a mortgagor, five months before a receiver was appointed in a suit to foreclose a mortgage upon its property and income, entitled to be preferred to the mortgage debt in payment out of the earnings of the railroad during the receivership? This is the question presented in this case. It arises in this way. The Capital Street-Railway Company, a corporation, which owned and operated a street railway in Little Rock, in the state of Arkansas, mortgaged its property, franchises, and income on April 2, 1890, to secure the payment of certain bonds it issued. On April 1, 1893, it made default in the payment of interest on these bonds, and on April 19, 1893, upon a proper bill for the foreclosure of the mortgage, a receiver of its property and income was appointed by the court below, and that court subsequently appointed a coreceiver. This corporation had, on March 8, 1891, leased its railroad to the City Electric Street-Railway Company, a corporation, which thereafter operated the railway under the lease. On December 1, 1891, the latter company mortgaged its property, franchises, and income to secure the payment of certain bonds which it issued. On June 1, 1893, it made default in the payment of interest on these bonds, and on a bill for the foreclosure of this mortgage the same court directed the receivers of the Capital Street-Railway Company to hold the property and income of the electric company under this bill. In December, 1892, $9,000 was paid by the electric railway company on the interest secured by its mortgage. On October 31, 1892, W. H. H. Riley, the appellee, was injured by the negligence of a motorman of the electric company in operating his car, and on June 19, 1894, he recovered a judgment for $5,000 on account of this negligence against both these corporations.

On an intervening petition in the foreclosure suits, and upon the answers of the mortgagees, which disclosed the foregoing facts, the court below held that the claim of the appellee upon the earnings of the property of the railway companies during the receivership was superior to that of the mortgagees, and ordered the receivers to pay it in preference to the mortgage debts. This decision and order are assigned as error.

The proposition that the negligence of a mortgagor may create a claim, and secure that claim by an equitable right to its property and income superior to the lien of a mortgage of the same property and income which it made and recorded years before, is not without interest to those who are accustomed to uphold the obligations of contracts and the validity of contract rights. The counsel for the appellee argues that damages for the negligence of a railroad company are necessary expenses of the operation of its railroad, and rests his proposition chiefly upon the following decisions of the Supreme Court, and particularly upon this quotation from the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Waite in Fosdick v. Schall, 90 U. S. 235, 252, 253, 25 L. ed. 339, 343, 348: "When [railroad] companies become pecuniarily embarrassed, it frequently happens that debts for labor, supplies, equipment, and improvements are permitted to accumulate, in order that bonded interest may be paid and a disastrous foreclosure postponed, if not altogether avoided. In this way the daily and monthly earnings, which ordinarily should go to pay the daily and monthly expenses, are kept from those to whom in equity they belong, and used to pay the mortgage debt. The income out of which the mortgage is to be paid is the net income obtained by deducting from the gross earnings what is required for necessary operating and managing expenses, proper equipment, and useful improvements. Every railroad mortgagee in accepting his security impliedly agrees that the current debts made in the ordinary course of business shall be paid from the current receipts before he has any claim upon the income. If, for the convenience of the moment, something is taken from what may not improperly be called the current debt fund, and put into that which belongs to the mortgage creditors, it certainly is not inequitable for the court, when asked by the mortgagees to take possession of the future income and hold it for their benefit, to require as a condition of such an order that what is due from the earnings to the current debt shall be paid by the court from the future current receipts before anything derived from that source goes to the mortgagees. In this way the court will only do what, if a receiver should not be appointed, the company ought itself to do. For, even though the mortgage may in terms give a lien upon the profits and income, until possession of the mortgaged premises is actually taken or something equivalent done, the whole earnings belong to the company and are subject to its control. . . . We think, also, that if no such order is made when the receiver is appointed, and it appears in the progress of the cause that bonded interest has been paid, additional equipment provided, or lasting and valuable improvements made out of earnings which ought in equity to have been employed to keep down debts for labor, supplies, and the like, it is within the power of the court to use the income of the receivership to discharge obligations which, but for the diversion of funds, would have been paid in the ordinary course of business. This, not because the creditors, to whom such debts are due, have in law a lien upon the mortgaged property or the income, but because, in a sense, the officers of the company are trustees of the earnings for the benefit of the different classes of creditors and the stockholders; and if they give to one class of creditors that which properly belongs to another, the court may, upon an adjustment of the accounts, so use the income which comes into its own hands as, if practicable, to restore the parties to their original equitable rights."

It is an interesting fact that these remarks of Chief Justice Waite, upon which courts are constantly urged to base orders for the preference of unsecured to secured creditors in the distribution of the incomes earned during receiverships, and of the proceeds of foreclosure sales, did not lead to the preference of any such claim in that case. The decision in Fosdick v. Schall was that a claim of the vendor of cars, which had subsequently reclaimed them under its contract, for their rent for six months immediately prior to the receivership, which was by the contract to be paid as a part of the purchase price of the cars, had no equitable claim upon the proceeds of the mortgaged property superior to that of the mortgage bondholders, and the decree of the circuit court which gave it such a preference was reversed. 99 U. S. 255, 25 L. ed. 843.

In Fosdick v. Southwestern Car Co. 99 U. S. 256, 25 L. ed. 844, the Supreme Court held that the claim of a vendor of cars upon the proceeds of the foreclosure sale was superior to that of a mortgagee, where the cars had been sold under the foreclosure, and the mortgagee had thus received the benefit of their value.

In Huidekoper v. Hinckley Locomotive Works, 99 U. S. 258, 25 L. ed. 844, an order directing the payment, in preference to the mortgage debt, of an amount found due on account of the purchase of locomotives that had been used by the railway company before the receivership, but had afterwards been reclaimed by the vendor, was reversed by the Supreme Court.

In Hale v. Frost, 99 U. S. 889, 892, 25 L. ed. 419, 420, that court held that a claim for current supplies, furnished to the machinery department of a railroad company just preceding the receivership, was entitled to a preference over the mortgage debt in payment out of the income earned during the receivership, but that a claim for material for construction purposes was entitled to no such preference.

In Mittenberger v. Loganport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 106 U. S. 286, 808, 811, 27 L. ed. 117, 126, 127, the Supreme Court sustained a decree which directed the receivers operating the mortgaged property to pay, out of the proceeds of its sale, the arrears due for operating expenses for a period not exceeding ninety days prior to the appointment of a receiver, and an amount not exceeding $10,000, to several connecting lines of railroad in settlement of ticket and freight balances, and for materials and repairs, that had accrued in part more than ninety days before the bill for foreclosure was filed.

In Union Trust Co. v. Souther, 107 U. S. 591, 598, 595, 27 L. ed. 488, 489, 490, it was held that the court appointing a receiver might properly order him, before paying the mortgage debt, to pay out of the proceeds of the mortgaged property all amounts owing by the railroad company for labor or supplies that accrued in the operation and maintenance of the railroad within six months prior to the appointment of the receiver, in a case in which the receiver had used the income in making permanent repairs and improvements upon the property, instead of discharging these claims.

In Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 776, 783, 28 L. ed. 596, 598, the decision was that, in a case in which the income of the receivership had been diverted to pay for the right of way, the court might charge a claim for fuel necessarily furnished to and used by the railroad company in operating its railroad within twelve months prior to the receivership upon the income or proceeds of the mortgaged property in preference to the mortgage debt; but Chief Justice Waite added: "We do not now hold, any more than we did in Fosdick v. Schall or Huidekoper v. Hinckley Locomotive Works, 99 U. S. 258, 260, 25 L. ed. 844, 845, that the income of a railroad in the hands of a receiver, for the benefit of mortgage creditors who have a lien upon it under their mortgage, can be taken away from them and used to pay the general creditors of the road. All we then decided, and all we now decide, is, that if current earnings are used for the benefit of mortgage creditors before current expenses are paid, the mortgage security is chargeable in equity with the restoration of the fund which has been thus improperly applied to their use."

In Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 117 U. S. 484, 29 L. ed. 968, it was held that the wages of employees for a limited time before the receivership might be preferred to the mortgage bondholders in the distribution of the proceeds of the mortgaged property.

In Porter v. Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co. 120 U. S. 649, 671, 30 L. ed. 830, 839, the decision was that claims for the construction of a railroad were entitled to no lien upon the proceeds of the property of the railroad company superior to that of a prior recorded mortgage.

In Penn. v. Calloun, 121 U. S. 251, 30 L. ed. 915, a claim of a bank for money which was borrowed and used by the mortgagor to pay current expenses and pressing debts, shortly before the foreclosure, was refused a preference in payment over the mortgage debt.

In Union Trust Co. v. Morrison, 125 U. S. 591, 612, 31 L. ed. 825, 831, a preference in the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of mortgaged property was allowed to a surety, who had executed a bond for an injunction that enabled the railroad company to prevent the sale of its rolling stock on execution, two years and ten months before the receiver was appointed; but Mr. Justice Bradley in the opinion quoted the remark of Chief Justice Waite in Burnham v. Bowen, which appears above, and declared that it was not the intention of the court to decide anything in conflict with that declaration.

In St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Cleveland.

C. C. & I. R. Co. 125 U. S. 658, 678, 31 L. ed. 832, 886, the Supreme Court refused to make the amount due for the rental of track used by the mortgagor before the appointment of the receiver a preferred claim to that of the bondholders upon the proceeds of the mortgaged property. In the opinion Mr. Justice Matthews thus enumerates the claims that may be preferred in the distribution of the income: "It is undoubtedly true that operating expenses, debts due to connecting lines growing out of an interchange of business, and debts due for the use and occupation of leased lines, are chargeable upon gross income before that net revenue arises which constitutes the fund applicable to the payment of the interest on the mortgage bonds." Page 678, 125 U. S., and page 887, 31 L. ed.

In Toledo, D. & B. R. Co. v. Hamilton, 134 U. S. 296, 301, 33 L. ed. 905, 908, it was held that one who had constructed a dock upon the land of the railroad company at its instance, after the execution and recording of its mortgage, had no equitable claim superior to that of the mortgage bondholders on the property or its proceeds.

In Kneeland v. American Loan & T. Co. 186 U. S. 89, 96, 34 L. ed. 379, 383, the Supreme Court refused to prefer to the mortgage debt a claim for the rental of rolling stock for the three months immediately prior to the filing of the bill for foreclosure, in the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the property, although the rolling stock was used during that time by a receiver of the railroad company appointed on a creditors' bill.

In Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. Co. v. Texas C. R. Co. 137 U. S. 171, 198, 34 L. ed. 625, 635, that court held that a claim for money loaned and used to pay operating expenses and interest and to keep the company a going concern was entitled to no preference in payment out of the income or proceeds of the mortgaged property over the mortgage debt.

In Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wilson, 138 U. S. 501, 508, 34 L. ed. 1023, 1026, it was held that the claim of an attorney for services that inured to the benefit of the mortgagee was entitled to a preference over the claim of the latter in payment from the proceeds of the foreclosure sale, but that a claim for services that did not inure to the benefit of the mortgagee was entitled to no such preference.

In Thomas v. Western Car Co. 149 U. S. 95, 110, 112, 37 L. ed. 663, 668, 669, a preference in the distribution of the proceeds of a mortgaged railroad was denied to a claim for the use of cars for six months immediately prior to the receivership.

From this brief review of the decisions of the Supreme Court bearing upon this question, we think these propositions may properly be deduced:

First. There are certain claims against a mortgaged railroad company, accruing before the appointment of a receiver, which are entitled to a preference over a prior mortgage debt in payment out of the earnings of the railroad during the receivership and out of the proceeds of the sale of its property.

Second. It is an indispensable element of every such claim that it is founded upon property furnished or services rendered to the mortgagor which either preserved or enhanced the value of the security of the mortgage debt, and thereby inured to the benefit of the mortgagee.

Third. Claims of this character have been given a preference over the mortgage debt by these decisions on one of two grounds,—either on the ground that the mortgage is a lien on the net, and not on the gross, income of the railway company, and where that part of the income that is applicable to the payment of current expenses of operation, proper equipment, and necessary improvements has been diverted to pay interest on the mortgage debt or to otherwise benefit the security, and this diversion has left claims for these expenses unpaid, it is the province and duty of the chancellor to restore the diverted fund by taking an equal amount from the earnings of the railway company during the receivership, and applying it to the payment of these claims in preference to the mortgage debt (Fosdick v. Schall, Burnham v. Bowen, St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co., Toledo, D. & B. R. Co. v. Hamilton, and Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. Co. v. Texas Cent. R. Co. supra); or on the ground that the payment of the claims is necessary to preserve the mortgaged railroad, and to keep it a going concern. It is indispensable that the operation of a railroad be uninterrupted in order that the travel and traffic of the public may be accommodated, and in order that the franchises of the railroad company may be preserved from forfeiture. Hence the wages of employees, who might otherwise cease from their work, the amounts due to connecting lines of railroad that might otherwise cease their business relations with the managers of the mortgaged property, and the claims for supplies and materials necessary to keep the mortgaged railroad a going concern, may, in proper cases, be paid out of the earnings during the receivership, or out of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property, in preference to the mortgage debt. Mittenberger v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co., Union Trust Co. v. Souther, and Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co., supra.

But a claim for damages for the negligence of the mortgagor lacks the indispensable element of a preferential claim. It is not based upon any consideration that inures to the benefit of the mortgage security. Wages, traffic balances, and supplies produce or increase income, and preserve the mortgaged property. Repairs and improvements increase the value of the security of the bondholders. But the negligence of the mortgagor neither produces an income nor enhances the value of the property. The wages, traffic balances, and claims for materials and supplies accrue under and pursuant to the contract between the mortgagor and mortgagee that the former will properly operate the railroad. The damages for negligence accrue in violation of that contract, and for a breach of the duty of the mortgagor to operate the railroad carefully. Many preferential claims are for property or services that were necessary to make or keep the railroad a going concern, necessary to its operation. The negligence that is the foundation of this claim did not tend to keep the railroad in operation, but, if repeated and continued, would inevitably stop it. It was not necessary, but was deleterious, to its operation. For these reasons this claim for damages cannot, in our opinion, be allowed a preference over the mortgage debt in payment out of the income earned by the receivers appointed under the bills for the foreclosure of these mortgages.

The orders appointing these receivers did not require them to pay claims of the character of that which we have been considering out of the income or proceeds of the mortgaged property in preference to the mortgage debts. The cases cited by counsel for appellee in which such an order was made do not rule this case. Dow v. Memphis & L. R. Co. 20 Fed. Rep. 260; Central Trust Co. v. Texas & St. L. R. Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 185.

There is a statute in Arkansas which provides in terms that all persons injured by any railroad through actionable negligence shall have a lien on the railroad and appurtenances paramount to that of all other persons interested in it, whether their interest is prior in time to the injury or not. Sand. & H. Dig. (Ark.) § 6251. But we have not considered that statute, or its legal effect, because at the final hearing in the court below counsel for the appellee stated that he did not rely upon it further than to show the policy of the state in that regard, and the circuit court evidently did not consider it.

The order appealed from must be reversed, with costs, and it is so ordered.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT

Re ESTATE of Ozias WALKER, Deceased.

(.....Cal.....)

An inadvertent mistake by a witness to a will in writing testator's surname with his own initials when attempting to sign his name as a witness makes his signature insufficient under a statute requiring witnesses to the will.

(McFarland, Garoutte, and Van Fleet, JJ., dissent.)

(December 10, 1895.)

A PPEAL by the legatees under the will of Ozias Walker, deceased, from a judgment of the Superior Court for Butte County granting the petition of Lydia A. Lane to revoke the probate of the will. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. G. Warren and F. C. Lusk for appellant.

Messrs. William H. Schooler and Rear-dan & White, for respondent:

In Martin's Estate, 58 Cal. 532, this court said: "We are not at liberty to hold that the legislature intended any one of these requirements to be of greater or less importance than the others. If we may omit one, why not either of the others."

See also Billing's Estate, 64 Cal. 427; Chaffee v. Baptist Missionary Convention, 10 Paige, 85, 40 Am. Dec. 228.

Every one of these four requisites, in contemplation of the statute, is to be regarded as essential as another; there must be a concurrence of all to give validity to the act, and the omission of any is fatal.

Remsen v. Brinkerhoff, 26 Wend. 825, 37 Am. Dec. 258.

Each witness must sign his name.

Re O'Neil's Will, 91 N. Y. 520; Grabill v. Barr, 5 Pa. 441, 47 Am. Dec. 418.

A signature in any method not permitted by the statute would be as fatal to the validity of the paper as a will as would the entire absence of the signature of the testator.

Martin's Estate, 58 Cal. 532; Re McCabe, 68 Cal. 520.

NOTE.—For signature by mark or cross, see note to Re Guilfoyle's Will (Cal.) 22 L. R. A. 370. 30 L. R. A.

"C. G. Walker" was not the name of the witness; it was then something intended by the witness to represent his name, or it was not. If it was intended as something to represent his name, then it was equivalent only to a mark or cross.

Goods of Redding, 2 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 3.

If it is considered as a mark or cross, it is insufficient, because not attested as required by § 17, C. C. P. and § 14, Civil Code.

Oliver's Goods, 2 Spinks' Eccl. & Adm. Rep. 57; Re O'Neil, 91 N. Y. 521; Martin's Estate, supra; Rand's Estate, 61 Cal. 474; Billing's Estate, 64 Cal. 427; Chaffee v. Baptist Missionary Convention, 10 Paige, 85, 40 Am. Dec. 228.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeals from the judgment revoking the probate of a will and from the order denying a motion for a new trial. The facts disclosed by the evidence without conflict are as follows: The will of Ozias Walker, deceased, was written by C. G. Warren, the attorney at law of the testator, and was executed in the presence of H. C. White and C. G. Warren, who were requested by the testator to attest, as witnesses, its execution. The requirements of the statute were complied with in all respects saving that the witness C. G. Warren, in signing his name as a witness at the end of the will, inadvertently wrote the name "C. G. Walker," thus employing his own initials but the testator's surname. Upon this showing the court revoked the probate of the instrument, and the propriety of its action in so doing is the sole question presented upon this appeal.

At the outset of this consideration it is proper to say that the right to make testamentary disposition of property is not an inherent right or a right of citizenship, nor is it even a right granted by the Constitution. It rests wholly upon the legislative will, and is derived entirely from the statutes. In conferring that right the legislature has seen fit to prescribe certain exactions and requirements looking to the execution and authentication of the instrument, and a compliance with these requirements becomes necessary to its exercise. As has been said (Re O'Neil's Will, 91 N. Y.

521): "While the primary rule governing the interpretation of wills, when admitted to probate, recognizes and endeavors to carry out the intention of the testator, that rule cannot be invoked in the construction of the statute regulating their execution. In the latter case courts do not consider the intention of the testator, but of the legislature." As a prerequisite to the exercise of the testamentary right in this state, the legislature has prescribed for the execution and authentication of wills such as this the following requirements: "(1) It must be subscribed at the end thereof by the testator himself, or some person in his presence and by his direction must subscribe his name thereto. (2) The subscription must be made in the presence of the attesting witnesses, or be acknowledged by the testator to them to have been made by him or by his authority. (3) The testator must, at the time of subscribing or acknowledging the same, declare to the attesting witnesses that the instrument is his will. And (4) there must be two attesting witnesses, each of whom must sign his name as a witness at the end of the will, at the testator's request and in his presence." Civ. Code, § 1276. It is not for courts to say that these requirements, or any of them, are mere formalities, which may be waived without impairing the status of the instrument. It is not for courts to say that a mode of execution or authentication, other than that prescribed by law, subverts the same purpose, and it is equally efficient to validate the instrument. The legislative mandates are supreme, and there is no right to make testamentary disposition except upon compliance with those mandates. It may be freely conceded that the question under consideration is of a nature purely technical, but it is to be remembered that the whole subject-matter of the execution and authentication of wills is technical, and nothing else; and it must not be forgotten that the technicalities are those which the lawmaking power has the right to impose, and has imposed, upon the maker of a will.

It will be noted in the section of the Code above quoted that the duty enjoined upon the testator is to subscribe the will, while that imposed upon the attesting witnesses is that each must sign his name as a witness. The difference is neither immaterial nor accidental. A testator may be illiterate, or he may, by reason of paralysis, or other disabling cause, be incapacitated from signing his name, and the law has wisely and liberally provided for the due execution of a will by one so situated. It has required of him that he shall subscribe, and, while the word unquestionably has for one of its significations the signing of a name, it is a verb of comprehensive meaning. Any form or kind of underwriting is a subscription, and generally it has been held that any mark or writing by the testator meant by him to be his name, or to take the place of his signature, or to serve for his identification, will answer the requirements of a statute which calls merely for subscription or signing. The same liberality of construction, and interpretation has been put by the courts upon statutes which require the witnesses merely to subscribe or to sign. There are thus numerous cases under such statutes which hold, in effect, that any signing by which alone, or by which, aided by parol evidence, the identity of the subscriber may be ascertained, substantially complies with the statute. The case of the appellant upon this proposition cannot be more strongly stated than in the following extracts from the learned work of Mr. Jarman, discussing the Victorian wills act: "Examining the requirements common to the statute of frauds and the wills act in their order, the next condition prescribed for the validity of a will is that it should be signed, which suggests the inquiry, What amounts to a 'signing' by the testator? It has been decided that a mark is sufficient, and that notwithstanding the testator is able to write, and though his name does not appear on the face of the will. A mark being sufficient, of course the initials of the testator's name would also suffice. And it would be immaterial that he signed by a wrong or assumed name (since that name would be taken as a mark), or that against the mark was written a wrong name." 1 Jarm. Wills, 6th ed. *79. "The next statutory requisition, which is common to the old and the present law, is, that the will be 'attested and subscribed' by the witnesses. A mark has been decided to be a sufficient subscription. . . . The initials of the witnesses also amount to a sufficient subscription, if placed for their signatures, as attesting the execution. . . . A witness need not sign his own name if the name actually subscribed be intended to represent his name; or a description (without any name) is sufficient if intended to identify him as witness.

In fact there seems to be no distinction in these respects between the words 'sign' and 'subscribe': any act, therefore, which, as before noticed, would be a good signature by a testator, would be a good signature by a witness." Id. *85, *86. An examination of the cases bearing upon the interpretation of the English statute shows that the text of the learned author is fully supported. The reasoning by which the conclusions are reached may be thus summarized: To "subscribe" is to attest or give consent or evidence knowledge by underwriting, usually (but not necessarily) the name of the subscriber. But the place of the writing is immaterial, since a still more general meaning of the word "subscribe" is to attest by writing, in which definition the locality is wholly disregarded. This is the reasoning of the leading English case of Roberts v. Phillips, 4 El. & Bl. 450. To "sign" in the primary sense of the word is to make any mark. To sign an instrument or document is to make any mark upon it in token of knowledge, approval, acceptance, or obligation. The signature is the sign thus made. And while, by long usage and custom, "signature" has come generally to mean the name of a person written by himself, and thus to be nearly an exact synonym of "autograph," that signification is derivative, and is not inherent in the word itself, any more than it is in "autograph," which strictly conveys no more than the idea of a specimen of an individual's writing. Any "mark" may be a signature, and that species of mark which we call a "cross" (independent of an accompanying name) was early used as a signature of assent, and indeed was designated "signum." While marksmen have become fewer with the spread of education, the mark of the cross is still recognized by statute law as a method of signing. Therefore, as the wills act required only a signing by the testator, and as this requirement of signing only was also found in the statute of frauds, the courts early decided not to be bound by any narrow definition of "signing" or "signature" as meaning the writing of one's name, but to give to the word its broadest possible scope and significance, and thus held that any mark or signature made with the intent to bind the maker (in the case of the statute) or to be a sign (in the case of wills) should be deemed sufficient. As the English courts had still further obliterated from the word "subscription" the idea of place or locality, there was left no measurable distinction between the requirement upon the testator to sign and that upon the witness to subscribe.

In the decisions this broad rule is repeatedly asserted. In Goods of Clarke, 27 L. J. P. 18, the will of an illiterate person was executed by her mark, against which was written her maiden name instead of that properly borne by her in marriage. Says the court: "There is enough to show that the will is really that of the person whose it proposes to be. Her mark at the foot or end of it is a sufficient execution, and what somebody else wrote against the mark cannot vitiate it." In Goods of Clarke, 2 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 329, the testator had made his mark, and requested the vicar to sign for him, which he did with his own name, and not that of the deceased. Says the court: "The statute allows a will to be signed for the testator by another person, and does not say that the signature must be in the testator's name. Here this gentleman, at the testator's request, signed the will for him; not in the testator's name, but using his own name. I incline to think this is a sufficient compliance with the act." In Goods of Bryce, Id. 325, the testatrix signed her will by a mark, her name nowhere appearing. Says the court: "Although the name of the testatrix does not appear upon the face of the instrument, the affidavit sufficiently accounts for the manner in which the will was signed. The statute does not say that the name of the testator shall appear at the foot of the will. The paper is identified as being the will of the deceased. . . . I am of opinion that the statute is sufficiently complied with." The foregoing cases deal with the "signing" by the testator. Coming to the subscribing by the witness, it is said in Goods of Eynon, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 92: "No particular form of attestation is necessary, but the act done by the witness must be intended by him to evidence his attestation of the will. I must find that I can draw an inference from what occurred that the witness made a mark of some kind, with the intention to evidence his attestation." In Goods of Christian, 2 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 110, it is said: "The attesting witnesses to the so-called 'codicil' have affixed their initials only. However, I have no doubt in the matter, although I believe this is the first instance under the act of the witnesses so signing. I am not aware that the witnesses can be required to sign their names. I am of opinion that there is a sufficient subscription on their parts, and therefore I decree probate as prayed." In Goods of Oliver, 2 Spinks, Eccl. & Adm. 30 L. R. A.

Rep. 57, it is said: "The statute says the witnesses 'shall attest and subscribe the will.' It does not say 'shall write their own names,' so that a mark is held to be a good subscription." These cases are quoted that there may be no room for misunderstanding of the English decisions or of the text of the book writers. But, as the matter is wholly statutory, they have no value as authority unless there be an identity in the statutory requirements of this state and England. But there is no such identity. Indeed, our statute seems to have been drawn with the express intent to foreclose and shut out the interpretation given to the English law. Thus, the English statute requires subscription. That word had been judicially declared not to have reference to the place of writing. Our statute says that the will shall be subscribed at the end thereof, thus expressly making locality of writing an element of the subscription. The English statute required a signing. As interpreted by the court, this did not necessitate the signing of the name. By express language our statute commands that a witness shall sign his name. In England, therefore, a witness may sign in any one of a multitude of ways; by our law his signing is limited to the expression of his name. The case of Meehan v. Bourke, 2 Bradf. 885, is in no way opposed to, but rather is in full accord with, this view. The statute of New York, from which ours was taken, likewise requires that the witnesses should sign their names. Eliza Green, one of the witnesses to the will under consideration, was unable to write. Her name was correctly written by the doctor, and she then made her mark across it, and acknowledged it to be her mark and signature. The court said that before the Revised Statutes a witness might attest a will by a mark; as in this state it may be done under section 14 of the Civil Code. The opinion declares: "Our statute requires the witness to 'sign his name.' . . . Where another person writes the name of the witness, and then the witness acknowledges the signature,—puts his mark to it, his signum,—he literally signs; and what he signs is his name,—i. e., he signs his name,—while a mark alone [the learned judge significantly adds] would not be sufficient." Yet a mark alone is held sufficient under the English statute.

I conclude, therefore, that as our law has seen fit to prescribe that the testator shall subscribe his will at the end thereof, so it has seen fit to require that attesting witnesses shall sign and shall sign only in one way,—that is to say, by affixing their names. It cannot be said that some other mode of subscription will answer the purpose, or subserve the statutory requirement, when in truth it does not. As well could it be said that the requirement of two attesting witnesses is not mandatory, and that this will, having been duly attested by one witness, should be admitted to probate. That the overthrowing of any will works a hardship upon the devisees and legatees is obvious; but the law is no more tender of their claims than it is of the rights of the natural heirs. In the absence of any will, the law makes a wise, liberal, and beneficent distribution of the dead man's estate; so wise, indeed, that the policy of permitting wills at all, is often gravely questioned.

When a will is proved, every exertion of the court is directed to giving effect to the wishes of the testator therein expressed, but in the proving of the instrument the sole consideration before the court is whether or not the legislative mandates have been complied with. If not, then the law makes the will, and it is often a better one, embracing a more equitable disposition of his property, than that which the deceased attempted but failed to execute.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: Beatty, Ch. J.; Harrison, J.; Temple, J.

McFarland, J., dissenting:

I dissent. In my opinion there was in this case a sufficient compliance with the formalities prescribed by the Code for the attestation of a will. It is true that the right to make testamentary disposition of property—like most other rights—rests upon the legislative will; but that legislative will has been uniformly exercised in favor of the right in all English-speaking countries, and in nearly all others, from time immemorial, so that the right has come to be a usual, well-established, and most important attribute of ownership. Therefore, in dealing with an attempt to exercise that right, the general rules of construction should be applied; that is, the provisions of the Code "are to be liberally construed with a view to effect its objects." The signature of the witness Warren, in this case, as shown beyond question, would be held good if any written instrument or paper known to the law were involved other than a will, and I see no good reason why the same rule should not apply here. To allow a will to be defeated by the careless (or intentional) misspelling of his name by a subscribing witness would lead, I fear, to great abuses. If a man should not have the right to make a will, let the legislature take it away; but, as long as he has it, let it be protected as other rights. I think that the judgment should be reversed.

Garoutte, J., dissenting:

I dissent. I do not think a man's testamentary disposition of his property should be defeated for the reasons here given. The argument requires a too technical analysis of terms and statutes in order to arrive at such a result. While the right to dispose of property by will is purely statutory, still it can hardly be said to be a mere matter of legislative grace, for it has become almost an inalienable right, made so by reason of its long practice and approval in all civilized nations. It is conceded that, if the testator, Walker, had made a like mistake, and signed his name "Warren," it would not have defeated the will; but it is now held that, the witness Warren having made the mistake in signing his name "Walker," the will is avoided. I have no idea that the legislature, in formulating the statute as to the character of the signatures, ever intended such results to follow; and I am satisfied it never intended to attach any different meaning to the two phrases, namely, "sign his name as a witness," and "subscribed by the testator," or that the legislature ever intended to bar a man from being a witness to a will who was unable to sign his name, any more than it intended to bar a man from making his will who was likewise so unfortunate. I believe that for the purposes of this statute the person's mark, properly witnessed, is his name; and further, I believe any name that the party should attach to the will as a witness is his name. I do not think it is for a contestant of the will to say to a witness, "That is not your name;" and neither is it for the witness to appear upon the stand and say, "That is not my name." If we are to be so technical in this matter, the statute should have said "true name." The true names of witnesses are often unknown to the testator, and to say that a person could intentionally and corruptly sign a false name to a will as a witness, and thereby defeat it, is to go to great lengths. No case in the books has ever gone that far, to my knowledge. Still that doctrine would seem to be declared by the main opinion of the court in the present case. A name signed by mistake of the witness is no different from one signed in fraud. The knave wrote the name as his name, and for the purposes intended by the testator it was his name. In the present case the attorney, as a witness, unintentionally wrote a name which was not his true name, but he intended the writing to be his name, and he made the writing for his name, and for the purposes intended by the testator; and as to those purposes it should be held to be his name. If, one hour previous to the signing of the will, he had concluded to change his name to C. G. Walker, and had so signed it, or, for the very purpose of concealing his true name, had signed the will "John Brown," to my mind the will would be legally witnessed; and in the present case the same conclusion should be declared.

Van Fleet, J., dissenting:

I dissent from the conclusion reached by the majority of the court, and agree with what is said by Justices McFarland and Garoutte. I think by a too close adherence to the mere letter of the statute the court, in the main opinion, loses sight of the evident purpose intended to be subserved by the provision in question. When the witness Warren, intending in perfect good faith, as is conceded, to write his own name, wrote his own initials, but inadvertently added the name of the testator instead of his own, it was, to all essential intents and purposes, a signing of his name within the spirit and intent of the statute, since it met every purpose designed to be subserved thereby. And this view, in my judgment, is sustained by the case of Meehan v. Rourke, 2 Bradf. 385, cited in the main opinion. There the name of the witness was written by another, and merely visé by the mark of the witness himself, although the requirement of the statute, like our own, was that the witness should sign his name. But it is said by the surrogate, in addition to the language quoted in the majority opinion: "I think the requisition of the statute sufficiently complied with by the name of the witness being written at the end of the will, and the witness putting his mark thereto. This construction meets the design of the legislature in having the name of the witness, and excluding wills attested only by marks, and does not shut out the attestation of wills by illiterate persons, when a penman can be found to record the transaction. I should come to any other conclusion with regret, as otherwise I should be compelled very frequently to reject wills attested by marksmen, the experience of this office showing the mode of execution to be very common. But, aside from the consequences, I do not think the rule contended for justified by the language of the statute, or consistent with the distinction made between a witness writing his name when he has subscribed the testator's name, and being required in all other cases only to 'sign his name.' I think the record shows a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the statute, and that the deceased should not, by any such slight lapse as is here disclosed, be deprived of the right of testamentary disposition of his property.

Whatever may be our personal views as to the provisions of the law for the distribution of the property of intestates, whether they meet with our approval or otherwise, cannot affect our consideration here. The sole question is whether the testator, in endeavoring to avail himself of the privilege of the law to so dispose of his estate as to meet his own cherished desires, has so far complied with the statute as to make his purpose effectual; and this, I think, he has done, and that the judgment of the lower court should be reversed.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed, in response to which, on January 6, 1896, the following opinion was handed down:

Per Curiam:

The opinion heretofore rendered herein is modified by eliminating from the paragraph preceding the judgment the first and last sentences, so that the same will read: "When a will is proved, every exertion of the court is directed to giving effect to the wishes of the testator therein expressed, but in the proving of the instrument the sole consideration before the court is whether or not the legislative mandates have been complied with." As so amended, the petition for a rehearing is denied.

McFarland, Garoutte, and Van Fleet, JJ., dissent from the order denying the petition for rehearing.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of Michigan
v.
Edward C. GAY.

(.....Mich.....)

There is no unwarranted discrimination against citizens of other states in a statute declaring it to be unlawful for any person to solicit insurance within the state on property within the state for any nonresident persons without procuring from the commissioner of insurance the certificate of authority provided for by the statute.

(December 17, 1896.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County made during the trial of a proceeding against him for the violation of the statute against soliciting insurance for a nonresident without a certificate of authority from the insurance commissioner, which resulted in conviction. Affirmed.

Defendant was soliciting insurance for an association of individuals doing an insurance business under the name of Lloyds, and claimed that the statute under which the conviction was had could not be made applicable to individuals.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank E. Knappen and Myron H. Beach for appellant.

NOTE.—For restrictions on business of foreign insurance companies, see note to State v. Ackerman (Ohio) 24 L. R. A. 298. See also Seamans v. Temple Co. (Mich.) 28 L. R. A. 490, and note thereto, 30 L. R. A.

Mr. E. M. Irish, with Mr. Alfred S. Frost, for appellee:
The statute is valid.

Olney F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Huron Salt & L. Mfg. Co. 81 Mich. 354; People v. Howard, 50 Mich. 289; Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357; Ducat v. Chicago, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972.

A state may extend such restrictions to individuals doing business as individuals.

Greene v. People (Ill.) 21 N. E. Rep. 606; State v. Ackerman, 51 Ohio St. 163, 24 L. R. A. 298; State v. Stone, 118 Mo. 388, 25 L. R. A. 243.

It was not necessary for the people to prove the incorporation or association of the Lloyds.

The subject-matter of the averment lies peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant, and even in criminal cases the people need not prove such an averment.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 79, and cases cited.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By Act No. 74 of the Session Laws of 1893, it was enacted that it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, as agent, solicitor, surveyor, broker, or in any other capacity, to transact, or to aid in any manner, directly or indirectly, in the transacting or soliciting within this state any insurance business for any person, persons, firm, or copartnership who are nonresidents of this state, or for any fire or inland navigation insurance company or association not incorporated by the laws of this state, or acting for or in behalf of any person or persons, firm or copartnership, as agent or broker, or in any other capacity, or procure or assist to procure a fire or inland marine policy or policies of insurance on property situated in this state, for any nonresident person, persons, firm, or co-partnership, or for any company or association, without this state, whether incorporated or not, without the procuring or receiving from the commissioner of insurance the certificate of authority provided for in section 38 of an act entitled "An Act Relative to the Organization of Fire and Marine Insurance Companies Transacting Business within This State," approved April 8, 1869, as amended. Such certificate of authority shall state the name or names of the person, persons, firm, or co-partnership, or the location of the company or association, as the case may be, showing the party named in the certificate has complied with the laws of this state regulating fire and inland navigation insurance, and the name of the duly appointed attorney in this state on whom process may be served. By section 5 of the act of which the above is amendatory, it is provided: "In any suit brought under this act it shall not be necessary to prove the legal incorporation or association of any corporation or association of individuals, the policies of which have been solicited or issued contrary to this act. It shall be sufficient to show that the policy of insurance has been solicited or issued, directly or indirectly, by or through the defendant company or association, not authorized to do business in this state."

Respondent was charged and convicted in the Kalamazoo circuit court of a violation of this act. He has brought the record here for review on exceptions before sentence. While the record contains numerous assignments of error, we have not been favored with any brief on behalf of the respondent. We have, however, looked through the record, and discovered no error. The only question meriting discussion is whether the law in question is unconstitutional. It appears from the defendant's requests that it was contended below that the statute contained an unwarranted discrimination against the citizens of other states. It has been repeatedly held that it is within the power of the state to exclude corporations or other states from doing business in this state, except on such terms as the legislature may see fit to prescribe for the protection of its citizens. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Raymond, 70 Mich. 485; Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. ed. 148. This naturally carries with it the right to prohibit individuals within this state from acting for such inhibited corporations. People v. Howard, 50 Mich. 289; Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357. But it appears to have been insisted below that, while it may be competent to prohibit corporations from doing business within this state, the legislature cannot deny the right to individuals. But an answer to this is that there is no discrimination against individuals of other states under the insurance laws of this state. See State v. Ackerman, 51 Ohio St. 168, 24 L. R. A. 298; State v. Stone, 118 Mo. 388, 25 L. R. A. 248.

Conviction affirmed, and the court is instructed to proceed to sentence.

The other Justices concur.

I. Generally.

The right to attach as it exists in most of the United States is a statutory one, and the question as to what intent to defraud will sustain it is one of the construction of the particular statute conferring the right and the determination as to whether the facts of the case bring it within the statute, and is confined to questions as to the fraudulent contraction of debts, the absconding of the debtor, his removal of his property, and his assignment, disposition, or secretion of property, the question of intent not entering into the right of attachment against nonresidents.

II. Actual as distinguished from constructive fraud

A decided preponderance of authority supports the rule that a mere constructive fraud,—that is a

Bentley*, Ryan & M. 159; Huggins v. Ward, 21 Week. Rep. 914.

If the deed was intended as a mortgage, the act involving no positive wrong, the invalidity of which arises entirely from the provisions of the law,—will not warrant an attachment upon the ground of a disposition of property with intent to defraud.

This is the rule adopted by the principal case, and it was also expressly held in Standard Oil Co. v. Morrison, A. & A. Co. 54 Ill. App. 531 (1894); First Nat. Bank v. Kurtz, 22 Ill. App. 213 (1896); Shove v. Farwell, 9 Ill. App. 256 (1881); Market Nat. Bank v. Bethel, 32 Ohio L. J. 135 (1894); Heidenheimer v. Ogborn, 1 Disney (Ohio) 261 (1857); Chamberlain v. Strong, 3 W. L. G. 231 (1859), as given in Walker & Bates' (Ohio) Dig. 101; National Bank v. Puroell, 8 Rec. 744 (1880), as given in 3 Bates' (Ohio) Dig. 62; Union Rolling Mill Co. v. Packard, 13 Bull. 591, 1 C. C. 76, as given in 4 Bates' (Ohio) Dig. 34.

It is not sufficient, though the actual or even necessary consequence of the act would be to hinder and delay creditors. Heidenheimer v. Ogborn, supra.

The right to attachment is based upon the supposed existence of fraud in fact, and not upon what is merely voidable because against equity and good conscience, sometimes denominated fraud in law. Holbrook v. Peters & M. Co. 8 Wash. 344 (1894) (dictum).

And an actual personal intent to defraud, hinder, and delay creditors is necessary to uphold an attachment. McPike v. Atwell, 34 Kan. 142 (1886); Union Rolling Mill Co. v. Packard, and Shove v. Farwell, supra; Seldentopf v. Annabl, 6 Neb. 524 (1877).

The right to issue an attachment depends entirely upon the fraudulent intent, which must be made to appear, and not upon something inferred from the consequence of the acts stated. Seldentopf v. Annabl, supra.

Thus a conveyance of property in violation of the bankrupt law furnishes no ground for an attachment. Stanley v. Sutherland, 54 Ind. 339 (1876).

And a conveyance without consideration to his wife by a person whose solvency is doubtful, made without intent to defraud creditors, will not sustain an attachment, though it might justify a bill to set aside the conveyance. McFarlan v. Mills, 4 Bull. 1064, as given in 3 Bates' (Ohio) Dig. 62.

And a sale to one creditor without actual fraud, to prevent another creditor from gaining any advantage, does not show a fraudulent intent which will support an attachment. Chamberlain v. Strong, 3 W. L. G. 231 (1859), as given in Walker & Bates' (Ohio) Dig. 101.

So, a transfer of property by an insolvent corporation, by which a preference is given to one creditor over others, is not such a fraud in fact as to afford ground for an attachment at the instance of an unpreferred creditor. Holbrook v. Peters & M. Co. 8 Wash. 344 (1894).

And the mere fact that the debtor converted his business house into a corporation, and transferred to the corporation the assets of his business, will not sustain such an attachment without evidence of fraudulent intent. Union Rolling Mill Co. v. Packard, 13 Bull. 591, 1 C. C. 76, as given in Bates' (Ohio) Dig. 215.

Nor will a transfer by a limited partnership of the effects of the firm in payment of a valid debt with intent to give preference to a creditor, in violation of Maryland Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 73, § 15, making such transfer void as to creditors, warrant an attachment under the New York Code, on the ground that they have assigned, disposed of, or secreted, their property with intent to defraud their creditors. Casola v. Vasquez, 147 N. Y. 259 (1895).

And a surviving partner who in good faith and with the acquiescence of the representative of the deceased partner uses the firm property to continue the business on his own account and in his own name, and raises money upon the credit given him by the possession of such property, and finally disposes of it, is not subject to attachment upon the ground of a disposal with intent to defraud, in the absence of circumstances showing such an actual intention, though a part may have been applied to the payment of his individual obligations. Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, 108 U. S. 648, 27 L. ed. 211 (1882).

So, selling by a mortgagor from the stock of goods mortgaged, in the ordinary course of business, with the knowledge and implied consent of the mortgagee, is a constructive fraud only, where there is no fraudulent intent in fact on the part of the mortgagor, and is not ground for an attachment against him. Rhode v. Matthal, 35 Ill. App. 147 (1889).

And a chattel mortgage containing a stipulation for the retention of possession by the mortgagor of the mortgaged property and possession so retained pursuant to the terms thereof, is not per se fraudulent or prima facie evidence of a fraudulent intent which will support an attachment, where the mortgage was duly filed and there is nothing to indicate an actual intent to defraud. Frankhouser v. Ellett, 22 Kan. 127, 31 Am. Rep. 171 (1879).

And a sale under a chattel mortgage which in fact hinders and delays creditors does not warrant an attachment under the Illinois statute on the ground that such sale is fraudulent in law, in the absence of a corrupt intent in making the mortgage. Lafin v. Central Pub. House, 53 Ill. 432 (1869).

So, an assignment for the benefit of creditors, which is fraudulent at law and void on its face as hindering or delaying creditors, will not justify an attachment in the absence of a showing of actual intent to defraud. Belmont v. Lane, 22 How. Pr. 325 (1862) (dictum).

And an assignment for the benefit of creditors, which is invalid by reason of noncompliance with the statute, does not constitute an assignment or disposition of the debtor's property with intent to defraud creditors, which will support an attachment. First Nat. Bank v. Rosenfeld, 66 Wis. 292 (1886).

So, an assignment for the benefit of creditors, ex-fact that Jane Druley came into court and claimed absolute title under the deed from William is conclusive of her intent to defraud plaintiff, and will disentitle her to any rights under the deed.

Barker v. French, 18 Vt. 460; Foster v. Grigsby, 1 Bush, 86; Thompson v. Pennell, 67 Me. 159; Metropolitan Bank v. Godfrey, 23 Ill. 579; Larmon v. Knight, 140 Ill. 232; Jones v. Neely, 72 Ill. 449; Mackie v. Cairns, Hopk. Ch. 378.

The instruction to find for the defendant on the attachment issue was error.

It is only when the evidence, with all the inferences that can justifiably be drawn from it, is so sufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff that it would be the duty of the court to set such a verdict aside, that the court can direct a verdict for defendant.

executed in good faith and without any wrongful intent, but which is so defectively executed as to render it void, does not authorize an attachment as a disposal of property with intent to defraud creditors. Cooper v. Clark, 44 Kan. 358 (1890); McPike v. Atwell, 34 Kan. 142 (1885); Harris v. Capell, 28 Kan. 117 (1882).

And an assignment for the benefit of creditors, regular on its face, made in an attempt under the advice of counsel to divide equitably all of the debtor's property among his creditors, cannot be held to be a disposition of property with intent to defraud creditors, though the assignment is void. Wearne v. France, 3 Wyo. 278 (1890).

But the act which constitutes the constructive fraud may be such as to justify an inference of a fraudulent intent which will support an attachment.

An actual fraud, as distinguished from a constructive one, is necessary to sustain an attachment, but this arises when the acts done create as a logical sequence results that are not fairly or reasonably consistent with an honest purpose. Seckendorf v. Ketcham, 67 How. Pr. 626 (1884).

Acts conceded to be fraudulent should not be declared by the court insufficient to establish a fraudulent intent which will sustain an attachment as a matter of law, if they were acts which the jury should consider and act upon. Main v. Lynch, 54 Md. 658 (1890). See also Kipling v. Corbin, 66 How. Pr. 12 (1883), infra, VI. a. The intent to defraud.

Thus, an assignment by a debtor to a creditor for the sale of the property, and a return of the balance after satisfaction of the creditor's claim to the debtor, is fraudulent and void, and contains in itself evidence of a fraudulent intent upon which an attachment may be issued. Sels v. Evans, 6 Ill. App. 466 (1890).

And an assignment for the benefit of creditors, containing provisions preferring members of the debtor's firm and giving the assignee power to sell upon credit, though a fraud in law as distinguished from an actual fraud, warrants the inference of the existence of such a fraudulent intent as will support an attachment. Ryhiner v. Ruegger, 19 Ill. App. 157 (1890).

So, the constructive fraud evidenced by an assignment by a partner of partnership property for the payment of firm and individual debts without providing that the firm debts shall be first paid, is sufficient to justify an inference of fraudulent intent which will support an attachment. Friend v. Michaelis, 15 Abb. N. C. 364 (1885).

In Friend v. Michaelis, supra, Milliken v. Dart, 26 Hun. 24 (1881), infra, VI. f. Assignments for the benefit of creditors, was limited and distinguished as belonging to a class of cases in which no positive wrongdoing was involved, the invalidity arising wholly from the provision of the law; and the court said that the ruling should be restricted to such cases.

which partnership property is appropriated to the payment of individual debts of a partner, will support an attachment upon the ground of a disposal of property so as to hinder and delay creditors, though the fraud charged is one in law, and not in fact. Keith v. Fink, 47 Ill. 272 (1868).

The courts of several of the states, however, among which are Maryland, Florida, and the District of Columbia, have adopted the opposite doctrine,—that mere constructive fraud is sufficient to justify an attachment.

Thus, a conveyance which by its terms operates to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, will be presumed to have been intended to so operate, and will sustain an attachment. Whedbee v. Stewart, 40 Md. 414 (1874); Farrow v. Hayes, 51 Md. 498 (1879).

And an assignment in trust to sell the assigned property and pay releasing creditors out of the proceeds, and return the surplus, if any, to the grantor, operates to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, and is fraudulent, and the intent to defraud, upon which an attachment may be issued, will be imputed to the assignor, and parol evidence is not admissible to show a different intent. Farrow v. Hayes, supra.

So, in Cissell v. Johnston, 23 Wash. L. Rep. 730 (1894), it was held that an attachment upon the ground that the debtor has assigned, disposed of, and secreted his property with intent to delay and defraud his creditors will lie for fraud in law in case of an assignment by insolvent debtors, though there was no fraud in fact or actual fraud.

And the fact that a mortgagor of a stock of goods is permitted to remain in possession and continue to sell and dispose of them in the ordinary course of business amounts to a conveyance to the use of the grantor, and is fraudulent per se and a ground for attachment, even when the act is entirely unconnected with any intentional fraud. Eckman v. Munterlyn, 33 Fla. 367 (1893).

So, under statutes like those of Missouri and New Mexico, providing for an attachment for a disposition of property so as to defraud creditors, constructive fraud is sufficient to warrant its issuance, no intent to defraud being necessary.

Thus, the element of intention is not embraced in the ground of attachment that the debtor has fraudulently sold or removed or disposed of his property so as to hinder or delay creditors. Noyes v. Cunningham, 51 Mo. App. 194 (1892); Potter v. McDowell, 81 Mo. 68 (1890); Douglass v. Cissna, 17 Mo. App. 44 (1885).

A conveyance which is fraudulent at law and void as to existing creditors warrants an attachment under the Missouri statute, regardless of the motives or intention of the debtor. Farmers' & M. Bank v. Price, 41 Mo. App. 291 (1890); Kritzer v. Smith, 21 Mo. 296 (1855).

And an act done by a debtor, which is fraudulent in law because it hinders and delays creditors, will support an attachment under the Missouri statute

The deed was fraudulent as to William's creditors.

If the deed, which was absolute on its face, was intended by the parties to be a mere mortgage, it will be conclusively presumed to have been made with intent to defraud, binder, and delay the grantor's creditors.

Watkins*, 7 Watts & S. 219; Connelly v. Walker, 45 Pa. 449.

When a conveyance by its terms operates to though it may not defraud the creditor in fact. Kellog v. Richardson, 19 Fed. Rep. 70 (1888).

The term "fraud," as understood in the Missouri statute concerning fraudulent conveyances, has the same meaning in the attachment law, and it is not necessary to show that the act originated in any meditated design to commit a positive fraud to injure others. Reed v. Pelletier, 28 Mo. 173 (1860) (dictum).

Whatever is denounced as fraud by the judgment of the law must be regarded in the same light with reference to an act or transaction which is made the ground of an attachment, and if the act charged to have been committed is fraudulent, actual or constructive, it will be inferred that the party intended its natural and ordinary results.

Ibid.

Thus, an assignment for the benefit of creditors which is fraudulent in and of itself as matter of law is a fraudulent conveyance within the meaning of the provision of such an act. Douglas v. Chesna, 17 Mo. App. 44 (1886); Leitensdorfer v. Webb, 1 N. M. 34 (1853).

And an assignment for the benefit of certain preferred creditors, made without presenting a petition to any court or judge and without any schedule of debts or creditors, and without the sanction of any court of sessions or service of any citation of creditors, as required by law in New Mexico, is fraudulent in law, and will support an attachment as a disposal of property so as to defraud creditors. Leitensdorfer v. Webb, supra.

And a mortgage by a tradesman of his entire stock of goods, of which he is permitted to continue in possession and to sell and dispose of in the usual course of his business, is fraudulent in law and furnishes ground for an attachment under the Missouri statute, though it was made to secure a bona fide debt. Sauer v. Behr, 49 Mo. App. 86 (1892); Reed v. Pelletier, supra.

III. Fraudulent contraction of debts.

The statutes of some of the states provide for an attachment upon the ground that the debt thereby sought to be collected was fraudulently contracted.

Under such statutes false representations made by a debtor as to his solvency, by which he obtains credit, are sufficient to sustain an attachment in an action brought by a creditor by whom the credit is given. First Nat. Bank v. Rosenfeld, 66 Wis. 232 (1886).

So the contraction of a debt with the preconceived intention not to pay it is fraudulent within the meaning of the Missouri statute, defining the ground of attachment. Blackwell v. Fry, 49 Mo. App. 638 (1892).

And the purchase of property by one who is practically insolvent, who for the purpose of obtaining credit makes exaggerated statements as to his solvency, stating the purpose for which he wanted the property, but disposes of it in payment of debts made after its receipt, together with other suspicious circumstances, authorizes the assertion that he did not intend to pay for it, and is sufficient to support an attachment. Cole Mfg. Co. v. Jenkins, 47 Mo. App. 664 (1890).

But to sustain an attachment on the ground that the debt was fraudulently contracted, it must be shown that the debtor intended to defraud the creditor. Hughes v. Lake, 63 Miss. 552 (1886).

And to support an attachment upon the ground that a debt was contracted for property obtained under false pretenses, it must be shown that there was an intent on the part of the debtor to cheat or defraud at the time the debt was contracted or property obtained, and some false pretense must have been designedly used for that purpose and the fraud accomplished by means thereof, or it must have had such an effect that without it the defrauded party would not have parted with his money or property. Wyman v. Wilwarth, 1 S. D. 172 (1890).

So, statements made by a debtor through an agent, on which credit was given him, though false, will not support an attachment where they were not communicated to the creditor by the authority or with the knowledge of the debtor, and were not made with the intention of influencing and inducing the creditor to part with his property. Lodge v. Rose Valley Mills, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 667, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 811 (1892).

And an attachment will not lie under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 398, providing therefor, when the debt was fraudulently contracted, for the wrongful conversion of personal property, though possession was obtained with intent to convert it. Finlay v. Bryson, 84 Mo. 664 (1884).

Proof that a debt was fraudulently contracted, however, will not support an attachment upon the ground that the debtor had assigned, disposed of, or concealed his property with intent to defraud creditors. Dellone v. Hull, 47 Md. 112 (1877); Johnson v. Buckel, 65 Hun, 601 (1892); Wittner v. Von Minden, 27 Hun, 234 (1892).

In the absence of evidence of a fraudulent appropriation of his property by the debtor with such intent. Johnson v. Buckel, supra.

Thus, procuring a loan by fraudulent representations is not a ground for an attachment under the Ohio statute providing therefor, where the debtor has sold, conveyed, or otherwise disposed of his property with the fraudulent intent to cheat and defraud creditors, or is about to make such sale with like intent. Stone v. Bank, 1 Ohio Dec. 369 (1894).

And an attachment will not be granted upon the ground that the debtor has disposed of his property with intent to defraud his creditors on proof of misrepresentations as to his solvency and ownership of property, where there was a failure of proof of fraudulent appropriation and that the debtor had property as represented. Kibbe v. Herman, 51 Hun, 438 (1899).

hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, the law presumes the intent to do so.

Sims v. Gaines, 64 Ala. 392; McKibbin v. Martin, 64 Pa. 352, 3 Am. Rep. 588; Harris v. Sumner, 2 Pick. 129; Holmes v. Marshall, 78 N. C. 262; Chenery v. Palmer, 6 Cal. 119, 65 Am. Dec. 493; Briggs v. Mitchell, 60 Barb. 288; Lukins v. Aird, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 78, 18 L. ed. 750; Emerson v. Bemis, 69 Ill. 537; Ryhiner v. Ruegger, 19 Ill. App. 156; Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 9; Bump, Fraud. Conv. 8d ed. 362, 579, 603, 604; Metropolitan Bank v. Godfrey, 23 Ill. 579.

The fraudulent conveyance will be wholly set aside, and will not stand as security even.

Harris v. Sumner, 2 Pick. 129; Metropolitan

Nor will an assignment for creditors be deemed to have been made with intent to defraud creditors so as to support an attachment because the debtor had previously fraudulently contracted debts, unless some connection between such debts and the assignment appears. Strauss v. Rose, 59 Md. 525 (1882).

And a preferential assignment will not be deemed a disposition of property with intent to defraud which will support an attachment merely because shortly before its execution the debtor purchased goods upon credit which had not expired at the time of the assignment, for which he had no reason to suppose he would be able to pay. Talcott v. Roenthal, 22 Hun, 573 (1880).

So, false pretenses by a debtor as to his solvency, by which he obtained goods on credit, followed by a general assignment with preferences made a few days later, do not establish a disposition of his property with intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment in a suit by the vendor of the goods. Tim v. Smith, 13 Abb. N. C. 81 (1883); Achelis v. Kalman, 60 How. Pr. 491 (1861).

Though they would justify an arrest. Achelis v. Kalman, supra.

And false representations made by a debtor for the purpose of obtaining a large amount of goods on credit, followed by an assignment made six months afterwards, will not justify an attachment upon the ground of a disposition of property with intent to defraud, where all the property in the debtor's possession was assigned and there was nothing to show that he had previously made a dishonest use of it. Place v. Miller, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 178 (1869).

So, false statements as to a debtor's financial condition, made for the purpose of obtaining goods on credit, and the confession of judgments within three months thereafter to an amount largely in excess of what he represented to be his indebtedness, will not sustain an attachment upon that ground. Strasburger v. Bachrach, 38 N. Y. S. R. 1008 (1891).

And false representations by a debtor that he was perfectly solvent and owed only to the amount of $2,000, followed by an offer of judgment for $6,000 to his son, which was accepted and an execution issued under which his whole stock in trade was levied upon, does not warrant an attachment where the indebtedness to the son was not impeached and nothing more was done than the law allows in securing the payment of a just debt. Stein v. Levy, 55 Hun, 381 (1890).

But the fraudulent contraction of a debt, when considered in connection with other facts, may constitute one of the elements of a case of fraudulent intent upon which an attachment may be granted.

The manner in which a debtor recently obtained goods from his creditors, as well as the manner in which he disposed of them, is admissible in evidence to prove his intent in making such disposal to sustain an attachment. Gray v. St. John, 35 Ill. 223 (1864).

An absolute conveyance or transfer of property, with a secret understanding between the parties reserving an interest to the grantor, is fraudulent and void as to his creditors.

Whenever the effect of a particular transaction is to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, the law conclusively presumes the intent.

Thus, proof that a debt was fraudulently contracted, and that the debtor was engaged in putting all of his property out of his hands and proposed to refuse payment of his obligations pursuant to a plan determined upon before the debt was contracted, and his failure to deny such facts when charged therewith, make out a prima facie case of fraudulent design which will sustain an attachment. Blake v. Bernhard, 8 Hun, 397 (1875).

And positive testimony that possession of the creditor's goods was obtained by the debtor by false statements, and that their whereabouts were concealed, and of the debtor's refusal to consummate an agreement with the creditor which would have been to his interest to fulfil had he intended to continue his business and pay his debts, will support an attachment upon the ground that he had disposed of or secreted property with intent to defraud his creditors. Weiller v. Schreiber, 68 How. Pr. 491, 11 Abb. N. C. 175 (1882).

And proof that a large amount of goods were purchased shortly before the failure of the debtor and not paid for, and that judgments were confessed to preferred creditors and preferences made in favor of the debtor's wife and near relatives, exceeding the value of the assets transferred in the assignment in amount, sufficiently indicates a fraudulent intention in making the assignment to uphold an attachment. Hamburger v. Moeller, 4 N. Y. S. R. 447 (1886).

So, purchases to a large amount for which the purchaser gives his check, which is dishonored, and the disposal by him of a large amount of money in a clandestine manner, and the transfer of a large sum to his lawyer and friend, are sufficient to uphold an attachment upon the ground of a disposal of property to defraud creditors, in the absence of any excuse for not making his bank account good. Greenleaf v. Mumford, 19 Abb. Pr. 469, 80 How. Pr. 30 (1869).

And an attachment on the ground that the debtor has disposed of property with intent to defraud his creditors is justified on proof of an agreement of a stockholder of a corporation to pay an assessment upon his stock, provided the corporation would give him its check for an equal amount in payment of an indebtedness due him, the proceeds of which he agreed to apply in payment of his own and the delivery of such check to the stockholder, who collected it and used the proceeds for other purposes, and stopped payment of his own check. Wildman v. Van Gelder, 60 Hun, 443, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 143 (1891).

So, the purchase of goods on credit by a debtor, who conveys the false impression that a wealthy brother is a member of the firm, and immediately thereafter giving a chattel mortgage to a bank and confessing judgment to it, and riding a long

If the deed was fraudulent per se as to the creditors of William Druley, the attachment should have been sustained.

If, by reason of the facts and circumstances attendant on the execution of the deed, the law would hold the deed void as to the grantor's creditors and raise a conclusive presumption of intention on the grantor's part to defraud his creditors by its execution, then there was ground for the attachment.

Ryhiner v. Ruegger, 19 Ill. App. 156; Sels v. Evans, 6 Ill. App. 466; Rigor v. Simmons, 47 Ill. App. 428; Douglass v. Cissna, 17 Mo. App. 44; Reed v. Pelletier, 28 Mo. 173; Potter v. McDowell, 81 Mo. 62; Adams v. Paige, 7 Pick. 542; Bernard v. Barney Myrolem, Co.

distance and confessing judgments to a brother, and causing executions to be issued thereon and immediately levied, in connection with requests for time and statements that all judgments would be paid as they matured, and a subsequent sending away of large quantities of goods,—are sufficient prima facie to sustain an attachment. Jaffray v. Nast, 33 N. Y. S. R. 250 (1890).

IV. Against absconding debtors.

The New York Code, and the Codes and statutes of some of the other states, provide for an attachment where the debtor has departed from the state with intent to defraud his creditors or to avoid the service of a summons, or keeps himself secreted therein with a like intent.

The general rule is that an intent to defraud creditors is not necessary to sustain an attachment upon the ground that the debtor has concealed himself to avoid service of process. Young v. Nelson, 25 Ill. 565 (1861); Morgan v. Avery, 7 Barb. 656 (1850).

Proof that a debtor has absconded, however, will not justify an attachment where it does not show that he had left the state and the intent with which he left. Decker v. Bryant, 7 Barb. 182 (1849).

And that a debtor is absent so that the ordinary process of law cannot be served on him is held to be insufficient in North Carolina to support an attachment, where there is nothing to show that such absence was with intent to defraud creditors. Love v. Young, 60 N. C. 65 (1873).

But proof of intent is necessary when the attachment is sought on the charge that the debtor has absconded with intent to defraud his creditors.

Thus, an attachment will not lie because the debtor is about to dispose of his property and leave the state, in the absence of anything to show that he intended to do so for the purpose of defrauding his creditors. Heriz v. Stuart, 3 N. Y. Week. Dig. 332 (1876).

And proof of inquiry at the late residence of the debtor, and that the inquirer was informed that the debtor had left the state and was not in the county, will not support an attachment in the absence of evidence of facts showing an intent to defraud creditors. Ex parte Robinson, 21 Wend. 672 (1840).

Whether a debtor has withdrawn himself from his creditors with intent to elude process and evade their demands, is a question of fact to be submitted to the jury. Fitch v. Waite, 5 Conn. 117 (1823).

And the proof which will warrant an attachment should be such as would warrant no other conclusion than that of a dishonest purpose.

Thus, one who departs from his usual residence, or remains absent therefrom, or conceals himself so that he cannot be served with process, with intent to delay or defraud his creditors, is an absconding debtor within the attachment law; but if he departs from the state or from his usual abode with intention of returning, and without a fraudulent design, an attachment will not lie. Fitch v. Waite, supra.

And a departure by a debtor openly to another place within the state, where he works openly at his trade, is not a withdrawing himself from his creditors with intent to evade their demands which will support an attachment. Ibid.

And an attachment will not issue upon the ground that the debtor had departed from the state with intent to defraud his creditors or to avoid arrest, where his departure and its object were notoriously known. Re Chipman, 1 Wend. 66 (1823).

So, proof that a debtor had left with the intent not to return, and secretly and without the knowledge of his family, is not alone sufficient to warrant an attachment upon the ground that he had left with intent to defraud his creditors. Kelly v. Archer, 45 Barb. 63 (1866).

And a departure from the state with intent to defraud, which will sustain an attachment, is not established by proof that the debtor had transferred his farm to his wife and gone west, and that he intended to leave the place at which he resided and settle in Dakota. Taylor v. Hull, 56 Hun, 90 (1890).

And refusal by a debtor to recognize a creditor's demand as a binding obligation, and a proposal that if he could sell his real estate for a specified price he would remove from the state and go into the cattle business, does not show an intent to defraud which will support an attachment. Hunter v. Soward, 15 Neb. 215 (1888).

So, proof that a debtor residing in the city of New York is absent therefrom or concealed therein, and is an absconding or concealed debtor and cannot be found, will not sustain an attachment under the provision of the New York Code which authorizes it where the debtor has departed from the state with intent to defraud his creditors or avoid the service of civil process. Castellanos v. Jones, 5 N. Y. 164 (1851).

It is not necessary, however, that a debtor should actually leave the state to entitle a creditor to an attachment under the Maryland statute, where he absconds or flees from justice or removes from his usual place of residence with intent to avoid the payment of his debts or to defraud his creditors. Stouffer v. Niple, 40 Md. 477 (1874).

And very strong circumstantial evidence, with some positive testimony, as to a debtor's fraudulent intent, is sufficient to sustain an attachment on motion to dissolve, as against evidence that the debtor had declared the object of his departure to be to collect debts, and had left his family at home, and that his return was expected. Gibson v. McLaughlin, 1 Browne (Pa.) 332 (1871).

So, in Fulton v. Heaton, 1 Barb. 652 (1847), an attachment upon the ground that the debtor was about to depart from the county with intent to defraud his creditors was upheld on proof that he refused to pay the attaching creditor and told a third party that he was going to Canada, and thus Kellogg v. Richardson, 19 Fed. Rep. 70; Burgert v. Rorchert, 59 Mo. 80; Bigelow v. Stringer, 40 Mo. 195.

The giving of a mortgage purporting to be given for a greater sum than was really due is fraudulent as to creditors, and will sustain an attachment.

Rice v. Morner, 64 Wis. 599; Butts v. Peacock, 28 Wis. 359; Sims v. Gaines, 64 Ala. 392; Coolidge v. Melvin, 42 N. H. 510; Ryhiner v. Ruegger, 19 Ill. App. 156; Metropolitan Bank v. Godfrey, 23 Ill. 579; Whedbee v. Stewart, 40 Md. 424.

From the use of the word "intent" it does he was about to take all of his property with him.

And that a debtor had left his home and place of business to go to an adjacent county for a legitimate purpose which would have required but two or three days, and had been absent about six weeks, and that after diligent search it was learned that he had gone west, but where or for what purpose could not be ascertained, and that he was considerably indebted, are sufficient to confer jurisdiction to issue an attachment upon that ground. Van Alstyne v. Erwine, 11 N. Y. 381 (1854).

And that a debtor had failed to pay the rent and water tax due under a lease executed by him, and failed to pay a promissory note, and disposed of his interest in the lease and fixtures of the demised premises, and met requests for payments with evasive answers, and stated that within three days he was to leave the state and take his property to another state, refusing to settle or state when he would pay,—justify an inference that he intended to depart from the state with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, for which an attachment will be allowed. Stevens v. Middleton, 26 Hun, 470 (1882).

So, proof that the debtor had left the city and his business without leaving any one to take charge of it, and that his bookkeeper stated upon inquiry as to his whereabouts that he had left the state taking what amount of money he could raise, and did not intend to return, warrant an attachment upon the ground that he had left the state with intent to defraud creditors. Deimel v. Scheveland, 16 Daly, 38 (1890).

And proof that a debtor had left the county suddenly and clandestinely, and had subsequently sent back and employed help to assist him in the removal of his household goods to a railroad station in order to have them shipped to Boston, warrant the issue of an attachment upon that ground, in the absence of counter affidavits. Patterson v. Delaney, 37 N. Y. S. R. 585 (1891).

And an attachment on the ground that the debtor had gone away with intent to avoid the service of a summons is justified by proof that he had gone away and was in an embarrassed position, and attempted to borrow money immediately before his departure, and confessed his inability to meet his payments, and had taken pains not to disclose his intention to go away to any of his creditors, and that his confidential clerk called a meeting of his creditors within twenty-four hours after his departure. Morgan v. Avery, 7 Barb. 666 (1850).

So, evidence that a debtor, who was the proprietor of a line of stages, had sold his stages and horses and broke up his business and departed from or kept concealed in the city, and that his goods were sold for nonpayment of rent, and that it was generally understood and believed that he was keeping out of the way to avoid creditors,—is sufficient to confer jurisdiction to issue an attachment upon the ground that he had departed from the state or kept concealed in it with intent to defraud creditors. Re Fulkner, 4 Hill, 508 (1843).

And evidence that an insolvent debtor had sold his stock of goods to his clerk wholly on credit, and that he settled nearly all of his accounts and received payment therefor, and had gone away stating that he was going to Kansas, and had not been seen since, and that the clerk stated that he did not know where he had gone or when he would return, if at all,—is sufficient to support an attachment upon the ground of a departure from the state with intent to defraud creditors. Furman v. Walter, 13 How. Pr. 348 (1856).

And proof that one largely indebted absconded, and that he was in possession of personal property worth $8,000 or $10,000 immediately before, and that he had transferred property, and that his wife had since been trying to sell the same property,—establishes prima facie the fraudulent intent necessary to sustain an attachment. Sickles v. Sullivan, 5 Hun, 569 (1875).

And proof of the purchase of goods to be paid for a few weeks later upon the fraudulent representation that the purchaser was in the habit of purchasing for cash and that his stock was fully paid for, when at the time he was indebted for more than the value of his property, and that, a short time after, he left the county on pretense of a few days' absence and had not returned, and that a clerk in the meantime was disposing of his stock in trade and refusing to apply anything upon his indebtedness,—authorizes the issue of an attachment upon the ground that he had departed from the county and state with intent to defraud his creditors. Schoonmaker v. Spencer, 54 N. Y. 366 (1872).

So, an attachment upon the ground that the debtor had left the state with intent to avoid the service of process, or to defraud his creditors, is sustained by proof that he had gone away without the knowledge of his neighbors, and that he had been called upon to account as executor but had absconded and been removed from his trust, and that his wife, after receiving a letter from him, refused to tell his whereabouts to creditors, but told her sister that he was in Canada. Buell v. VanCamp, 28 N. Y. S. R. 907 (1889), affirmed on the question of the sufficiency of the affidavit, in 119 N. Y. 160 (1890).

Where one of two partners has left the state with intent to defraud his creditors or avoid the service of a summons, an attachment can issue on that ground against him only, and not against the other partner, where he remains in the state and continues to carry on his business. Bogart v. Dart, 25 Hun, 326 (1881).

But a departure of one or more of several defendants from the state with intent to defraud creditors will sustain an attachment, under Ky. Civ. Code, § 221, against the property of all of them. Mills v. Brown, 2 Met. (Ky.) 405 (1859).

V. For removal of property.

removal of property from the state or a removal from the state without leaving sufficient to pay debts, while the other gives it when the debtor has removed or is about to remove his property from the state with intent to defraud creditors.

The rule supported by a preponderance of authority is that it is not necessary that fraud or a purpose to defraud or injure the creditor should enter into a removal of or purpose to remove property upon which an attachment is sought under a statute providing therefor, where the debtor has removed or is about to remove his property out of the state. Friedlander v. Pollock, 5 Coldw. 490 (1868).

And that no intent to cheat, hinder, or defraud creditors is necessary to sustain an attachment on the ground that the debtor is removing or proposes to remove his property beyond the state without leaving sufficient to pay his debts. Durr v. Hervey, 44 Ark. 301, 51 Am. Rep. 594 (1884); Goodbar v. Bailey, 57 Ark. 611 (1896); Sherrill v. Fay, 14 Iowa, 202 (1862); Branch of State Bank of Iowa v. White, 12 Iowa, 141 (1861); Stephenson v. Sloan, 65 Miss. 407 (1888); Mack v. McDaniel, 2 McCrary, 128 (1880).

In Durr v. Hervey, supra, Rice v. Pertuis, 40 Ark. 157 (1882), infra, this section, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the attachment was for a debt not yet due, which was issued under Gantt's (Ark.) Dig. § 437, requiring in terms the averment of fraud.

Thus an attachment will lie against one who is removing or about to remove his property out of the state, not leaving sufficient remaining to satisfy all of his debts, under Mansf. (Ark.) Dig. § 309, subd. 6, authorizing an attachment therefor, though such removal is made with the intent to sell the property and apply the proceeds to the payment of a bona fide debt. Goodbar v. Bailey, supra.

But an attachment will not lie under the Mississippi statute on the ground that a debtor has taken property from the state with intent to defraud or to remove it from the reach of creditors, where he has in his possession property of a permanent character subject to execution, of sufficient value to pay all his liabilities, which he does not intend to remove. Montague v. Gaddis, 37 Miss. 458 (1855).

But some of the cases have insisted upon the necessity of an intent to defraud, though the statute does not expressly require it.

Thus, the removal of property by a debtor from the state, where there is no bad intent and the amount of property removed is small as compared with what is left, and the debtor is solvent, and the collection of the debt is not endangered, though within the letter of the Florida statute authorizing an attachment whenever the debtor is actually removing his property out of the state, is not within its spirit, and will not sustain an attachment. Haber v. Nassitta, 12 Fla. 569 (1868).

And an attachment issued upon the ground that the debtor is about to remove his property out of the jurisdiction without paying his debts cannot be sustained if the evidence fails to show that he was not acting in good faith but with the intention of defrauding his creditors. Hoes v. Williams, 24 La. Ann. 568 (1872).

So, in Vandevort v. Fanning, 10 Iowa, 589 (1869), it was held that the fact that a debtor is about to dispose of his property or carry the same out of the state without leaving sufficient remaining for the payment of his debts will not warrant an attachment, where there is nothing to show that such removal or disposal will be made with intent to defraud his creditors.

But see subsequent Iowa cases cited supra.

Under the other class of statutes the intent to defraud is essential. This was held of the Nebraska statute in Steele v. Dodd, 14 Neb. 496 (1883).

And in Montgomery v. Tilley, 1 B. Mon. 155 (1840), it was held that a removal of property from the state which will support an attachment under Ky. act 1838, § 3, must have been with fraudulent intent, or its effect must be to cheat, hinder, delay, or defraud creditors in the collection of their debts.

A fraudulent intention on the part of a debtor to remove his property out of the commonwealth alone gives jurisdiction to the court of equity under the Kentucky statute empowering it to attach property and to arrest its removal on the establishment of the intent to remove it, where the demand is purely legal. Farmer v. Bascom, 9 B. Mon. 23 (1845).

So, the shipping of cotton by a debtor out of the state to a creditor in another state in payment of a bona fide debt will not sustain an attachment under the provision of the Arkansas statute, authorizing an attachment where the debtor is about to remove his property from the state with intent to defraud his creditors, where no fraudulent intent is shown. Rice v. Pertuis, 40 Ark. 157 (1882).

And the temporary removal by a debtor of part of his property from the state will not support an attachment upon the ground of the removal of property with intent to defraud creditors, where no actual intent to defraud existed, though such removal had the actual effect of hindering or delaying them. Montgomery v. Tilley, supra.

So, the evidence of intention necessary to sustain an attachment on this ground, like that in case of an absconding debtor, must be of such a character as to justify no other conclusion than that of a dishonest purpose.

Thus, the removal by a debtor of a part of his stock of goods to another town in the same county to be sold or traded there does not of itself show a fraudulent intent which will support an attachment. Mack v. Jones, 31 Fed. Rep. 139 (1837).

And that a debtor is about to remove his stock of goods from the state will not support an attachment upon the ground that he is about to remove his property with intent to defraud his creditors, where he has $10,000 worth of unencumbered real estate within the state. Wrompelmier v. Moses, 3 Bart. 467 (1874).

Clement*, 9 Colo. 1; Leadman v. Harris, 3 Dev. L. 144; Hardy v. Simpson, 13 Ired. L. 132.

And the payment to a debtor of moneys held by a third person for him after the dissolution of an attachment against him and before the issue of a second attachment, is wholly insufficient as evidence of an intention of the debtor to remove his property for fraudulent purposes to support the second attachment. Stow v. Stacy, 30 N. Y. S. R. 308 (1890).

So, that a debtor was on his way down the Wisconsin river to a southern market with a raft of lumber which he was removing out of the territory and which was all the property that he owned, does not authorize an attachment upon the ground that he is about fraudulently to remove his property to hinder and delay his creditors, where that use of his property was the only one by which it could be of any value, and was in strict conformity to usages and customs of the business. Hurd v. Jarvis, 1 Pinney, 475 (1844).

And proof that a debtor closed up his place of business and commenced packing up his goods and continued to do so until midnight, and that his store was closed on the next morning, and that on the preceding day he removed his family without informing any one, will not support an attachment upon the ground that he was about to remove his property with intent to defraud creditors. Mott v. Lawrence, 9 Abb. Pr. 156, 17 How. Pr. 559 (1859).

And proof of a statement by a member of a firm that he intended to leave the state and would dispose of the property of the partnership if he could find any one to take it, and any creditor who did not know enough to take care of himself must get what he could, will not support an attachment upon that ground, where neither the time, the place, nor the individual who made the statement, is shown. Skiff v. Stewart, 39 How. Pr. 385 (1866).

But an admission by a partner that his copartner in the debtor firm had absconded to another state and taken most of the means of the firm with him is sufficient to warrant an attachment against the firm upon the ground of its removal of its goods beyond the state to defraud creditors, where no effort was made by the one partner to prevent the other from taking the partnership assets. Bryant v. Simoneau, 51 Ill. 324 (1890).

So, the failure of a debtor to pay debts, and the giving of conveyances, putting off of payments indefinitely, and the sale of his property with the statement that he is about to leave the state and take his property with him, justify an inference of fraudulent intent which will support an attachment. Stevens v. Middleton, 14 N. Y. Week. Dig. 126 (1882).

And the taking of his stock of goods from the rear of his store by a debtor at night, and sending them from a point where there was a station on the railroad beyond another station nearer by to be shipped, are sufficient to support an attachment upon the ground of the fraudulent concealment of property for the purpose of delaying and defrauding creditors. Bryant v. Simoneau, supra.

And stoppage of business, and insolvency, though not necessarily evidence of an intent to defraud, will justify an attachment when taken in connection with the removal of the property, consisting of machinery, from the factory, in which it could only be used to advantage and be of much value. McTaggart v. Putnam Corset Co. 29 N. Y. S. R. 552 (1890).

The term "about," as used in the Mississippi statute providing for attachment where the debtor is about to remove himself or property from the state or to dispose of property with intent to defraud, means that such act will soon occur, but does not mean that it must be done within any definite space of time, as an hour, a day, a week, a month, etc. Myers v. Farrell, 47 Miss. 281 (1872).

VI. For assignment, disposal, or secretion of property.

a. The intent to defraud.

The provision on this subject found in the Codes and statutes of most of the states authorizes an attachment when the debtor has assigned, disposed of, or secreted, or is about to assign, dispose of, or secrete, property with intent to defraud his creditors.

Under such statutes the existence of the intent to defraud would appear to be essential. See supra, II., Actual as distinguished from constructive fraud.

Neither indebtedness nor insolvency, alone, will justify the issue of an attachment. Marx Bros. v. Leinkauff, 93 Ala. 458 (1890); Clarke v. Seaton, 18 B. Mon. 230 (1857).

And while a belief upon the part of the creditor in the existence of a fraudulent intent, based upon proper grounds, would authorize the issuance of an attachment, it is not usually regarded as sufficient to sustain it unless such intent actually existed.

Thus, in Farwell v. Brown, 1 Fed. Rep. 128 (1880), it was said that the creditor's reason for believing in the existence of an intent to defraud is a material fact for the purpose of issuing a writ of attachment, but counts for nothing where the facts constituting the ground for sustaining the attachment are denied. Here the parties come to closer quarters and use facts instead of reasons for belief, for their weapons.

The intent to defraud must exist to justify an attachment; it does not suffice that appearances indicate it, and the advertisement by a debtor of the sale of his property will not sustain an attachment though calculated to induce suspicion, where the evidence shows that it was not well founded. Ferguson v. Chastant, 35 La. Ann. 389 (1883).

It must be a fair and logical sequence from facts proved, and it is immaterial what the applicant believes or disbelieves. Ellison v. Bernstein, 60 How. Pr. 145 (1880).

And letters and threats giving a creditor reasonable ground to believe that his debtor intended to defraud him do not furnish a sufficient ground ton v. Cornell, 38 N. Y. 281; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 753.

Fraud that will uphold attachment may be inferred from circumstances.

A person would not be likely to accomplish an act, and afterward say that it was prompted by corrupt motives.

Wait, Fraud. Conv. 2d ed. § 8.

Defendant's motive in making the representation does not, in the eye of the law, make the representation less a fraud.

for an attachment, without reference to the actual intention, the question being, not what was believed, but what was the fact. Rheinhardt v. Grant, 24 Mo. App. 154 (1887).

Where, however, an attaching creditor had good reason to believe that his debtor is about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors, and attaches on that ground, the fact that the debtor afterwards changes his mind and absconds does not invalidate the attachment or give priority to another creditor, subsequently attaching on the ground that the debtor had left the state. Boyd v. Labranche, 35 La. Ann. 285 (1883).

And where the acts of a debtor are such as to justify the belief on the part of the creditor of an intent to defraud, it is sufficient to justify an attachment, though the creditor may have been mistaken in his belief, as the intent can only be shown by the acts of the debtor. Steinhardt v. Leman, 41 La. Ann. 835 (1889).

An intent to defraud or give an unfair preference must exist to sustain an attachment under the Louisiana statute, but as such intent lies in the bosom of the debtor, it can only be shown by his acts and declarations. Chaffe v. Mackenzie, 43 La. Ann. 1032 (1891).

So, the burden of proof to show that an assignment which is valid upon its face is fraudulent in fact, and will support an attachment as having been made with intent to defraud, rests with the attaching creditor. Strauss v. Rose, 60 Md. 525 (1885).

And evidence necessary to establish a fraudulent intent, which will sustain an attachment, must tend to establish a probability of guilt, and be inconsistent with innocence. West Side Bank v. Meehan, 49 N. Y. S. R. 606 (1892).

It should be of such character as to fairly justify no other conclusion than that of a dishonest purpose. Mere conjectures are not sufficient. Goldschmidt v. Herschorn, 13 N. Y. S. R. 560 (1888); Herman v. Doughty, 15 N. Y. Week. Dig. 94 (1883).

Fraud is not to be presumed when the evidence the transaction may be fairly reconciled with honesty of purpose. Dempey v. Bowen, 25 Ill. App. 192 (1887); Pierce v. Johnson, 93 Mich. 125, 18 L. R. A. 436 (1892); Ripon Knitting Works v. Johnson, 93 Mich. 129 (1892).

Though a fraudulent intent which will support an attachment may be reasonably inferred from the acts and conduct of the party. Scott v. Simmons, 34 How. Pr. 66 (1897).

And whatever facts tend to show the good or bad faith of a party against whom an attachment is issued upon the ground of fraud are properly admissible in evidence. Marx Bros. v. Leinkauf, 93 Ala. 453 (1890).

But the facts required to be proved to sustain an attachment upon the ground that the debtor is about to dispose of his property for the purpose of defrauding his creditors should be such as will 30 L. R. A.

It is a fraud which will avoid an obligation of a bond, for the obligee to induce the sureties to become such on representations known to be false, although the motive from which the representation proceeded was not bad.

Drabek v. Grand Lodge of B. S. Benes. Soc. supra; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 753.

A vendee of goods inducing a sale thereof leave no reasonable doubt on the mind of the officer that the debtor is about to commit such acts, and such as would induce him, where uncontradicted or unexplained, to convict the debtor of the charge if he were on trial on a criminal charge. Morrison v. Ream, 1 Pinney, 244 (1842).

And proof of fraudulent intent, consisting chiefly of conflicting evidence and conclusions based upon an examination of the books of the debtor, which might be dissipated by cross-examination of the witnesses, will not support an attachment. Von Moppes v. Leimbach, 22 N. Y. Week. Dig. 337 (1885).

And evidence that a debtor, while residing in another state and over ten years before, was embarrassed and had put his property out of his hands, is irrelevant and inadmissible to prove that he is about to dispose of or remove his property with intent to defraud his creditors, to sustain an attachment. Lewis v. Kennedy, 3 G. Greene, 67 (1851).

The question of the existence of a fraudulent intent which will support an attachment is generally one of fact to be arrived at from the existence of other facts which tend to show it, and whether such other facts exist in any particular case is a question for the jury, and whether such facts, when they exist, are sufficient to indicate conclusively an intent to hinder and delay creditors, is a question of law. Butts v. Peacock, 23 Wis. 350 (1868) (dictum).

The intent which will sustain an attachment must appear as a fact in the case, and is the material inquiry in the case. Ryhiner v. Ruegger, 19 Ill. App. 157 (1886) (dictum); First Nat. Bank v. Steele, 81 Mich. 93 (1890).

It is not enough to show that one has conveyed his property. First Nat. Bank v. Steele. supra.

A disposition of property with intent to defraud creditors will support an attachment, however, though they were not actually defrauded. Main v. Lynch, 54 Md. 653 (1880).

It is not necessary that a transfer of property shall have actually taken place. It is sufficient if there be a fully formed purpose to make it. Ditchburn v. Jermyn & G. Co-Op. Asso. 3 Pa. Dist. R. 635 (1894).

And circumstances sufficient to establish in law an intent to defraud creditors justify an attachment, though there is no positive proof of the removal or concealment of property with such intent. Kipling v. Corbin, 66 How. Pr. 12 (1893).

But an intent to make a fraudulent conveyance on the part of a debtor, which is retracted before any one sustains an injury, will not sustain an attachment. McCrosky v. Leach, 63 Ill. 61 (1872).

And evidence that the debtor was about to dispose of her property and failed to do so will not support an attachment upon the ground that she had disposed of her property with intent to hinder and delay or defraud creditors. Pierce v. White, 22 Week. L. Bull. 96 (1899).

So, the disposition of property with intent to de-by false representation as to his financial ability is guilty of fraud which will avoid the sale, without regard to the motive with which the representation was made; it is wholly immaterial what the vendee's intention was as to paying for the goods.

Reed v. Pinney, 35 Ill. Rep. 610; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 753.

The intent or intention is regarded as shown by acts and declarations, and, as acts speak louder than words, if a party is guilty of an act which defrauds another, his declaration that he did not by the act intend to defraud is weighed down by the evidence of his own act.

The giving of a deed, absolute on its face, as a security, is strong evidence of an intention on the part of the grantor to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors.

See Fuller v. Griffith (Iowa) 60 N. W. Rep. 247; McClure v. Smith, 14 Colo. 297; Stevens v. Hinckley, 43 Me. 440; Moore v. Roe, 35 N. J. Eq. 90; Earnshaw v. Stewart, 64 Md. 513; *Whedbee v. fraud creditors is a sufficient ground for attachment though such disposition took place in another state. Kibbe v. Wetmore, 31 Hun, 424 (1884).

And the intent of a debtor in making a conveyance need not be to forever defeat the creditor, but will be complete if it is coextensive with the effect of the conveyance as hindering or delaying his creditors. Shove v. Farwell, 9 Ill. App. 256 (1881).

And a debtor who has formed a fraudulent intent to dispose of his property is about to dispose of his property so as to hinder or delay his creditor within the meaning of the Illinois statute authorizing an attachment therefor, whether the design is to be executed at once or after a little delay. Dueber Watch Case Mfg. Co. v. Young, 155 Ill. 236 (1886), 54 Ill. App. 383 (1891).

So, an intent to dispose of property for the purpose of delaying or defrauding a particular creditor is good ground for an attachment in his behalf. Correy v. Lake, 1 Deady, 460 (1863).

And a conveyance by a debtor with intent to delay or defraud any one creditor will justify an attachment of his property by any other. Sherrill v. Bench, 37 Ark. 560 (1881).

And a general intention on the part of the debtor to prevent the collection of certain debts, whenever it should be attempted, will sustain an attachment. Correy v. Lake, supra.

And an intent to hinder or prevent the creditor from taking his property on execution is sufficient. Ibid.

So, it is not necessary to establish that a debtor has disposed of all his property with intent to defraud his creditors to uphold an attachment; it will lie where he has disposed of a part thereof with that intent. Hyman v. Kapp, 22 N. Y. Week. Dig. 310 (1886); Wildman v. Van Gelder, 60 Hun, 443, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 143 (1891) (dictum).

And proof that a debtor disposed of his property with intent to defraud creditors is sufficient to warrant an attachment, without proof that he did not retain sufficient property to pay his debts. Flannagan v. Donaldson, 85 Ind. 517 (1882); Pickard v. Samuels, 64 Miss. 322 (1887).

And where the creditor gives evidence sufficient to establish the fraud, it devolves upon the debtor to repel the inference. Pickard v. Samuels, supra.

In Pickard v. Samuels, supra, Montague v. Gaddis, 37 Miss. 453, and Myers v. Farrell, 47 Miss. 281, supra, V., For removal of property, were distinguished upon the ground that they were cases in which an attachment was asked upon the ground of the removal by the debtor of his property from the state.

But affirmative evidence that the defendant is about to dispose of all his unencumbered property with the intent to defraud his creditors is essential to an attachment under the Louisiana statute providing for its issuance on that ground. Hoy v. Weiss, 24 La. Ann. 209 (1872).

So, a conveyance made by a debtor with intent to hinder and delay his creditors is a conveyance for 30 L. R. A.

the purpose of avoiding the payment of his debts, which is made a ground for attachment by Ga. Code, § 3297. Gray v. Neill, 86 Ga. 188 (1890).

And a conveyance made by a debtor for the purpose of hindering and delaying creditors and to gain time, with the intent eventually to pay them if he could do so, will sustain an attachment. Ibid.

And a transfer of property, effected by means of a sheriff's sale under a fraudulent and collusive judgment, is a transfer with intent to defraud within Pa. attachment act 1899. Simon v. Johnson, 7 Kulp, 166 (1898).

And even under the Missouri statute providing for an attachment where the debtor has disposed of property so as to defraud his creditors, an intent to hinder, defraud, and delay creditors by the fraudulent concealment, removal, or disposal of property is the real substance of the issue, and it is not necessary to prove that all of the debtor's property was included. Taylor v. Myers, 34 Mo. 81.

But in that state fraud in attachment cases is a question of law and the court should specifically direct the jury as to what purposes are honest in a legal sense. Estes v. Fry, 22 Mo. App. 53 (1896).

An attachment may be issued under the Iowa Code upon the ground that the debtor has property which he refuses to give in payment or security, without any showing of an intent to defraud creditors. Bates v. Robinson, 3 Iowa, 318 (1860).

And the removal of property by a tenant from the premises, which would endanger the landlord in the collection of his rent, justifies the issuing of an attachment under the Missouri attachment act, without reference to the intention with which the removal was made. Morris v. Hammerle, 40 Mo. 459 (1867).

And no design on the part of the debtor to do anything that will render the collection of his debt less certain is necessary to an attachment under the Kentucky statute, on the grounds that the debtor has not property enough to satisfy the plaintiff's demands, and the collection thereof will be endangered by the delay in obtaining judgment. Burdett v. Phillips, 78 Ky. 246 (1890).

b. Participation in fraudulent intent by transferee.

As a general rule an intent to defraud, in a conveyance of property which will support an attachment, need not be participated in by the vendee. Miller v. McNair, 65 Wis. 452 (1886); Pettingill v. Drake, 14 Ill. App. 424 (1883); Spear v. Joyce, 27 Ill. App. 456 (1889); Rybhiner v. Ruegger, 19 Ill. App. 157 (1886).

And an assignment for the benefit of creditors will sustain an attachment as a conveyance with intent to defraud, where the assignor entertained that intent though the trustee was innocent. Foley v. Bitter, 34 Md. 646 (1871).

Any device to obscure the title to real estate and thereby hinder or delay creditors is fraudulent.

Lewis v. Lanphere, 79 Ill. 187; Metropolitan Bank v. Godfrey, 28 Ill. 579; Bullock v. Battenhausen, 108 Ill. 28, affirming Battenhausen v. Bullock, 11 Ill. App. 665; Bostwick v. Blake, 145 Ill. 85; Moore v. Wood, 100 Ill. 451; Davidson v. Burke, 143 Ill. 189; Sims v. Gaines, 64 Ala. 892; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 753.

Mr. W. S. Coy, for Jane Druley, appellee: The making of the deed to Jesse Druley, in trust for Jane Druley, was not fraudulent in fact, and will not support an attachment.

tent to delay or defraud creditors may be attached, however, must be participated in by the grantee. Johnston v. Field, 62 Ind. 377 (1873).

So, a transfer of property easily separable of a much larger quantity than is necessary to pay the debt in payment of which it is given will support an attachment of the property transferred when the creditor was privy to the fraudulent design. McDonald v. Gaunt, 80 Kan. 698 (1883).

But a general attachment of all a debtor's interest in real estate will not hold lands fraudulently conveyed by him by deed recorded before the attachment and subsequently conveyed by his fraudulent grantee to an innocent purchaser for value. Ashland Sav. Bank v. Mead, 63 N. H. 435 (1885).

c. Gifts.

Whether or not a gift will amount to a disposition of property with intent to defraud, would seem to depend upon the amount of the indebtedness of the giver as compared with the amount of his property.

Thus a gift by a husband to his wife, in good faith when he was not owing anything, is not a disposition of property with intent to defraud creditors which will sustain an attachment at the suit of one who subsequently becomes the husband's creditor. Tootle v. Coldwell, 80 Kan. 125 (1888).

And a conveyance by a father to his natural daughter of real estate worth $350, without actual consideration, but for the nominal consideration of $100, when he possessed no other real estate out of which execution could be satisfied, does not show an intent to defraud which would justify an attachment, where there is nothing to show that he did not have ample personalty with which to pay his debts. Hinds v. Pagebank, 9 Minn. 68 (1864).

And an arrangement by which a debtor transfers real estate to his wife in exchange for other real estate, made at a time when he was not indebted to any considerable extent as compared with the amount of his property, which was upwards of $600,000, is not evidence of an intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment sought two years afterwards. Iosco County Sav. Bank v. Barnes, 100 Mich. 1 (1894).

So, the gift of a piano by a debtor to his daughter which was intended for her own use and paid for in part with money which had been given her in small sums at various times does not show a fraudulent intent which will sustain an attachment by a subsequent creditor. Keith v. McDonald, 31 Ill. App. 17 (1888).

But when a conveyance is attacked as fraudulent and as a ground for attachment by pre-existing creditors, the burden to show that a valuable and adequate consideration was paid rests with the purchaser, and when the transaction is between near relatives, clearer and more conclusive proof is required. Marx Bros. v. Leinkauff, 93 Ala. 458 (1890).

And the execution and placing on record by a debtor of a deed conveying a lot of land to his wife for a nominal consideration, without explanation, will sustain an attachment by existing creditors. Washburn v. McGuire, 19 Neb. 98 (1886).

And evidence that an insolvent debtor, against whom judgments were about to be perfected, transferred his property to his wife through a third person and procured her to execute a mortgage for the benefit of his mother-in-law for which no consideration was paid, and that he continued to use and control the property the same as before the conveyance, justifies an inference of a disposition of property with intent to defraud which will support an attachment. Allen v. Meyer, 73 N. Y. 1, 7 Daly, 229 (1873).

d. Sales of property.

The mere fact that a debtor has sold his property, or some part of it, does not establish a fraudulent intent which will sustain an attachment, though creditors are thereby hindered or delayed in the collection of their debts. Dempsey v. Bowen, 25 Ill. App. 122 (1887); Decker v. Bryant, 7 Barb. 183 (1849); Frank v. Levie, 5 Robt. 599 (1866).

That a debtor is selling his property at fair rates for the purpose of paying his creditors, does not show an intent to defraud which will support an attachment. Knapp v. Joy, 9 Mo. App. 47 (1880); Dempsey v. Bowen, 25 Ill. App. 122 (1887).

And the sale of his entire stock of goods by a debtor, and the application of the money received therefor to the payment of his debts, do not authorize an attachment upon the ground that he had conveyed his property with intent to cheat and defraud his creditors. Tenney v. Diss, 32 Neb. 61 (1891).

And such a transfer for the purpose of raising money does not warrant an attachment upon that ground where it is not shown to be fraudulent or for an inadequate consideration. Ladew v. Hudson River Boat & S. Mfg. Co., 61 Hun, 333 (1891).

And proof that a debtor is offering his property for sale in order to realize funds for the payment of his debts, accompanied by a declaration of such purpose, will not justify an attachment upon the ground that he is about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors or give an unfair preference, or to place it beyond the reach of creditors. Lehman v. McFarland, 35 La. Ann. 624 (1889).

So, the daily disposal of his goods in the usual course of business by a solvent merchant, and the use of the money received for his own private purposes and placing it where it cannot be reached by his creditors except at his own pleasure, are not a disposal of his property with intent to defraud creditors for which an attachment will lie, though he may not intend to pay that particular money over to his creditors. Willis v. Lowry, 60 Tex. 540 (1886).

And the daily selling of goods by a permanent dealer in the regular course of his business does not indicate a fraudulent intent to place his property beyond the reach of creditors, or to give an Messrs. J. H. Breckenridge and George S. House for appellees.

Balley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 8d day of September, 1890, the Weare Commission Company commenced its suit in assumpsit, by attachment, against William M. Druley and Albert A. Druley. The grounds for the attachment, as stated in the affidavit were: (1) That the defendants had, within two years then last past, fraudulently conveyed or assigned their effects, or part thereof, so as to hinder and delay their creditors; (2) that they had, within two years then last past, fraudulently concealed or disposed of their property so as to hinder and delay their creditors; and (3) that they were about fraudulently to conceal or dispose of their property or effects so as to hinder and delay their creditors. William M. Druley, at the date of the writ, was in his last illness, and on September 5, 1890, which was two days thereafter, he died. It appears from the return to the writ that the sheriff, on September 5, 1890,—the day of William M. Druley's death,—attached a tract of land in Cook county, containing 2 acres, the land then being, or shortly prior to the date of the writ having been, the individual unfair preference to some of them, which will justify an attachment, though he is financially embarrassed, Hernsheim v. Levy, 32 La. Ann. 340 (1880).

So, sales of property by a debtor for the purpose of obtaining money with which to purchase necessities for his family will not support an attachment, as a fraudulent conveyance or assignment of his property or effects. Estes v. Fry, 22 Mo. App. 53 (1886); Dempsey v. Bowen, 25 Ill. App. 122 (1887).

Whether or not such a disposition of property amounts to a transfer with fraudulent intent depends upon the attending circumstances and conditions.

Thus, an attachment on the ground that the debtor assigned, disposed of, and secreted his property with intent to defraud his creditors will not issue upon proof that he was badly embarrassed and had ineffectually tried to sell out his business, and that he owed largely and was not ready to say what steps would be taken in disposing of his property. Thompson v. Deter, 37 Hun, 316 (1890).

And proof that a debtor, whose factory was destroyed by fire, had gone out of business and sold what remained of his machinery and utensils for a small sum and contracted to sell the balance of his stock, and collected the insurance on the property destroyed, and paid or secured other creditors, will not support an attachment by an unsecured creditor upon the ground that he was about to dispose of his property and leave the state with intent to defraud creditors. Andrews v. Schwartz, 55 How. Pr. 190 (1878).

And making a conveyance of real estate absolute on its face, which was intended for the purpose of securing the grantee who was a bona fide creditor, is not evidence of a disposition of property with fraudulent intent which will support an attachment. Rigney v. Tallmadge, 17 How. Pr. 556 (1859).

So, a debtor who was a professional trader and bought upon credit, and sold and traded nearly everything that he possessed, and sold machinery at or about cost, is not subject to attachment on the ground of a disposal or removal of property with intent of defraud creditors, where that was the usual way in which he conducted his business and the sales at cost were made for the purpose of drawing trade. Reed v. Bagley, 24 Neb. 322 (1888).

And the making by a debtor of two assignments of property to the same person and then stating that he had no property and could pay no debts, will not support an attachment. Miller v. Brinkerhoff, 4 Denio, 118, 47 Am. Dec. 242 (1847).

And an attachment upon the ground that the debtor is about to convert his property into money for the purpose of defrauding his creditors should not issue on evidence that the attaching creditor had furnished him with supplies for his crop of cotton, and that after ginning five bales of cotton, four were turned over to the creditor and one was sold and taxes upon the debtor's store paid with the proceeds, the debtor remaining upon the place, 30 L. R. A.

and pursuing his usual business. Bridge v. Ennis, 28 La. Ann. 309 (1876).

But a sale, by a debtor who had purchased goods on credit, of his store to his wife, the debtor remaining in charge of the business after such sale and there being no actual and continued change of possession, creates a presumption of an intent to defraud creditors which will prima facie sustain an attachment. Schumann v. Davis, 33 N. Y. S. R. 191 (1891).

And a deed from a father to his daughter, absolute in form, for an express consideration of $10,000, but intended as a security for advances not to exceed $6,000, and to become absolute only in the event of the grantor's death, is calculated to hinder and delay creditors, and will support an attachment. Evans v. Loughton, 60 Wis. 128 (1887).

And evidence that a debtor contemplated a sale of all of his estate to his sons upon long credits, and transferring to his creditors his son's notes, is sufficient to establish an intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment. Clark v. Smith, 7 R. Mon. 273 (1847).

So, selling a few articles cheaply will not support an attachment upon the ground of an intended disposal of property to defraud creditors, where it was done for the purpose of pushing trade and the stock consisted in part of goods bought at an insolvent sale, and the whole stock was successfully sold. Mack v. Jones, 31 Fed. Rep. 129 (1887).

And evidence of an offer by a debtor to sell her stock in trade to another for less than to any other person, with a request to keep the matter secret, is not sufficient to sustain an attachment on that ground, particularly where the stock of goods was worth $2,000, while her indebtedness did not appear to exceed $400. Frank v. Levie, 5 Robt. 599 (1866).

And the sale of his stock of goods by an insolvent debtor at their fair value, taking land warrants not yet located but to which good titles could be made, the purchaser agreeing that if the lands fell short of a certain price he would make up the deficiency, will not support an attachment as a disposal of property with intent to defraud where the debtor seemed to have been actuated by honest motives. Heidenheimer v. Ogborn, 1 Disney (Ohio) 351 (1837).

But that debtors who are largely indebted if not insolvent have sold and are rapidly selling their large stock of goods at less than the original cost, and have disposed of other valuable property recently for cash, will warrant an attachment upon that ground. Gashline v. Baer, 64 N. C. 108 (1870).

And an unsuccessful effort by a debtor to borrow money from a creditor, after which the debtor sells the entire contents of his store to him, for much less than they are worth, deducting the creditor's claim, the creditor giving his check for a part of the amount, most of which the debtor sent to his mother, and giving his note payable in nine months for the balance, with an arrangement that the creditor may give his notes to other credit-property of William M. Druley, and that, after his death, the sheriff also summoned certain insurance companies, who, as it was claimed, were then indebted to William M. Druley individually, as garnishees. No personal service of the attachment writ was had on either of the defendants.

The plaintiff, in its original declaration, declared against the defendants as copartners under the firm name of Druley Bros., upon six promissory notes payable to the order of the plaintiff, two for $2,500 each, and one for $1,000, signed by Druley Bros., and two for $2,000 each, and one for $200, signed by Druley Bros., and by William M. Druley individually. On the 17th day of October, 1890, Albert A. Druley entered a special appearance, and suggested on the record the death of William M. Druley, and also filed his affidavit, stating, in substance, that the firm of Druley Bros. was composed of William M. Druley and the affiant, and was formed for the purpose of carrying on a grain trade or business in Will county; that William M. Druley, at the time of his death, was a resident of Cook county, the affiant being a resident of Will county; that neither had been served with process, and that no property, rights, or credits belonging to the affiant, or in which he had any interest, had ors and indorse the amount thereof on the note given to the debtor, will sustain a finding by a jury of the existence of the fraudulent intent necessary to sustain an attachment. Pettingill v. Drake, 14 Ill. App. 424 (1883).

And proof that a debtor was rapidly selling all his stock of goods, which was purchased mainly on credit, at about cost; and that he had no other property; that he had borrowed money and refused to pay it, and was endeavoring to borrow more, and was indebted to numerous persons whom he refused to pay, and neglected and refused to pay his workmen though he had money constantly coming in; together with a statement that if he failed he intended to make something,—is prima facie sufficient to support an attachment at the suit of a creditor whose claim he had denied and refused to pay. Cooney v. Whitfield, 41 How. Pr. 6 (1871).

And an attempt by an absent debtor, through his attorney in fact, to realize money on his business in haste, by offering to sell it at much less than its real value if payments were made at once, and proof that he had directed his wife to draw all money from the bank and leave none on the premises, and that she had told creditors while carrying a large amount of money that she had none and declared while making a payment on account that it was the last the creditors would ever get,—warrant an attachment on the ground that the debtor was about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud. Union Distilling Co. v. Ruser, 30 N. Y. S. R. 128 (1891).

So, a pretended sale by a debtor of no pecuniary responsibility, after which he remains in possession of the goods sold and conducts the business as before, constitutes a disposal of his property with intent to defraud, which will support an attachment. Scott v. Simmons, 34 How. Pr. 66 (1867).

And an attachment will lie under Ga. Code, § 3297, for a pretended sale by a debtor for the purpose of avoiding his creditors, and the interposition of a court of equity is not necessary. Haralson v. Newton, 68 Ga. 168 (1879).

But a sale by an insolvent debtor of his entire stock of goods in his store, together with the furniture and the outstanding notes and accounts, to his son for notes payable in one, two, and three years, which were placed in a bank to be collected, the proceeds to be applied upon certain indebtedness, will not support an attachment upon the ground of a disposition of his property with intent to defraud his creditors, when the son had expectations as a devisee in his grandmother's will, since making which she had become demented. Miami Powder Co. v. Hotchkiss, 20 Fed. Rep. 767 (1887).

So, a warrant of attachment upon the ground that the debtor has disposed of or secreted property with intent to defraud his creditors is properly issued in favor of a creditor to whom he transferred property as security, which he was permitted to hold and sell, provided he applied the proceeds in payment of the indebtedness, where he secretly and fraudulently sold it, and refused to say what he had done with the proceeds. German Bank v. Meyer, 55 Hun, 86 (1889).

But an attachment upon the ground that the debtor was about to convert his property into money with intent to place it beyond the reach of creditors is not sustained by proof that he sold several bales of cotton to pay his landlord who had taken out a provisional seizure, and sent two or three work animals to his brother's plantation after having agreed with the attachment creditor to ship him all the cotton he could get from his lessees and debtors and pay to him what he could realize from the sale of his goods. Bussey v. Rothschild, 26 La. Ann. 258 (1874).

And evidence that a debtor, who was a retail merchant, refused to inform his creditors as to his financial standing, and had been making sales of his property for cash and retaining the proceeds and not replenishing his stock, and had disposed of a large part thereof, will not support an attachment, where it appears that it was a season of the year when goods were sold and not bought by retailers, and that he had bought goods during the month and had paid over $3,000 to his creditors. Stringfield v. Fields, 13 Daly, 171, 7 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 356 (1886).

So, a conveyance by a father, who was surety for his son, of his property to a daughter and her husband to carry out the wishes of his deceased wife and redeem promises made to his children when the property was conveyed to him, and to perform a contract with and pay a debt due the daughter and her husband, does not show such a corrupt motive or fraudulent intent as will justify an attachment, where he did not know at the time he executed the conveyance that his son was financially embarrassed. First Nat. Bank v. Kurtz, 23 Ill. App. 213 (1886).

And a sale of attached property after the institution of the attachment suit and during its pendency does not raise an inference that an intention to dispose of the property and defraud creditors existed when the suit was brought so as to sustain an attachment in chancery under the Kentucky statute, it being necessary to show the existence of a fraudulent intent before the issuance of the attachment. Warner v. Everett, 7 B. Mon. 262 (1847).

But the disposal by a debtor, for his own benefit, without consent of his creditor, of goods for which warehouse receipts had been issued and delivered as collateral security for money borrowed, is an act done with the fraudulent intent to cheat, hinder, and delay the creditor within the meaning of the Kentucky statute, allowing an attachment for such act. Bank of Commerce v. Payne, 35 Ky. 446 (1857).

And the exchange by a debtor of a stock of goods worth about $2,000 for unproductive real estate of doubtful value, taken subject to a mortgage for $400, is sufficient to authorize an attach-been attached under the attachment writ directed to the sheriff of Cook county; that neither the affiant nor the late firm of Druley Bros. had any property in Cook county; and that all the property, rights, and credits seized under the writ were the individual property of William M. Druley. Upon this affidavit, Albert A. Druley moved to dismiss, and quash the writ of attachment. This motion was overruled by the court, and at the same time the plaintiff discontinued its suit as to Albert A. Druley, and by leave of the court amended all the papers and proceedings in the cause by striking out the words, "co-partners as Druley Brothers," wherever they occurred. It was also ordered that Mary A. Druley, the administratrix of the estate of William M. Druley, deceased, be substituted as defendant in place of her intestate, and also that Jesse Druley and Ralph Druley, the heirs at law of William M. Druley, be made parties to the attachment issue only, and be summoned as such. The plaintiff also, by leave of the court, filed a new affidavit in attachment, setting up the indebtedness sued for as being from William M. Druley, in his lifetime to the plaintiff, and since his death as being due and owing from his administratrix to the plaintiff, and setting up, as against William Druley individually, ment under the Nebraska statute, providing therefor where the debtor has disposed of his property with intent to defraud his creditor. Robinson Notion Co. v. Ormsby, 33 Neb. 685 (1891).

So, that the debtor was making an effort to sell his property or place it out of his hands is sufficient to sustain an attachment on the ground of an alleged conversion of property into money with intent to place it beyond the reach of his creditors, on motion to dissolve. Wetherow v. Croslin, 24 La. Ann. 128 (1872).

And that the debtor went to a young lady to whom he was engaged, and urged immediate marriage for the reason that his business affairs were becoming involved, and that he wanted to deed his lands to her and make over to her his personal property so that nobody could get them away, desiring her to go to a neighboring city the next morning and be married and he would make the transfer, will sustain an attachment upon the ground that the debtor is about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors. Curtis v. Hoadley, 29 Kan. 566 (1893).

As to fraudulent contraction of debt as evidence of fraudulent disposition, see supra, III.

e. Mortgaging or pledging property.

Securing a creditor by mortgaging or pledging property does not establish a fraudulent intent which will sustain an attachment, though other creditors are thereby hindered or delayed in the collection of their debts. Dempsey v. Bowen, 25 Ill. App. 192 (1887).

So, the giving of a chattel mortgage on his personal property by a debtor to a trustee for the benefit of designated creditors is not evidence of an intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment, but is evidence of an attempt to secure such creditors. Rickel v. Strelinger, 102 Mich. 41 (1894).

And giving a mortgage to a creditor to secure his claims does not constitute a ground for attachment under the Louisiana attachment act, art. 240, No. 4, where there is nothing to show that it was given with intent to defraud creditors or give a fraudulent preference. Abney v. Whitted, 28 La. Ann. 818 (1876).

And giving a chattel mortgage upon personal property which is by law exempt from levy under execution or attachment is not a disposal of property with intent to defraud creditors which will support an attachment. Wyman v. Wilmarth, 18 D. 172 (1890).

And that a debtor mortgaged a stock of goods and the assignee of the mortgage took possession within a few days after the execution of the mortgage and proceeded to sell the property do not show an intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment, where it is not shown that the mortgage was not given to secure bona fide debts. Pierce v. Johnson, 93 Mich. 125, 18 L. R. A. 486 (1902); Ripon Knitting Works v. Johnson, 93 Mich. 129 (1902).

So an offer by a debtor to mortgage property to a creditor, including in the mortgage the claim of another creditor not yet due which it was stipulated should be paid after the debt due the first creditor was discharged, will not support an attachment upon the ground of a disposition of property by the debtor with intent to defraud creditors. C. D. Smith Drug Co. v. Casper Drug Co. (Wyo.) 40 Pac. Rep. 879 (1896).

And the mere failure or neglect of a creditor to record a deed given him by his debtor for security without evidence or suspicion that the debtor knew of, or requested or desired such failure, does not show an intent on the part of the debtor to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors which will support an attachment. Burruss v. Trant, 88 Va. 980 (1892).

And the withholding of a chattel mortgage upon a stock of goods from record is not a ground for attachment under a statute authorizing it, where the debtor transfers his property with intent to defraud creditors, because while the mortgage was thus withheld it was void as to creditors. Lord v. Wirt, 96 Mich. 415 (1896).

And a purchase of mining stock of unknown and uncertain value, by a debtor who placed a mortgage upon his property in part for the purpose of paying for such stock and in part to make a payment upon his indebtedness, though a foolish adventure, is not a disposal of property with intent to defraud creditors which will support an attachment. Thurber v. Sexauer, 15 Neb. 541 (1894).

So, an offer by a married woman to pledge her property, pursuant to Alabama Code, § 2349, authorizing it, does not furnish ground for an attachment against her, unless the offer was made with fraudulent intent. Schloss v. Rovelesky (Ala.) 18 So. 71 (1896).

But a mortgage by merchants who were indebted in amount nearly equal in value to their assets made to a creditor, containing a stipulation that the mortgagor should dispose of the mortgaged property in a regular course of mercantile sales at customary prices, will support an attachment upon the ground of a disposal of property with intent to defraud creditors, as the effect of the stipulation is to hinder and delay creditors. Gallagher v. Goldfrank, 75 Tex. 562 (1890).

And such a mortgage, under which it is understood between the parties that the mortgagor should do as he pleased with the proceeds, constitutes a conveyance or disposal of the debtor's property with intent to defraud his creditors which will support an attachment. Anderson v. Patterson, 64 Wis. 557 (1885); City Bank v. Westbury, 16 Hun, 468 (1879).

So, a mortgage placed by a debtor upon his stock of merchandise and fixtures is a ground for attachment when it can be inferred that the intention was that the mortgagor was to continue to carry on his usual trade and business. Eby v. Watkins, 39 Mo. App. 27 (1890).

And a chattel mortgage under which the mortgagor is permitted to retain possession and to sell the same grounds for an attachment alleged in the original affidavit. The administratrix afterwards appeared specially, and moved the court to quash the attachment, which motion was overruled. Summons having been served on her, she appeared generally, and filed a plea of none assumpsit, and certain special pleas to the declaration, and also a plea traversing the affidavit for attachment. Issues being formed on these pleas, a trial was had before the court and a jury, at which the court, after the evidence had been heard, instructed the jury to find the issues formed by the plea traversing the attachment affidavit in favor of the defendant. The jury thereupon returned their verdict finding the issues upon the merits of the action in favor of the plaintiff, and assessing the plaintiff's damages at $18,500, and finding the issues upon the attachment affidavit in favor of the defendant; and the court, after overruling a motion by the plaintiff for a new trial, gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the damages assessed by the jury and costs, but setting aside and quashing the attachment writ. That judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court, and this appeal is from the judgment of affirmance.

The principal controversy, as presented here, turns upon the propriety of the per-the mortgaged property in the regular course of trade, without any provision as to what disposal should be made of the proceeds, is sufficient where there is no agreement outside of the mortgage as to what disposal should be made thereof, in connection with a statement by one of the mortgagors that except for the attachment the mortgage might never have been foreclosed, to sustain such attachment upon the ground of a disposal of property with intent to defraud creditors. Leser v. Glaser, 32 Kan. 546 (1894).

In Leser v. Glaser, supra, Frankhouser v. Ellett, infra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the mortgage was executed in good faith and the proceeds of the sales were to be applied in payment of the mortgage debt.

But where a mortgage is given upon a stock of goods and by agreement outside the mortgage the mortgagor is permitted to continue the business and dispose of the goods in the ordinary way, and uses some of the proceeds to support his family, the transaction will not be regarded as showing an intent to defraud creditors which will support an attachment where the arrangement is carried out in good faith. Frankhouser v. Ellett, 22 Kan. 127, 81 Am. Rep. 171 (1879).

And sales made by the mortgagor from the stock of goods mortgaged in the ordinary course of business with the knowledge and implied consent of the mortgagee will not sustain an attachment. Rhode v. Matthal, 35 Ill. App. 147 (1890).

So the mortgaging by a debtor of his personal property for the purpose of hindering and delaying his creditors justifies an attachment against him, and that he caused the fraudulent mortgage to be released a short time before the attachment is no defense where he immediately remortgaged the property to others under suspicious circumstances. Buford & G. Implement Co. v. McWhorter, 41 Kan. 232 (1890).

And the execution by a debtor of a mortgage to another without any consideration, for the purpose of covering up and concealing his interests in real estate, will sustain an attachment upon the ground of a disposition of property with intent to defraud. Taylor v. Kubuke, 26 Kan. 132 (1881).

So, a mortgage by an insolvent debtor to a creditor securing the payment of more than the mortgagee's demand, showing upon its face that it was given to cover agreed future advances, will sustain an allegation that the debtor had conveyed a part of his property with intent to defraud creditors, for which an attachment will issue. Rice v. Morner, 64 Wis. 569 (1886).

And mortgaging all of his property by a debtor to a creditor as security for his indebtedness is prima facie sufficient to justify an attachment upon the ground of the disposition of his property with intent to defraud his creditors, where the value of the property was greatly in excess of adequate security for the debt. Smith v. Boyer, 29 Neb. 76 (1890).

And the giving of a chattel mortgage by a failing debtor to a creditor who knew his circumstances, upon all his property for an amount greater than was owing and in excess of the value of the property, and a claim of the mortgagee to hold the property for the full amount against a creditor, are conclusive evidence of an intent to hinder and delay creditors which will support an attachment. Butts v. Peacock, 23 Wis. 359 (1868).

So, the execution, by an insolvent debtor who is being pressed by his creditors, of a chattel mortgage upon his personal property to secure the payment of a sum of money to his attorney, most of which is in consideration of future legal services, is an assignment and disposal of his property with intent to defraud, hinder, and delay his creditors for which an attachment may be had under the Kansas statute. Shellabarger v. Mottin, 47 Kan. 451 (1891).

And a mortgage executed by a firm of druggists upon their entire stock, including a large quantity of intoxicating liquors, which is void for that reason, constitutes a hindrance to creditors, and will sustain an attachment upon that ground. First Nat. Bank v. Gerson, 60 Kan. 559 (1896).

As to constructive fraud in mortgaging property, see supra, II.

1. Assignments for the benefit of creditors.

The mere fact that an assignment for the benefit of creditors will hinder and delay creditors does not make it fraudulent, and is not a sufficient ground for an attachment, unless there was also an intent to hinder and delay them. Gates v. Labeaume, 19 Mo. 17 (1853); Decker v. Bryant, 7 Barb. 182 (1849).

So, in Luckemeyer v. Seltz, 61 Md. 317 (1883), an assignment by a debtor of all his property in trust for the benefit of all his creditors without exacting releases, was held insufficient to support an attachment upon the ground that it was a fraudulent transfer, where the evidence was not legally sufficient to show any fraudulent intent or antecedent fraud on the part of the grantor.

And a deed of assignment, reciting in the preamble that one of the purposes thereof was to prevent an undue sacrifice of the property assigned, does not show an intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment. McPike v. Atwell, 34 Kan. 142 (1885).

Nor is an assignment by a debtor for the benefit of creditors, giving preference in excess of one third of the assigned assets, prohibited by the New York statute, a disposition of his property with intent to defraud his creditors which will support an attachment. Rose v. Renton, 37 N. Y. S. R. 633 (1891).

And an assignment for the benefit of creditors made in good faith and upon a valid consideration, in which a preferred claim is stated to be a few dollars more or less than it actually is, does not show an intent to defraud creditors which will empty instruction to the jury to find the issues upon the attachment affidavit for the defendant. If that instruction, and the consequent verdict and judgment, are sustained, it is manifestly immaterial whether the court erred in refusing to quash the attachment on motion of Albert A. Druley, or on the subsequent motion of the administratrix. At the trial, evidence was introduced tending to show the following facts: Some time about the year 1885, Jesse Druley, William M. Druley's father, sold a farm in McLean county, and of the proceeds loaned to William M. Druley, or put into his business, about $18,000. William M. Druley afterwards advanced to his father and mother various sums of money, and about March 10, 1887, a settlement was had between them, at which it was found that William M. Druley was indebted to his father in the sum of $10,000. For this sum William M. Druley, with his father's consent, executed his promissory note, dated March 10, 1887, payable to Jane Druley, his mother, five years support an attachment. Strauss v. Rose, 59 Md. 525 (1882). As to preferences generally, see infra, h.

So an assignment for creditors, giving the assignee power to compromise all claims and sell on credit, is not alone sufficient evidence of a disposition of the property with intent to defraud creditors which will warrant an attachment. Milliken v. Dart, 36 Hun, 24 (1881).

And an assignment for the benefit of creditors, empowering the assignee, for the proper execution of the trust, to employ and retain competent attorneys to defend and protect it if it be assailed and pay him a just and reasonable compensation, is not invalid, and an assignment of property with intent to defraud creditors which will sustain an attachment. Bickham v. Lake, 51 Fed. Rep. 802 (1883).

Nor will an assignment be deemed to have been made with intent to defraud creditors so as to support an attachment, because the assignee removed a part of his goods from the debtor's store on the morning after the conveyance, where the assignee acted discreetly and on his own responsibility without consulting the assignor or preferred creditors. Strauss v. Rose, supra.

In Strauss v. Rose, supra, Main v. Lynch, 54 Md. 656 (1880) infra, in this subdivision, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the question whether the assignment was fraudulent in fact was submitted to the jury, while in this there was no evidence from which a jury could reasonably find a fraudulent purpose.

So, an agreement between a debtor and a creditor that the debtor will execute an assignment if at any time it becomes necessary for the creditor's protection, does not constitute fraud in fact which will support an attachment under the Mississippi statute. Anderson v. Leach, 50 Miss. 111 (1881).

And an agreement by certain creditors that they will accept one half their claims in full satisfaction, the debtors agreeing that if they should find it necessary to make an assignment they would secure the payment of such one half by a preference for confidential debts, followed by an assignment, preferring debts which were not confidential as well as those which were, and the claims of a number of creditors including those who had agreed to the compromise, does not constitute a transfer with intent to defraud which will support an attachment. Powers v. Graydon, 10 Bosw. 650 (1863).

And the fraudulent execution of an assignment will not justify the issuing of an attachment three days previous to such execution, unless the fraudulent intent existed at the time the attachment was sued out, though it may afford some evidence that the fraudulent assignment was contemplated at that time. Donnell v. Jones, 17 Ala. 689, 52 Am. Dec. 191 (1890).

To sustain an attachment on the ground that an assignment subsequently made is fraudulent, it must appear that at the time the attachment was issued the debtor contemplated making such fraudulent assignment, and the question as to whether it was thus contemplated is one for the jury. Bickham v. Lake, 51 Fed. Rep. 802 (1883).

And proof of fraudulent conduct prior to an assignment for the benefit of creditors will not support an attachment on the ground of a disposition of property with intent to defraud, where the assignment itself is not impeached. Belmont v. Lane, 22 How. Pr. 365 (1862).

As to effect on assignment of fraud in the contraction of debts, see supra, III.

A fraudulent disposition of property by way of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, however, may be a disposition of property with intent to defraud for which an attachment might be issued. Skinner v. Oettinger, 14 Abb. Pr. 109 (1861).

And the execution of an instrument by a debtor purporting to convey all of his property for the benefit of his creditors, showing on its face that it was executed for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, in connection with evidence alunde of the same fact, will sustain an attachment under the Kansas statute. Johnson v. Laughlin, 7 Kan. 369 (1871).

And a general assignment providing for the payment of fictitious or simulated debts is fraudulent and void for all purposes, and will support an attachment upon the ground of a disposition of property with intent to defraud creditors. Bickham v. Lake, 51 Fed. Rep. 802 (1883).

The questions as to whether debts provided for in an assignment for the benefit of creditors are simulated and fictitious, and whether or not the assignor knew or had reasonable cause to know their invalidity, are questions of fact for the jury. Ibid.

And the assignor is presumed to know it though such presumption is rebuttable. Ibid.

So, an assignment of a stock of goods to a trustee for the benefit of designated creditors will support an attachment as a fraudulent disposition of property where it was the intent of the parties thereto that the grantor should be allowed to remain in possession and dispose of the property in the usual course of business until default. Stanley v. Bunce, 27 Mo. 289 (1856).

And an assignment for the benefit of creditors, intended to aid the grantors in dishonestly withholding a large portion of their property from their creditors, and at the same time to enable them to obtain releases from their debts by fraudulently pretending by its terms to convey all their property, is a conveyance with intent to defraud which will support an attachment. Foley v. Bitter, 84 Md. 646 (1871); Main v. Lynch, 54 Md. 656 (1880).

And the concealment by a debtor of a large portion of his property for the fraudulent purpose of assigning the balance for the benefit of his creditors and inducing them to accept terms of compromise advantageous to himself is a ground for attachment. Kleine v. Nie, 88 Ky. 542 (1890).

And an assignment for the benefit of creditors, followed by a statement by the debtor to a preferred creditor that he would not pay some of his creditors who pushed him if he could prevent it, after date, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable quarterly. This note remaining wholly unpaid, William M. Druley, some weeks prior to his death,—but whether in payment of or as security for the note is left by the evidence somewhat in doubt,—signed and acknowledged a deed conveying the 2-acre tract of land upon which the attachment writ was afterwards levied to Jesse Druley, his father, in trust for Jane Druley, his mother. This deed was executed as the result of considerable negotiation between William M. Druley and an attorney representing Jesse and Jane Druley, such negotiation resulting in an agreement that the deed should be executed, but that, if William M. Druley recovered from his illness, he should have the land back, or that the deed should be returned to him. The deed, after it was signed and acknowledged, and that instead of paying such debts he would make him a preferred creditor, is sufficient evidence of an intent to defraud which will authorize the issuance of an attachment. Wilson v. Eifer, 7 Coldw. 31 (1869).

So, a general assignment by a partner for the benefit of creditors preferring a dormant partner will support an attachment upon the ground of a disposition with intent to defraud, against the firm property at the suit of a firm creditor. Claffin v. Hirsch, 19 N.Y. Week. Dig. 248 (1884).

And proof that a domestic corporation had conveyed all of its property to a large creditor by a conveyance absolute on its face, together with evidence that the latter had declared his intention to satisfy his own claim first, will warrant an attachment on that ground, though it is claimed that the creditor was to act as trustee to pay the creditors ratably. Bicknell v. Speir, 45 N. Y. S. R. 661 (1902).

So, under the Missouri provision an assignment for the benefit of creditors will support an attachment as a disposal of property so as to defraud and delay creditors where it was made with fraudulent intent, though it may be valid as to the trustee and creditors secured. Enders v. Richards, 88 Mo. 496 (1893).

But an intent upon the part of the debtor to defraud or delay creditors is necessary to render a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors which is fair on its face fraudulent so as to support an attachment. Spencer v. Deagle, 34 Mo. 455 (1884).

So, a reservation in a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors of any surplus remaining after the satisfaction of the grantor's debts is not a fraudulent reservation to his own use as against creditors upon which an attachment will lie. Douglass v. Cissna, 17 Mo. App. 44 (1885).

And an assignment for the benefit of a creditor empowering the assignee to sell the property conveyed in the usual course of business and reserving to the grantor the surplus remaining after payment of the debt secured by the assignment, without providing for other debts, is not per se a fraudulent conveyance or a conveyance with intent to defraud creditors which will support an attachment. Anderson v. Lachs, 59 Miss. 111 (1881).

But an assignment in trust for the benefit of creditors who shall accept and release the grantor, which makes no disposition of the surplus which may remain after paying the releasing creditors, is fraudulent and void and will support an attachment. Whedbee v. Stewart, 40 Md. 414 (1874).

And a bill of sale conveying all of a debtor's property to a creditor with the provision that the creditor is to sell it and after satisfying his own claim return the balance, if any, to the debtor, is an assignment for the benefit of a particular creditor, and is fraudulent and void as to other creditors and will support an attachment. Rigor v. Simmons, 47 Ill. App. 428 (1893).

A purpose on the part of a debtor which, if declared in writing and inserted in a general assignment, would render it void as legally fraudulent, ought, when declared by the debtor verbally to be the object of an intended assignment, to be considered as fraudulent and sufficient to support an attachment. Gasherie v. Apple, 14 Abb. Pr. 64 (1861).

As to assignments constructively fraudulent, see supra, II.

g. Threats to assign or dispose of property.

The question as to what threats to assign or dispose of property will establish an intent to defraud which will justify an attachment is an unsettled one. But it would seem that the question whether or not the threatened act is a lawful one might be regarded as the test adopted in most cases.

Thus, a threat to make an assignment for the benefit of creditors will not sustain an attachment upon the ground that the debtor is about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors. Stamp v. Harpich, 8 N. Y. S. R. 446 (1887).

And a threat to make an assignment with preferences does not show such an intent. Kipling v. Corbin, 66 How. Pr. 12 (1893).

So, a statement by a debtor to his creditor that if suit was brought upon his demand he would make an assignment, and that he owed a large amount of confidential debts, which he would first provide for, does not justify an attachment upon that ground. Dickinson v. Benham, 19 How. Pr. 410, 10 Abb. Pr. 890 (1860).

And such a threat will not support an attachment, though the debtor had agreed to furnish collateral security, which he not only failed to do but appropriated the whole of his means to a different object. Dickerson v. Benham, 20 How. Pr. 343 (1860).

And a statement by a debtor that he would fix things in such a way as to prevent some of his creditors from getting much will not support an attachment on the ground of an intended fraudulent disposition of his property. Scott v. Dexter, 1 N. Y. Week. Dig. 25 (1875).

So, an offer by a debtor to compromise with his creditors, accompanied by a statement that if the creditor did not agree to take it he would make an assignment, and that the creditor would not get anything, and that he would put his property out of his hands, is not sufficient proof of fraudulent intent to justify an attachment in the absence of proof of such intent derived from contemporaneous or subsequent acts. Wilson v. Britton, 25 Barb. 562 (1858).

And a statement by a debtor that unless his creditor would accept his offer of compromise he would at once make an assignment of all of his property, preferring another creditor, which would prevent his obtaining the amount of the compromise, will not warrant an attachment upon that ground. Evans v. Warner, 21 Hun. 674 (1890).

So when he threatened that they would get nothing. Farwell v. Furniss, 67 How. Pr. 183 (1884).

In Farwell v. Furniss, supra, Anthony v. Stype, 19 Hun. 268 (1879) infra, in this subdivision, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case there were other facts besides the threats which tended to show a fraudulent design.

In Newman v. Kraim, 34 La. Ann. 910 (1882), however, threats made by a debtor that he would dispose of his property to protect himself if he were sued were held to constitute a sufficient ground for attachment.

remained in the possession of the grantor about two weeks, and he then handed it to his brother, Edwin P. Druley, who was attending and taking care of him in his illness, saying to him that he should take it, and carry it in his pocket, and that if he, the grantor, got well, he should return it to him, but if he did not, he should put it on record. On the 2d day of September, 1890, Edwin P. Druley, having learned that the firm of Druley Bros. was about to fail, or supposing that it had failed, put the deed on record, and about six weeks afterwards he got it from the recorder's office, and delivered it to his father and mother. This deed, and the circumstances attending its execution, constituted the only evidence given by the plaintiff in support of the grounds for an attachment alleged in its attachment affidavit.

It is urged, and with some show of reason,

So, a statement by one of a firm of debtors that they thought they would have to turn over their business, and that creditors might be left and they would have to protect themselves, does not establish an intent to transfer property to defraud creditors which will sustain an attachment. Haulenbeck v. Coenen, 20 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 6 (1890).

And a request by a debtor to his creditor for an extension of time in consequence of the failure of the cotton crop, accompanied by a statement of his business showing a solvent balance of over $20,000 together with a declaration that if pressed he would be compelled to make a general assignment, will not support an attachment upon that ground, where there is nothing to impeach his good faith except a gift of land worth $500 to his mother. Wingo v. Purdy, 87 Va. 472 (1891).

And a false statement by debtors that they were solvent, upon which they obtained an extension of credit, and their announcement of their insolvency a month later with the threat that if the creditor brought suit they would make an assignment, preferring another, does not establish a fraudulent intent which will sustain an attachment, whether the representations were innocently or dishonestly made, and though the state prohibits preferences of all the assignor's property. Atlas Furniture Co. v. Freeman, 70 Hun, 13 (1893).

But other facts in conjunction with the threat to assign or dispose of property may be sufficient to show the fraudulent intent necessary to sustain an attachment.

Thus, evidence that a debtor is able to pay a debt but that he put the creditor off from time to time and threatened to assign his property for the benefit of his creditors if sued, is sufficient to go to the jury on the question of the existence of a fraudulent intent which will support an attachment under the California attachment act of 1858, §4. White v. Leszynsky, 14 Cal. 165 (1859).

And a statement by a debtor to his creditor, made upon demand for payment, that he would not pay the debt and should sell and dispose of his property immediately and remove it out of the creditors reach, sufficiently establishes an intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment. Pratt v. Pratt, 2 Pinney, 395, 2 Chund. 48 (1850).

And proof that a firm of debtors had claimed to be entirely solvent, and made a statement of their affairs, showing a large surplus of assets, and soon after claimed to be insolvent and proposed a compromise, giving no explanation of their sudden insolvency, and made threats that unless their offer was accepted they would make an assignment, preferring a designated creditor, in which case the others would get little or nothing, followed by an assignment and the selection of a foreign assignee, is sufficient evidence of fraudulent intent to give jurisdiction to issue an attachment. National Park Bank v. Whitmore, 104 N. Y. 237 (1887).

And in Hanks v. Andrews, 53 Ark. 327 (1890), it was held that representations by a debtor to a creditor that he was doing a prosperous business upon assets three times greater than his liabilities, in order to get an extension of time, and threats that if he declined to allow it he would make such a disposition of his property as to prevent the creditor from realizing, justifies an inference of fraud which will support an attachment.

In that case the court said that the case is to be distinguished from a threat merely to make an assignment, which, being a lawful act and standing alone, furnishes no evidence of an intended fraudulent disposition of property. Ibid.

So, a threat by a debtor that if sued he would make an assignment with preference leaving out those suits so that they would get nothing, coupled with his keeping his store open after his admitted insolvency, and continuing to dispose of his goods and appropriate the avails to other purposes than the payment of his debts, refusing to pay anything and declaring that he would not pay unless his creditors all agreed to take his goods and discharge him, is sufficient to warrant an attachment on the ground of an attempt to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors. Anthony v. Stype, 19 Hun, 265 (1879).

And a conveyance by an insolvent debtor of his entire property in consideration of a sum of money in cash and the assumption by the purchaser of a debt which he pretended to owe to his brother, and giving on the same day a mortgage to such brother, securing such debt, together with a statement to certain creditors that he would give them twenty-five cents on the dollar, and that they might take that or nothing, and that he had got matters fixed so that they could not disturb him, is sufficient to show an intent to defraud which will support an attachment. Miller v. McNair, 65 Wis. 452 (1886).

Some of the cases, however, have seemed to look at the purpose of the threat, and to have acted upon the rule that a threat to do an act though lawful in itself will uphold an attachment where its purpose was to impose conditions upon the creditor or to intimidate him from pursuing the remedies provided by law for the collection of his claim.

Thus, a statement by a debtor to a creditor that if he continued to press him he would make an assignment preferring others, which would result in his not getting a cent, is an effort to intimidate the creditor and thus force him to refrain from exercising his legal right and will warrant an attachment on the ground that the debtor is about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors. United States Net & T. Co. v. Alexander, 42 N. Y. S. R. 608 (1891).

In that case it was said that the question is not as to the debtor's right to assign or prefer creditors, but the effort by his threats to impose upon the plaintiff a condition and thus prevent the creditor from using a legal remedy.

So, the using by a debtor of his power of assigning his property preferentially to intimidate creditors into abstaining from pressing the remedies allowed by law to collect debts, is sufficient to charge him with an intent to defraud them which will support an attachment. Gasherie v. Apple, 14 Abb. Pr. 64 (1861).

And proof that a debtor, who was able to pay all debts, threatened upon being asked to do so that he would make an assignment, and that the creditor could get nothing, and that he would do business under somebody else's name, will support an attachment upon that ground. Ibid.

that the deed was never delivered so as to become effectual as a conveyance. The contention is that Edwin P. Druley took and held the deed merely as agent of the grantor, and that by delivering it to him with instructions to keep it in his pocket, and return it to the grantor in case of his recovery, and to record it only in case of his death, the grantor did not, and did not intend to, absolutely yield dominion over it, but that it remained, down to the time of his death, subject to his control, and liable to be recalled by him at any time. And it would seem that, if the deed was never delivered, it has no tendency to prove the charge of fraud made by the attachment affidavit. But, without determining the question of delivery, we prefer to place our decision upon another ground.

Even if the deed is to be regarded as having been effectually delivered, it must be

In that case the court distinguished Wilson v. Britton, 20 Barb. 562 (1858), and Dickinson v. Benham, 10 Abb. Pr. 360 (1860), set forth supra, in this subdivision, saying that the fact that the condition accompanied the threat to assign seems to have been overlooked in both cases as affecting the question in case of an action by the party threatened.

So, in Livermore v. Rhodes, 27 How. Pr. 506, 8 Robt. 636 (1864), it was held that a threat by a debtor that if he was sued he would turn over all his property and that the creditor wouldn't get a cent, evidences an intention to dispose of property so as to baffle the creditor in the speedy collection of his debt, which of course, could only be done by illegal means, and will therefore sustain an attachment.

b. Making preferences.

Payment of honest debts to one creditor to the exclusion of others cannot be made the basis of a charge of fraud which will sustain an attachment. First Nat. Bank v. Steele, 81 Mich. 93 (1890) (dictum); Stamp v. Herpich, 8 N. Y. S. R. 446 (1887); Morton v. Sterrett, 4 W. L. G. 182 (1859); Scott v. Dexter, 1 N. Y. Week. Dig. 25 (1875).

The intent of an insolvent debtor to secure and take care of persons to whom he claimed to owe confidential moneys, to the exclusion of other creditors, does not justify an attachment upon the ground that he is about to dispose of property with intent to defraud his creditors. Ellison v. Bernstein, 60 How. Pr. 145 (1890).

And a creditor may take adequate security from a debtor without being chargeable with seeking to hinder and delay other creditors so as to justify an attachment against the debtor. Smith v. Boyer, 29 Neb. 76 (1890) (dictum).

The preference by a debtor in good faith of some creditors over others, either by making payment or transferring his property, or by giving chattel mortgages, is not an assignment or disposal of his property with fraudulent intent to hinder, cheat, and delay his creditors for which an attachment may be had. Abernathy Furniture Co. v. Armstrong, 46 Kan. 270 (1901).

Thus, a falling debtor who in good faith pays a debt which he justly owes, and secures an indorser against liability, does not thereby subject himself to attachment upon that ground. Walker v. Adair, 1 Bond. C. C. 158 (1857).

And a conveyance or mortgage by a debtor within sixty days prior to making an assignment for the benefit of creditors, with intent to prefer a particular creditor, is not evidence in itself of an intent to defraud creditors which will support an attachment. Wachter v. Famachon, 62 Wis. 117 (1885).

And a conveyance in contemplation of insolvency and with a design to prefer will not support an attachment in the absence of anything to show that the preference was fraudulent. Stamper v. Hibbs, 94 Ky. 368 (1893).

And that an insolvent debtor is about to sell property consisting of an exempted homestead and other real estate, for a fair price with the purpose of applying the proceeds less than received for his homestead to the payment of his just debts owing to a portion of his creditors, does not establish that he is about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud or delay his other creditors. Eaton v. Wells, 18 Minn. 410 (1872).

So, the execution of mortgages by falling debtors upon their property to creditors to satisfy bona fide debts, thus giving them a preference, will not sustain an attachment at the suit of an unsecured creditor upon the ground that the debtor had or was about to dispose of his property for the purpose of defrauding, hindering, and delaying his creditors. Gregory Grocery Co. v. Young, 53 Kan. 339 (1894); Campbell v. Warner, 22 Kan. 604 (1879); Avery v. Estes, 18 Kan. 506 (1887); Tootle v. Coldwell, 30 Kan. 125 (1883); Miller v. Wichita Overall & B. Mfg. Co. 53 Kan. 75 (1894).

And the execution by a debtor of a mortgage on a portion of his property, and his refusal to confess judgments or give security to another creditor, declaring an intention to manage his property himself, does not justify an attachment on the ground of an intended fraudulent disposition of his property. Connell v. Lasecells, 20 Wend. 77 (1838).

So, an assignment for creditors by a debtor, made in good faith and upon a valid consideration, providing for the payment of one class of creditors in preference to another, does not show an intent to defraud which will support an attachment. Strauss v. Rose, 59 Md. 525 (1882).

Nor does a voluntary assignment. Bryce v. Foot, 25 S. C. 437 (1896); Foley v. Bitter, 84 Md. 646 (1871).

And an assignment for the benefit of creditors in which debts due the debtor's wife and brother are preferred does not establish an intention to defraud creditors which will sustain an attachment, where the indebtedness to the wife and brother is bona fide and clearly proved. Farwell v. Brown, 1 Fed. Rep. 128 (1880).

And an assignment for the benefit of creditors by a banker after notice given to two depositors with the banker's knowledge, upon which they drew out their deposits, does not show such an intent to defraud creditors as will support an attachment. Wearne v. France, 3 Wyo. 273 (1899).

So, proof that a firm of debtors were insolvent and had turned over to two creditors portions of their goods amounting to less than one half of their respective debts, and had refused to turn over any goods to another creditor, will not sustain an attachment at the suit of the latter upon the ground that they had disposed of or were about to dispose of their property with intent to defraud creditors. Horton v. Fancher, 14 Hun. 172 (1877).

But an assignment for the benefit of creditors by a firm preferring a debt due to one of the partners will sustain an attachment as a transfer with intent to defraud. Citizens' Bank v. Williams, 35 N. Y. S. R. 542 (1891).

So, a debtor who induces home creditors to attach his property does not thereby render himself liable to attachment by other creditors, where he was actuated by the purpose to secure their debts in preference to others, and it was not done with a view to secure any advantage to himself, though it had the effect to hinder and delay the others. Heideman- conceded that there is no evidence of express fraud, or what is usually termed "fraud in fact." There is no evidence of any actual intention on the part of the grantor to hinder or delay his creditors. But the evidence tends to show that the deed, though absolute on its face, was intended by the parties as a mortgage to secure the $10,000 note given by the grantor to his mother, and the rule is supported by many authorities that a conveyance of lands, absolute on its face, but intended as a mortgage or security for a debt, is fraudulent and void as against existing creditors, although there may have been no actual intent to defraud. Among the authorities so holding, the following may be consulted: Sims v. Gaines, 64 Ala. 393; Watkins v. Arms, 64 N. H. 99; Gregory v. Perkins, 4 Dev. L. 50; Halcorn v. Ray, 1 Ired. L. 340; Coolidge v. Melvin, 43 N. H. 510;

Benoit Saddlery Co. v. Urner, 24 Mo. App. 534 (1887).

And that insolvent debtors instigated and caused attachment suits to be commenced for the purpose of preferring the attaching creditors at the expense of other creditors, will not defeat the attachment where there is nothing to show that the claims of the attaching creditors were not honest or that there was any secret trust created. Landauer v. Victor, 69 Wis. 434 (1887).

And the refusal of a debtor to pay the money she had, being about one third of the creditor's claim, and using the same for other purposes, coupled with a denial in general terms that she had money, is not fraudulent and does not show such an intent to hinder or delay creditors as will furnish grounds for an attachment by those who are not paid, as she has the right to prefer one to another. Keith v. McDonald, 81 Ill. App. 17 (1888).

So, an intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment will not be imputed from a preference by a debtor in failing circumstances in the payment of his debts, though such a preference would operate to defeat a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors. McPike v. Atwell, 34 Kan. 142 (1885).

And a wrongful preference by a corporation of one creditor over others, or the giving of notes and permitting judgment to be taken thereon so as to give such preference, does not furnish ground for an attachment at the suit of the unpaid creditor. Stone v. Bank, 1 Ohio Dec. 309 (1894).

And a preference given by an insolvent corporation in a transfer of its property is not such fraud in fact as will support an attachment by an unpaid creditor. Holbrook v. Peters & M. Co. 8 Wash. 344 (1894).

But, although a debtor has a right to prefer a particular creditor, if he conveys his property to a trustee, not for that purpose merely, but for the express purpose and with the deliberate intent, to defraud a particular creditor or class of creditors and wholly defeat the recovery of their debts, such intent being the controlling motive in the debtor's mind, it will justify an attachment upon the ground of a disposition of his property with intent to defraud creditors, though the conveyance might be valid as to the trustee. Wilson v. Elser, 7 Coldw. 31 (1890).

And an intent to give an unfair preference is a ground for attachment under the Louisiana statute. See Chaffe v. Mackenzie, 43 La. Ann. 1063 (1891).

And an unfair preference given by an insolvent debtor to a creditor who was his sister-in-law, together with misrepresentations intentionally made to lull creditors into a sense of security, justifies an attachment of his property. Stevens v. Helpman, 29 La. Ann. 635 (1877).

See also, supra, c. Mortgaging or pledging property; infra, 1. Transfers in payment of debts; and infra, 1. Confession of judgment.

1. Transfers in payment of debts.

A transfer of property by an insolvent debtor to a creditor in payment of a debt, accompanied by delivery of possession, is not a ground for an attachment if there be no intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, though it may have that tendency, where there is no question of bankruptcy. Bents v. Rockey, 60 Pa. 71 (1871).

And is not fraudulent and will not support an attachment though he made false representations as to his condition and intention at or about the time of the sale, unless the vendees were parties to the fraud. Chouteau v. Sherman, 11 Mo. 386 (1848).

So, the turning out by a debtor of the property of a firm of which he was a member to pay and secure a particular debt, and thereby to prefer that to other obligations of the firm, does not warrant an attachment upon the ground of a disposition of property with intent to defraud, where the bona fides of the obligation are in no wise impeached. Dintruff v. Tuthill, 62 Hun, 591 (1892).

And an assignment by a partner of his interest in the assets of the firm to pay a debt he owed his wife for borrowed money will not support an attachment on that ground where it does not appear that it was not an honest debt. Edick v. Green, 38 Hun, 202 (1885).

And proof that a debtor had permitted a note to go to protest, and had been sued on another note, and transferred some of his goods to different parties to liquidate their accounts, and was about to make a general assignment, will not warrant the issue of an attachment upon the ground that he had disposed of or was about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud. Newwitt v. Mansell, 33 N. Y. S. R. 595 (1891).

So, a promise by a debtor to allow his creditors to take possession of his property at any time that he might feel insecure does not tend to show that the debtor is about to dispose of his property with the fraudulent intent for which an attachment may be had. Parsons v. Stockbridge, 43 Ind. 121 (1873).

But a transfer of all his property by an insolvent debtor to a creditor in payment of a debt, accompanied by an understanding that the debtor should get back a part of the property for working out the stock, is invalid and a good ground for attachment. Bents v. Rockey, 60 Pa. 71 (1871).

And an attachment issued on proof that the debtor, who has made a general assignment, made a payment of over $2,000 to his wife one day previous thereto, will not be vacated upon proof that about ten years before his wife had obtained $2,500 from her mother which she had delivered to her husband, as that does not establish an indebtedness of the attachment debtor to his wife. Hyman v. Kapp, 22 N. Y. Week. Dig. 310 (1885).

So, a transfer by a debtor whose property is easily separable, of a quantity thereof in excess of the amount of the indebtedness, the creditor paying the difference in money, is fraudulent and will sustain an attachment; and where the creditor is privy to the fraudulent design the purchase cannot be supported as against attachment creditors. McDonald v. Gaunt, 30 Kan. 608 (1888).

And a debtor who is oppressed with debt and unable to meet his obligations cannot transfer practically all of his unencumbered property to secure, not only an existing debt, but also a new debt then created for an advance of a large amount in cash, without rendering himself subject to attachment upon the ground of a disposal of property with intent to defraud creditors. Gallagher v. Goldfrank, 75 Tex. 522 (1890).

And an intent to defraud which will sustain an Winkley v. Hill, 9 N. H. 81, 31 Am. Dec. 215; Friedley v. Hamilton, 17 Serg. & R. 70; Harris v. Sumner, 3 Pick. 129. See also Metropolitan Bank v. Godfrey, 23 Ill. 579. But we do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the question whether a deed absolute on its face, but intended as a mortgage, is constructively fraudulent or not.

The question thus arises whether, under our statute, an attachment will issue where the fraud charged is a legal or constructive fraud only, as contradistinguished from express or intentional fraud, usually denominated "fraud in fact." This question, so far as we are advised, has never been decided by this court, but it has received consideration by the appellate courts in several cases, and in each case it has been decided in the negative. It first arose in the second district, in attachment is established by proof that a debtor in embarrassed circumstances has transferred to a creditor an amount of property largely in excess of his indebtedness, to the exclusion of other creditors, without any previous negotiations and almost immediately after other creditors had pressed him for payment, and that the vendee did not know the value of the property he bought. Nelson Distilling Co. v. Voessmeyer, 25 Mo. App. 673 (1887).

1. Confession of judgment.

It would seem that the right of a debtor to confess judgment for an honest indebtedness without subjecting himself to a charge of entertaining a fraudulent intent must be coextensive with his right to pay or perform such indebtedness.

Thus, a confession of a judgment by a debtor in favor of a bona fide creditor for a just and honest debt is not a disposal of, or evidence of an intent to dispose of, property to defraud creditors which will support an attachment. Wyman v. Wilmarth, 1 S. D. 172 (1890).

And a confession of a judgment by a debtor in favor of his wife does not show an intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment in the absence of any showing that it was not for an actual debt, or that the property was sold thereunder for less than it would bring at a public sale. Thomas v. Dickinson, 33 N. Y. S. R. 736 (1890).

And a confession of judgment made by a debtor who had received a fund raised by a charitable contribution for the benefit of his brother in trust, which he had used in erecting a house on the rear of his own lot for the use of such brother, made to the brother to the amount of the trust fund, does not show a disposition of property with fraudulent intent which will support an attachment. Kline v. O'Donnell, 6 Kulp, 334, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 38 (1891).

So, in Lennig v. Senior, 21 W. N. C. 379 (1886), it was held that a confession of judgment by an insolvent father to his son could not be held to be a fraudulent disposition of property within the Pennsylvania fraudulent attachment act, as he did not dispose of his property, the law disposed of it.

And in Wright v. Ewen, 24 W. N. C. 111 (1889), it was held that a confession of judgment by a partner in favor of creditors who claim to be creditors of the firm, and who are admitted to stand in that relation by the confessing partner, does not constitute an assignment and disposal of property with intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment, as a confessed judgment cannot be presumed to be fraudulent.

In Ditchburn v. Jermyn & G. Co-Op. Assn. 3 Pa. Dist. R. 635 (1883), however, the court disapproved of and refused to follow Lennig v. Senior, and Wright v. Ewen, supra.

And in that case it was held that a confession of judgment by a failing debtor which virtually swallows up his whole assets made without consideration, is a disposition of property within the meaning of the fraudulent attachment act of 1869, which will support an attachment.

So, the giving of judgment notes by an insolvent debtor in good faith for a genuine indebtedness does not establish such a fraudulent intent as will 80 L. R. A.

justify an attachment at the suit of another creditor. Standard Oil Co. v. Morrison, A. & A. Co. 54 Ill. App. 531 (1894).

But a confession of a judgment by a debtor with intent to hinder and delay creditors by having his property held up under execution issued thereon is a fraudulent disposition of property which will support an attachment under the Missouri attachment act. Field v. Liverman, 17 Mo. 218 (1862).

And confessions of judgments by a debtor, upon which execution was issued and the debtor's property seized for the purpose of forcing other creditors to agree to a settlement because the property was placed beyond their reach, will support an attachment upon the ground of a disposition of property with intent to defraud, though the confessions were given for debts actually owed. Galle v. Tode, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 147 (1891).

So, judgment voluntarily confessed by a debtor to a creditor, which had no consideration for one half its entire amount, in connection with other circumstances rendering it difficult to regard it as a straightforward, honest transaction, will support an attachment under the Pennsylvania fraudulent attachment act of 1869. Rubinsky v. Walenk, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. 401 (1895).

And a confession of judgment by a debtor six days before the execution of an assignment for the benefit of creditors in favor of one of the assignees is a proper circumstance to go to the jury on the question of the existence of an intent to defraud which will support an attachment, where there is proof to connect such assignee with the assignor in the fraudulent disposition of his property. Main v. Lynch, 54 Md. 668 (1890).

k. Transfers and withdrawals by partners.

As a general rule any disposition of partnership effects which operates to defeat the right of joint creditors and to give individual creditors priority over them will be regarded as showing an intent to defraud them which will support an attachment.

Thus, a fraudulent transfer by a partner of his interests in the firm to his copartner makes him sole owner of the firm property, and gives his individual creditors a preference over the joint creditors in the marshaling of the assets, and will support an attachment on the ground of a transfer with intent to defraud firm creditors. Hirsch v. Hutchison, 64 How. Pr. 368, 3 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 108 (1883).

And a transfer by one partner to another of his partnership interest at a time when both partners and the firm were insolvent, and an assignment by the purchasing partner for the benefit of his creditors without preference or mention of partnership liabilities, made upon the same day, followed by an offer to settle at 60 cents on the dollar, is fraudulent and void, and a ground for attachment as to partnership creditors, as having been made for the purpose of covering up and concealing the debtor's property, and to defeat the right of partnership creditors to preference in the firm assets. Collier v. Hanna, 71 Md. 253 (1899).

So, an assignment for the benefit of creditors by a firm in which a debt due from one of the individual partners was preferred is a transfer with intent to Shove v. Farwell, 9 Ill. App. 356, and there the court said: "The law does not allow a creditor to ignore the process of the common law in the collection of his debt, and resort to a summary seizure of the debtor's property upon mesne process, from the fact alone that the debtor has, within two years, sold his property, or any part of it, or has secured some other creditor by mortgaging or pledging it, even though the attaching creditor should thereby be hindered or delayed in the collection of a just debt. Another element must exist in the transaction—the fraud of the debtor. And in our opinion the statute contemplates that this fraud shall be one of fact as contradistinguished from a legal or constructive fraud. If a man has shown himself to be dishonest, by making a conveyance of his property, designing thereby to delay and hinder his creditors, and such effect is defraud creditors, which will justify an attachment. Citizens' Bank v. Williams, 35 N. Y. S. R. 542 (1891); Keith v. Fink, 47 Ill. 272 (1868); Heye v. Bolles, 2 Daly, 281, 38 How. Pr. 266 (1867).

And an assignment by a partner of partnership property for the payment of firm and individual debts, without providing that the firm debts shall be first paid, warrants an inference of fraudulent intent which will support an attachment. Friend v. Michaelis, 15 Abb. N. C. 364.

And such an assignment preferring a dormant partner will sustain an attachment. Clafin v. Hirsch, 19 N. Y. Week. Dig. 248 (1884).

So, a conveyance of his property by a partner with intent to defraud his creditors will support an attachment by a firm creditor though it is not shown that all of the partners participated in the fraudulent intent, as the firm creditors are his creditors. Evans v. Virgin, 69 Wis. 153 (1887).

And the appropriation by a debtor of money belonging to his firm to the payment of his individual debts is a fraud upon creditors of the firm and will support an attachment. Keith v. Armstrong, 66 Wis. 226 (1886).

And the absconding of one partner, and the disposition of the whole partnership effects by the other partner, who remained in possession and was insolvent, are sufficient to establish an intent to delay and hinder creditors of the firm which will sustain an attachment. Sellew v. Christfield, 1 Handy (Ohio) 86 (1864).

In Citizens' Bank v. Williams, 128 N. Y. 77 (1891), however, it was held that the giving of joint and several promissory notes by copartners for the individual debt of one of them, and the subsequent execution as a firm and as individuals of an assignment in which they declared that the notes should be paid out of the proceeds of the firm property, does not constitute an assignment with intent to defraud creditors which will support an attachment.

So, the turning out by a partner of firm property to pay or secure a particular debt, thereby preferring that to other obligations of the firm, does not of itself show an intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment. Dintruff v. Tuthill, 62 Hun, 591 (1892).

And an assignment by a partner of his interest to pay a debt due his wife will not support an attachment where the debt was an honest one. Edick v. Green, 38 Hun, 202 (1885).

Nor will a transfer by a limited partnership of its effects in payment of a valid debt, for the purpose of preferring the creditor, sustain an attachment, though such transfer is forbidden by law. Casola v. Vasquez, 147 N. Y. 258 (1895).

And a creditor cannot sue out an attachment against a surviving partner because he has been faithless to the trust which the law clothed him with for the benefit of firm creditors, but must bring him within the letter of the attachment statute by showing a disposition with intent to defraud, the same as in case of any other debtor. Roach v. Brannon, 57 Miss. 490 (1879).

And the use of the firm property by a surviving partner in good faith and with the acquiescence of the representative of the deceased partner to continue the business on his own account and in his 30 L. R. A.

own name and raising money upon the credit given him by the possession of such property and the disposal thereof, do not show an intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment. Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, 106 U. S. 648, 27 L. ed. 211 (1882).

Nor are the failure of a debtor, upon winding up his interests in a store and getting out his share of the partnership, to apply the money to his debts, and the payment only of a debt due to his mother, alone sufficient to show a fraudulent intent upon which an attachment will lie. Mack v. Jones, 31 Fed. Rep. 189 (1887).

And an investment by a surviving partner of a part of the firm's assets in a retail liquor license will not sustain an attachment of the firm property on the ground of a disposal of firm property with intent to defraud creditors, where his intent was to sell out the stock at retail to realize a profit for the benefit of firm creditors. Roach v. Brannon, 57 Miss. 490 (1879).

And a confession of judgment by a partner in favor of persons claimed to be creditors of the firm does not constitute a disposition of property with intent to defraud which will support an attachment. Wright v. Ewen, 24 W. N. C. 111 (1899).

So, simply drawing moneys upon private account by merchant partners within small and reasonable limits, whether for the payment of their individual expenses or the payment of their honest individual obligations, does not show an intent to defraud creditors which will support an attachment, though they knew that they were in some difficulty, so long as they had reasonable expectation of extricating themselves. McKinney v. Rosenband, 23 Fed. Rep. 735 (1885).

But the drawing by members of a firm about to make an assignment of much larger amounts from the funds thereof than they had previously been accustomed to do, not for the purpose of paying debts then due, constitutes a withdrawal of firm assets from the reach of firm creditors for the purpose of applying them to their individual use, and will support an attachment though the property thus taken was subsequently returned. Globe Woolen Co. v. Carhart, 37 How. Pr. 408 (1884).

And the taking, by insolvent partners who have made an assignment, of a sum in excess of the amount exempted by statute from levy and sale under execution from the assets in the hands of the assignee to be appropriated to their own uses and withheld from creditors unless they should be able to secure a compromise at a certain figure, is a disposition of property with intent to defraud creditors, which will sustain an attachment. Vietor v. Henlein, 34 Hun, 522 (1885).

The supporting by the surviving partner of the family of the deceased partner out of the firm assets for a short time after an epidemic of yellow fever is not a disposal of the property of the firm with intent to defraud creditors which will support an attachment. Roach v. Brannon, 57 Miss. 490 (1879).

1. Formation of and transfer to corporation or partnership.

The formation of a corporation by a debtor, and the transfer of property to it, cannot be regarded as produced, then, for the space of two years, the statute permits the creditor to treat him as one who may repeat the fraud, and authorizes its prevention by a seizure of his property, upon mesne process, and hold it to answer any judgment that may be rendered in the action." The same question arose in the same district in First Nat. Bank v. Kurtz, 22 Ill. App. 218, where the same conclusion was again announced. So in the first district the same conclusion was announced in Dempsey v. Bowen, 25 Ill. App. 192, and in Rhodes v. Matthai, 35 Ill. App. 147. The decision of the appellate court in the present case is merely an application of what has become a settled rule of law in that court. In Spencer v. Deagle, 84 Mo. 455, an attachment writ was issued under a statute apparently identical with ours, and it was held to be error for the court to refuse to instruct a fraudulent transfer which will support an attachment, unless an actual fraudulent design is shown. Market Nat. Bank v. Bethel, 32 Ohio L. J. 135 (1894); Union Rolling Mill Co. v. Packard, 18 Bull. 591, 1 C. C. 76, as given in 4 Bares' (Ohio) Dig. 84.

And an insolvent debtor having a large stock of raw material on hand, and with large contracts to sell the articles to be manufactured from it, is not liable to attachment for disposing of his property with intent to defraud his creditors by reason of converting his business into a corporation and taking shares of stock in lieu thereof and conveying all his business and property to it in the reasonable belief and with the intent of being able thereby to provide better for his creditors, although creditors first getting judgment and levying might have collected in full. Beltman v. McKenzie, 11 Bull. 272 (1879), as given in 4 Bares' (Ohio) Dig. 84.

So, a transfer by a debtor having a large stock of goods on hand which he bought at an insolvent sale, of a part of the stock to his brother under an arrangement for a partnership whereby the brother was to manage the new store then started and put in an equal amount of money, which was done, does not show a fraudulent intent which will support an attachment. Mack v. Jones, 81 Fed. Rep. 189 (1887).

m. Overbuying.

Overbuying by a debtor, who was dazed with the success of his business and thought he could enlarge it, does not show an intent to defraud which will support an attachment and can only be looked to as a circumstance tending to show that some specific transfer was made with intent to defraud creditors. Mack v. Jones, 81 Fed. Rep. 189 (1887).

And that a debtor was insolvent when he made purchases, and bought more goods than he needed, and failed to disclose his insolvency, does not, in the absence of false statements, show such an intent. Ellison v. Bernstein, 60 How. Pr. 145 (1890).

But extraordinary purchases of goods far greater than the usual course of business requires, by a debtor knowing himself to be insolvent, is sufficient evidence of fraudulent intent to support an attachment. Clafin v. Einstein, 6 W. N. C. 298 (1878).

n. Refusal to pay.

It is actual fraud and evil intent to hinder and delay creditors, and not a mere refusal or failure to pay debts, which will support an attachment upon the ground that a debtor is fraudulently withholding his property from the payment of his debts. Durr v. Jackson, 59 Ala. 208 (1877).

And a refusal by a debtor to pay a debt at a time when he owed not to exceed $150 and had over $1,600 in cash which could have been used to pay it, is not sufficient to sustain an attachment upon the ground that he is about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors. Tootle v. Coldwell, 80 Kan. 125 (1883).

And that a debtor has been requested to pay a debt and failed to do so, and is about to sell his stock and remove to another state, will not support an attachment under the New York Code in the absence of anything to show that such disposal was with intent to defraud creditors. Seltman v. Jaschenorosky, 3 Ohio L. J. 9 (1890).

And evidence that a debtor had made promises to pay which he had broken, and that he was in a precarious situation if pressed, and that he intended to retain control of his property as long as the indulgence of his creditors and the law might permit, are not alone sufficient to warrant an attachment upon the ground of the seclusion or disposition of property with intent to defraud. O'Reilly v. Freel, 37 How. Pr. 277 (1877).

But the refusal by a debtor to pay while admitting her ability, and refusal of all information as to stock on hand and as to assets, and proof that persons in her employ were seen taking goods from her store in a suspicious manner and leaving them with her brother-in-law, will sustain an attachment on the ground that she had disposed of or was about to dispose of her property with intent to defraud her creditors, where she denied making sales to such brother-in-law. Rothschild v. Mooney, 38 N. Y. S. R. 565 (1891).

And refusal by a debtor to pay, together with a declaration that he would not pay unless his creditors all agreed to take his goods and discharge him, and a threat that if sued he would assign with preferences, leaving out those who sued, and his keeping his store open and disposing of goods and appropriating the avails, in addition to his admitted insolvency, warrant an inference of intent to defraud which will sustain an attachment. Anthony v. Stype, 19 Hun. 265 (1879).

And a debtor owing a large debt that is past due, and having a large sum of money that he ought to pay upon it, who refuses to pay anything without giving any reason for such refusal, and attempts to settle upon his intended wife a large sum of money wholly disproportionate to his property, and declares that he does not intend to pay his chief creditor until he gets ready but does intend to bring him to terms, and that he can speedily fix his property so that he can get nothing, and threatens that if he pushes him he will make him lose all he can,—is subject to attachment upon the ground that he is about to remove or dispose of his property with intent to defraud. Ross v. Wigg, 6 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 263 (1884).

o. Statements and misrepresentations by debtor.

The debtor frequently furnishes evidence of his fraudulent intent by his own statements.

Thus, a presumption of a disposition of property with intent to defraud creditors which will sustain an attachment under the Nevada statute is raised by the debtor telling the creditor that he has disposed of all of his property and will pay when he gets ready. Bowers v. Beck, 2 Nev. 139 (1866).

So, a statement by a debtor to his creditor that he would not pay his claim unless all his creditors would compromise, and that he had mortgaged all his property upon a claim which he had a year to pay, and was not obliged to pay his creditors, and that he had done so to protect himself from creditors, in connection with the fact that he continued in possession of the stock of mortgaged goods, disposing of them daily, will sustain an attachment upon the ground of a disposal of his property with intent to delay, if not to defraud, his creditors. Blake v. Sherman, 12 Minn. 420 (1867).

the jury that, to render the deed of trust there in question fraudulent as to the defendant's creditors, it must appear that it was executed for that purpose,—that it was not enough that the effect of the deed was to delay his creditors, but it must have been executed with that purpose and intent. While some decisions perhaps may be found in other states supporting the contrary view, we are disposed to think that the interpretation put upon our statute by the appellate court is the correct one. It seems to be the policy of our attachment law to give creditors the right to seize the property of their debtors on original or mesne process, and hold it for the satisfaction of such judgments as may be subsequently recovered, in those cases where the situation or conduct of the debtors is or has been such as to raise a reasonable apprehension that the ordinary common-law processes of the court will be thwarted, and thus rendered unavailing.

The Revised Statutes of 1845 authorized attachments for only the first five of the nine

And statements by a debtor engaged in general mercantile business, disclosing a determination to defeat the claims of a creditor, and arrangements made pursuant to such intention, together with the fact that the stock of goods had during several months been converted into cash as rapidly as possible, and depleted in the aggregate several thousand dollars, and no satisfactory account given of the disposition of the proceeds, will sustain a finding of a disposal or concealment of property with fraudulent intent necessary to sustain an attachment. Reed Bros. Co. v. First Nat. Bank (Neb.) 64 N. W. Rep. 701 (1895).

And a statement by debtors to a creditor that they had executed to their sister a bill of sale of all their stock for a specified amount, and a statement by the sister that she had loaned money to the debtors and taken no security for it, and that no bill of sale had been executed by her, sufficiently show a transfer with intent to defraud which will support an attachment. Boyd v. Miller, 34 N. Y. Supp. 1023 (1896).

So, a statement by a debtor that he would be glad if a creditor ever got his pay, together with evidence that he had left the county and gone to Canada with intent to remain there, taking a part of his personal property with him, and that he was offering his property in the county for sale, sufficiently shows a design to dispose of property with intent to defraud creditors to sustain an attachment. Rosenfield v. Howard, 15 Barb. 546 (1853).

And proof that a wife allowed her husband to take possession of all her money, coupled with a falsehood as to the purpose for which he took it, sufficiently establishes an intention to defraud her creditors to sustain an attachment. Anderson v. O'Reilly, 54 Barb. 620 (1890).

Statements made by a debtor to a creditor that he could recover nothing, and that judgment against him would be worth nothing, however, will not support an attachment upon the ground of the disposal or intended disposal of property with intent to defraud creditors, where no such disposal or intended disposal is shown and it is shown that he has just rented another shop and extended his business. Moulou v. Roengarden, 22 Ia. Ann. 531 (1870).

And evidence that a debtor had made two assignments of property to the same person, and had then said that he had no property and could pay no debts, will not support an attachment on that ground. Miller v. Brinkerhoff, 4 Denio, 118, 47 Am. Dec. 243 (1847).

And a statement by a debtor upon being pressed by a creditor that he expects to realize money from sources not within his reasonable expectation does not tend to prove that he is about to dispose of his property with fraudulent intent, for which an attachment will lie under the Indiana statute. Parsons v. Stockbridge, 42 Ind. 121 (1873).

So, misrepresentations by a debtor as to his financial condition will not sustain an attachment upon the ground that he had disposed of or secreted his property with intent to defraud. Fleimann v. Sickle, 13 N. Y. S. R. 399 (1888); Stamp v. Herpich, 8 30 L. R. A.

N. Y. S. R. 446 (1887); Goldschmidt v. Herschorn, 13 N. Y. S. R. 560 (1888).

Want of precision in statements made to creditors, and discrepancies between such statements and the exact showing by the debtor's books, are not to be taken as circumstances showing a fraudulent intent for which an attachment will lie. Mack v. Jones, 81 Fed. Rep. 189 (1887).

And false representations by a debtor as to his condition and intention, followed by a conveyance of property to pay a debt justly due, will not support an attachment unless the vendees were parties to the fraud. Chouteau v. Sherman, 11 Mo. 385 (1848).

And the exhibit by a failing debtor of his liabilities showing cash on hand and book debts but not the value of his stock is not such a concealment of assets with intent to defraud creditors as will support an attachment, where it appears that the stock consisted of manufactured articles in an unfinished state which were not readily marketable and the value of which was subject to fair conjecture. Kipling v. Corbin, 65 How. Pr. 12 (1833).

But the utter insolvency of a debtor and his assignment for the benefit of creditors nine months after a showing made by him of the ownership of net assets of nearly $20,000, justify the conclusion that the assignment was made with intent to defraud creditors, and warrant an attachment. Buhl v. Ball, 41 Hun, 61 (1880).

And a claim by a debtor to be solvent and to have a surplus of from $10,000 to $20,000, followed by a bill of sale of his entire stock, fixtures, etc., on the following day to his wife for a consideration of $1 and a past-due debt of $7,500, and an announcement of his suspension and insolvency upon the next day, and a general assignment two days thereafter, —sufficiently indicates a fraudulent intent for which an attachment may issue. Seckendorf v. Ketcham, 67 How. Pr. 523 (1884).

So, representations by a debtor to his creditor that he was doing a prosperous business upon assets three times greater than his liabilities for the purpose of obtaining an extension of time, in connection with threats to dispose of his property so as to prevent the creditor from realizing anything in case of refusal, will sustain an attachment. Hanks v. Andrews, 53 Ark. 327 (1890).

And proof of representations by a firm of debtors that they were doing a good business and had ample means to meet their obligations, and that four weeks later they failed and confessed judgments chiefly to relatives, having hardly sufficient property to pay them, and were largely indebted to the trade, is sufficient prima facie to sustain an attachment upon the ground of a disposition with intent to defraud. Wickham v. Stern, 23 N. Y. S. R. 154 (1889).

And proof that debtors stated that they were worth $40,000, and were doing a cash business at the time of purchasing goods, and that a few weeks later, when the indebtedness became due, they declared they had no money and did not know whether they were solvent or not, and that within a month their stock which had amounted to $20,000 in value, had become reduced to $2,000 and causes for attachment specified in our present attachment act, viz.: (1) Where the debtor is not a resident of the state; (2) where he conceals himself, or stands in defiance of an officer, so that process cannot be served upon him; (3) where he has departed from the state with the intention of having his effects removed from the state; (4) where he is about to remove from the state with the intention of having his effects removed from the state; and (5) where he is about to remove his property from the state, to the injury of the creditor suing. Rev. Stat. 1881, p. 128. Here the writ was given only where the debtor was already a nonresident, and so beyond the reach of the ordinary processes of the law, or where there was an affirmative intention and design on his part to place his person and property, or his property alone, beyond the reach of those processes. The writ was given for the purpose of seizing the property so as to forestall its threatened removal, and to hold it as security for the judgment to be recovered.

It cannot be doubted, we think, that when the statute was so amended as to add the three causes for attachment set up in this case, the legislature was acting in furtherance of the same general intention expressed in the original act. The writ was not given for the that they were then packing it up and removing it, —will support an attachment upon that ground. Talcott v. Rosenberg, 8 Abb. N. S. 297 (1870).

As to disappearance or depreciation of stock, see also infra, q. Miscellaneous cases.

p. Conversion of property.

A fraudulent conversion of property will not support an attachment, though possession was obtained with intent to convert it. Finlay v. Bryson, 84 Mo. 664 (1884).

And that a debtor employed money received from his creditor for purposes other than that for which it was received, furnishes no ground for an attachment upon the ground of an intended fraudulent disposition of property. Allen v. Herschorn, 9 Abb. Pr. N. S. 80 (1870).

And proof that one who held property for another with liberty to sell it and pay for it out of the proceeds sold such property and applied the proceeds to his own use, will not sustain an attachment upon the ground of a disposition of property with intent to defraud, as it does not appear that the debtor disposed of any of his own property. German Bank v. Dash, 60 How. Pr. 124 (1880).

But a failure by a debtor, who had received goods from a creditor for sale upon an agreement to account, to make return for a large sale for cash made by him will sustain an attachment. Powell v. Matthews, 10 Mo. 49 (1846).

q. Miscellaneous cases.

The cases in this subdivision, not properly falling within any of the above subdivisions, are here collected because, from their miscellaneous character, they are not readily susceptible of further or different classification.

Evidence that a debtor's stock had decreased at a more rapid rate than could be accounted for by his legitimate business will uphold an attachment upon the ground that he was disposing of property with intent to defraud his creditors. White v. Reichert, 14 N. Y. Week. Dig. 238 (1883).

And evidence that a debtor firm had a stock of goods worth $40,000 two and one half years before, and during that time it had borrowed $45,000, and that the business had not been unprosperous but that its stock had greatly diminished in quantity and value, and that they were insolvent and one of the firm had proposed a scheme for the purpose of defrauding certain firm creditors, is prima facie sufficient to warrant an attachment upon that ground. Frankel v. Hays, 20 N. Y. Week. Dig. 417 (1885).

So, evidence that after nightfall mules belonging to a debtor were clandestinely taken out of the town and run off to a distance of some 10 miles when they were captured, and that the person in charge made contradictory statements as to whom they belonged, will sustain an attachment upon the ground that the debtor was about to dispose of or secrete his property with intent to defraud creditors. Brown v. Hawkins, 65 N. C. 645 (1871).

And in Blackinton v. Rumpf (Wash.) 40 Pac. Rep. 1063 (1890), an attachment upon the ground that the debtors were assigning, secreting, or disposing of their property, or were about to do so, with intent to defraud their creditors, was sustained upon a statement of a secret agreement to carry on business in the name of one and to divide the proceeds and to defraud persons from whom they might purchase, and evidence that they purchased goods of the attachment creditor which were not paid for and that the debtor in whose name the business was carried on disposed of his property to the other.

But the secretion of a debtor's books by an employee will not support an attachment upon the ground that he was about to secrete his property with intent to defraud his creditors, where there is nothing to connect him with the act of his employee, or to show that he acted under authority. Fitzgerald v. Belden, 49 How. Pr. 225 (1875).

And an attachment on the ground of secreting property with intent to defraud creditors, and concealment to avoid service of a summons, will not be granted because the debtor, who failed to pay at the promised time, had drawn all of his money out of the bank and was absent from his place of business when his creditor called for payment, where the place was open and his business was being conducted in the usual course by the clerk, who made no apparent effort to conceal his employer's whereabouts. Reynolds v. Horton, 67 Hun. 122 (1893).

And the removal of property of a debtor from his store by a third person claiming to be his assignee when no assignment had been filed in the clerk's office will not warrant an attachment upon the ground of a disposition of property with intent to defraud creditors. Denzer v. Mundy, 5 Robt. 636 (1866).

And mere neglect to defend actions brought against a debtor without any showing of fraud or of collusion between the debtor and creditor, in which judgment is obtained and the property of the debtor is taken, will not support an attachment upon that ground. Rigney v. Tallmadge, 17 How. Pr. 556 (1859).

So, the payment by a mutual benefit association of death claims subsequently maturing is not a disposition of or secreting the property of the association with intent to defraud its creditors which will sustain an attachment at the suit of the holder of a claim which had previously matured. Knorr v. New York State Mut. Ben. Assn. 79 Hun. 83 (1894).

And that the debtor has become dissipated, careless, and almost a sot, is greatly in debt and daily becoming more so, and is truly insolvent, together with a statement of the creditor's belief that he will dispose of his property in order to defraud his creditors, will not support an attachment. Jackson v. Burke, 4 Helsk. 610 (1871).

purpose of enabling the creditor to attack a transaction which is only constructively fraudulent, but to enable him to seize the property of his debtor in cases where fraud has been committed or contemplated of such character as to raise a reasonable apprehension that by further fraudulent acts the debtor will put his property and effects beyond the reach of legal process. But such apprehension does not arise from the commission of a mere legal or constructive fraud. There evil intention, moral turpitude, and actual dishonesty are wanting. Equity, it is true, will set such transactions aside in a proper proceeding, at the instance of creditors; but no inference arises that the debtor will attempt, by any dishonest disposition of his property, to interfere with his creditors in the assertion of their just rights. We are of the opinion, then, that granting writs of attachment in cases where only legal or constructive fraud is shown is outside of the general scheme and purpose of the attachment law.

It is apparent that any other construction of the statute would often lead to consequences extremely oppressive. Thus, a sale of goods, where possession has not actually been delivered to the purchaser, though valid as between the parties, is constructively fraudulent as to the creditors of the seller, and the goods may be seized by them on execution as his goods, however honest he may have been in the transaction. In contemplation of law he has made, or attempted to make, a disposition of his property which is constructively fraudulent, and, if attachments may issue for constructive frauds, he has thereby subjected himself, however innocent he may have been, to all such attachment writs as his creditors may see fit to sue out against his property for the period of two years. So, if a debtor, in perfect good faith, executes a chattel mortgage to secure an honest debt, but fails to have it executed, acknowledged, and recorded in all respects as required by the statute, the transaction is constructively fraudulent and void as against his creditors. But can it be said that he thereby subjects himself, for a period of two years, to attachments by any of his creditors? Other similar illustrations without number will suggest themselves. In view of these various considerations, it seems to us to be very clear that the legislature, in authorizing writs of attachment in cases where the debtor has fraudulently conveyed or assigned his property so as to hinder or delay his creditors, could have had in mind only such conveyances or assignments as are fraudulent in fact, and that it was not their intention to grant this writ where the debtor acts honestly, and with no fraudulent purpose or design. It follows that the instruction to the jury to find the issues upon the attachment affidavit for the defendant was properly given.

The administratrix, by cross errors, seeks to attack the judgment on the merits. Without pausing to investigate the points thus raised, it is sufficient to say that no practical benefit can result to her, or to the estate which she represents, by a reversal of the judgment. It seems to be admitted on all 30 L. R. A.

hands that the estate is insolvent, and it also appears that the promissory notes for which the judgment was rendered were, some time prior to the trial of this case, presented to the probate court as a claim against the estate, and that they were duly allowed as such, and there is no suggestion that the allowance of the claim is now called in question by any one. It thus appears that the administratrix is conclusively bound to pay the claim in due course of administration, and its being evidenced by a judgment of the circuit court adds nothing to her obligation in that respect.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

1. The acceptance by the master of a written contract of employment signed by the servant is equivalent to its formal execution by him.
2. A contract whereby the first party agrees to employ the second party to perform such work as he may assign to him from time to time imposes no obligation on the first party; and a provision therein for the forfeiture of a specified sum by the servant in case he shall leave the employment without a specified notice constitutes no defense to an action by the latter for his wages, as the contract is void for want of mutuality.
3. The restriction to a designated class of persons of the right to recover attorneys' fees, granted by Laws 1889, p. 362, in suits for wages, does not render the statute obnoxious to the constitutional prohibition against special legislation, as it applies to all persons in the state similarly engaged.

(June 15, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendant Vogel from a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover wages alleged to be due and unpaid. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dupee, Judah, Willard, & Wolf, for appellant:

The contract in question was not void for want of mutuality and consideration.

Preston v. American Linen Co. 119 Mass. 400; Pottsville Iron & S. Co. v. Good, 116 Pa. 385; Hayes v. O'Brien, 149 Ill. 403, 23 L. R. A. 555.

A contract signed by one and accepted by the other is binding.

Short v. Kiefer, 143 Ill. 258.

NOTE.—The constitutionality of statutes providing for attorneys' fees in a limited class of cases is considered in a note to Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. 568. See also, in conflict with the present case, the late case of Hocking Valley Coal Co. v. Bomser (Ohio) 20 L. R. A. 338.

The constitutional provisions mean, if they mean anything, that all classes of the community shall have and enjoy equally the benefit of all the laws of the state, whether remedial, beneficial, prohibitory, or otherwise, so far as they may be made generally applicable, and that there shall not be any special or private laws affecting the rights of private individuals or classes of individuals.

On rehearing.

The present decision of the court is, in effect, that a promise to give employment, followed by actual performance of that promise for more than a year and a half, was not a sufficient consideration to support the promise made by appellee when he accepted the employment and without which he could not have gotten it. This is such an astonishing departure from fundamental principles and from the previous decisions of this court that we cannot believe the court will adhere to the decision.

Plumb v. Campbell, 129 Ill. 101.

The court should hold the attorneys' fees act unconstitutional.

Messrs. Olson, Frazier, & Bantle, for appellee:

Mutuality is essential; if one party is bound, the other must be bound also.

Weaver v. Weaver, 109 Ill. 225.

The provision of the contract forfeiting the amount of wages withheld is in the nature of a penalty, and only actual damages can be recovered thereunder.

Craig, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action originally brought before a justice of the peace by John Pekoc, against Nelson Morris, Frank E. Vogel, and Edward Morris, a firm doing business as Nelson Morris & Co., to recover the sum of 80-L. R. A.

$25 for wages claimed to be due as a cooper. On a trial before the justice the plaintiff recovered the amount claimed, and the defendants appealed to the superior court of Cook county, where a jury was waived and a trial had before the court, resulting in a judgment for the amount sued for, and also attorneys' fees. To reverse this latter judgment the defendants have appealed to this court.

The defendants requested the court to hold the following propositions of law, but the court refused so to hold, and this ruling is relied upon as error:

1. "That the evidence in the case is not sufficient, in law, to sustain a finding for the plaintiff.

2. "That the act providing for attorneys' fees in suits for wages, approved June 1 and in force July 1, 1889, is unconstitutional and void.

3. "That the evidence in the case does not show a suit for wages, within the meaning of said act, and that no attorneys' fees can be allowed thereunder."

The evidence shows that plaintiff worked as a cooper for Nelson Morris & Co., and that there was a balance in their hands, for wages unpaid, of $25. The defendants, however, claim that the amount said to be due was forfeited, for the reason that plaintiff quit the services of defendants without giving two weeks' notice, as they claim he was required to do under a contract in writing which they put in evidence, as follows:

"This agreement, made and signed this 12th day of September, 1892, between Fairbank Canning Company and Nelson Morris & Co., the parties of the first part, and John Pekoc, the party of the second part:

"Witnesseth, the said parties of the first part agree to employ the said party of the second part to perform such work as they may assign to him from time to time, such service to continue only so long as satisfactory to the said parties of the first part. And in consideration of such employment, and the peculiar nature of the business of the said first parties, and of the wages to be paid by the parties of the first part, the said second party agrees that he will not quit said service and employment without giving two weeks' notice, in writing, to said first parties of his intention so to do, and as a guaranty for the faithful performance of this agreement on his part the said party of the second part agrees to deposit with said first parties the sum of $25, and in case of the violation of this agreement by said second party the said first parties shall retain said amount as liquidated damages, and in satisfaction and payment of all damages by them sustained. It is further agreed that the said first parties shall retain $2.50 per week of the wages earned by said second party until said sum of $25 shall be in their hands, to be held by them according to the terms of this agreement.

"John Pekoc.

"----- [Seal.]

On the other hand, the plaintiff insists that the contract is void for the want of mutuality.

It will be observed that the written contract was not signed by the parties named therein as parties of the first part, and it is insisted by the plaintiff that as they failed to sign the contract it never became binding on him or any other person. The acceptance of the contract by the parties of the first part, and holding it and acting upon it as a valid instrument, may be regarded as equivalent to its formal execution on their part, as held in Johnson v. Dodge, 17 Ill. 442, and Short v. Kieffer, 142 Ill. 266. Regarding the contract in the same way, it would be treated as if it had been signed by the persons named as parties of the first part.

The next question to be determined is whether the contract is mutual. It is a general rule, well understood, that a contract between parties must be mutual. Weaver v. Weaver, 109 Ill. 283; Chitty, Contr. 15; Bishop, Contr. § 78, p. 82; Tucker v. Woods, 12 Johns. 190, 7 Am. Dec. 805. In the case last cited it is said: "In contracts, where the promise of the one party is the consideration for the promise of the other, promises must be concurrent and obligatory upon both at the same time." 1 Chitty, Contr. 297; Livingston v. Rogers, 1 Cal. 584. In Chitty on Contracts, supra, the author says: "The agreement, as before observed, must, in general, be obligatory upon both parties. There are several cases satisfactorily establishing that if the one party never was bound, on his part, to do the act which forms the consideration for the promise of the other, the agreement is void, for want of mutuality." In Wharton on Contracts, § 2, the author says: "The parties to a contract, therefore, must be both bound. Supposing that if one promises in consideration of the promise of the other, the one is not bound unless the other is bound. A promise to do a thing on an executed consideration is not a contract; nor is a promise to do a thing in consideration of an illegal or impossible engagement on the other side. Without this reciprocal obligation, no contract can be constituted, 'It is a general principle,' says Mr. Fry, 'that when from personal incapacity, the nature of the contract, or any other cause, a contract is incapable of being enforced against one party, that party is equally incapable of enforcing it specifically against the other, though its execution in the latter way might in itself be free from difficulty attending its execution in the former.'"

Upon looking into the contract read in evidence, it will be found that the parties of the first part practically agree to do nothing, and there is substantially no obligation imposed upon them by the contract. The only portion of the contract claimed to impose any obligation on the parties of the first part is the following: "The said parties of the first part agree to employ the said party of the second part to perform such work as they may assign to him from time to time, such service to continue only so long as satisfactory to the said parties of the first part." What obligation does this impose? When are they to employ the party of the second part? What sum are they to pay? How long is the employment to continue? Suppose they refuse to employ the party of the second part; can an action for damages be maintained for a breach of the contract? The answer to these inquiries is obvious. We think it is plain that the parties of the first part were not bound, under the terms of the contract, to employ the party of the second part for a single day or hour, and if they had absolutely refused to employ him he was without remedy in any court of the country. It may be true that the plaintiff might have entered into a contract which would require him to give two weeks' notice before he could quit the services of his employer without being liable to respond in damages, as might reasonable be provided in the contract; but no such case is presented by this record. Here the contract imposes no obligation on one of the parties, and hence it is void for the want of mutuality.

The contract being void, it will not be necessary to inquire whether the amount which it was provided might be retained was a penalty or liquidated damages.

It is next claimed that the court erred in allowing attorneys' fees. This involves a construction of an act of June 1, 1889 (Laws 1889, p. 362), which in substance provides that whenever a mechanic, artisan, miner, laborer, servant, or employee shall have cause to bring suit for wages, and shall establish, by the decision of the court or jury, that the amount is justly due and owing, and that demand has been made in writing, etc., then it shall be the duty of the court to allow the plaintiff, when the foregoing facts appear, a reasonable attorneys' fee in addition to the wages. It is claimed that the statute is private or special legislation, and hence is in conflict with that provision of the Constitution prohibiting special legislation. It is true, this statute does not provide that all persons who may recover judgments may, at the same time, recover attorneys' fees, but the recovery is restricted to a designated class of persons, and legislation of this character has never been regarded obnoxious to the Constitution. Indeed, in Hawthorn v. People, 109 Ill. 803, 50 Am. Rep. 610, it was expressly held that a statute is not obnoxious to the constitutional objection that it is not a general law because it applies to a class of persons. It is a general law if it applies to all persons in the state similarly engaged. See also Poturn v. Johnson, 108 Ill. 70, where the same doctrine is announced. The statute in question confers the right to recover attorneys' fees upon a certain class of persons who bring actions to recover for wages. All persons who bring such actions fall within its provisions, and hence it is in no sense special legislation.

We think the judgment of the Superior Court, upon the facts as they appear in the record, correct, and it will be affirmed.

Rehearing denied October 28, 1895, when the following opinions were handed down:

Per Curiam:

The petition for rehearing filed in this cause greatly emphasizes the previous contention that the act of 1889, providing that a reasonable attorneys' fee shall be allowed to successful plaintiffs in suits for wages, to be taxed as costs, is a partial and special statute, working deprivation of property without due process of law, and therefore unconstitutional. Reliance is placed in Millett v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 57 Am. Rep. 869; Frorer v. People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 493; Ramsey v. People, 142 Ill. 380, 17 L. R. A. 853; and Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 23 L. R. A. 340,—as sustaining the position taken. Those cases do not, however, control the present case, or decide the question here involved. Without discussing separately the facts of the cases relied upon, it may be said generally, that in each of those cases a principal and controlling question was the right of miners of coal (no less than their employers) to make contracts regulating the time and manner of the payment of wages and the method of computing such wages, and in each case cited a law restricting in some manner this important right of contract was held invalid. It was with great propriety said that the privilege of contracting is both a liberty and a property right, of which a portion of the people cannot be deprived by an arbitrary statute, and without due process of law. It was further said (Braceville Coal Co. v. People, supra): "The right to contract necessarily includes the right to fix the price at which labor will be performed, and the mode and time of payment. Each is an essential element of the right to contract, and whosoever is restricted in either as the same is enjoyed by the community at large is deprived of liberty and property." It might, perhaps, have been said with equal propriety that no legislative act, however general and universal its application, could invade the fundamental right of the citizen to make contracts not against public policy, or injurious to society.

The statute here in question interferes with no one's right to contract. It embraces a well-defined class of cases and persons, not singled out, as is contended, wholly without reason and arbitrarily; but upon grounds which may, we think, properly serve as a basis for valid legislative action. Those to whom the wages of labor are due, and who, after demand in writing of a sum no greater than that subsequently recovered, are compelled to establish, and do establish, their rights as demanded by judgment of court, are within the provisions of the act; and we cannot say this classification is so arbitrary and unreasonable, and the law so partial and unequal, as to be beyond legislative discretion and power. If this law were to be held unconstitutional for the reasons assigned, then many other acts long in force in this state, hitherto deemed to be salutary, and against which no constitutional objection has been heard, would certainly fall with it. Why, for instance, should the seller of materials for a building have by law a lien for their price, not only upon the specific things sold, but upon the whole structure, with the land it stands on, while the seller of a horse, a piano, or a corn sheller is denied any lien even on the specific thing sold? Why should he whose labor constructs a house be secured by a lien on his product, while he who raises a crop must look only to the personal responsibility of his hirer? Surely, it could be said the lien law makes classes of beneficiaries quite as arbitrary in character as that marked out to receive benefit by the act under discussion. Again, why should the wages of a defendant, who is head of a family, to an amount not exceeding $50, be exempt from garnishment (Laws 1879, p. 176), while sums due other defendants are protected by no such exemption? And why, again, it might be asked, should heads of families, earning wages, be made the subject of advantageous provisions not applied to all other wage earners, if not to all other persons? The general exemption law also makes heads of families a distinct class, who may claim as exempt $300 worth more of personal property than other judgment defendants are allowed, while a further section (Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 499) declares that where a judgment is for the wages of a laborer or servant, and noted by the court as such, no personal property whatever shall be free from levy, whatever the estate or condition of the debtor. An analogous case for this purpose is found in the provision of the general assignment law that "all claims for the wages of any laborer or servant which have been earned within three months next preceding the making of the assignment, etc., shall, after the payment of costs, etc., be preferred and first paid to the exclusion of all other demands." Hurd Stat. 1893, p. 166, § 6. It is difficult to see how any of these statutes, and many similar ones which might be named, could be sustained if the strict rule of constitutional validity, so strenuously urged in this case, were applied to them.

The petition for rehearing will be denied.

Magruder, J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree with so much of the opinion in this case as holds the act of June 1, 1889, to be a constitutional law. The act belongs to that species of class legislation which has been recently condemned by this court in the following cases: Millet v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 57 Am. Rep. 869; Frorer v. People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 493; Ramsey v. People, 142 Ill. 380, 17 L. R. A. 853; Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 23 L. R. A. 340; and Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79. In the case of Hocking Valley Coal Co. v. Rosser, 52 Ohio St.—, 29 L. R. A. 886, the supreme court of Ohio has had occasion to consider and condemn a similar statute. The opinion in that case expresses what seems to me to be the correct view of the subject, and a quotation therefrom is hereinafter set forth as sufficiently indicating the reasons for this dissent. The Ohio statute (89 Ohio Laws, p. 59, § 6563a) provides: "If the plaintiff in any action for wages recover the sum claimed by him in his bill of particulars, there shall be included in his costs such fee as the court may allow, but not in excess of $5 for his attorney. But no such attorney fee shall be taxed unless said wages have been demanded in writing and not paid within three days after such demand. If the defendant appeal from any such judgment and the plaintiff on appeal recover a like sum exclusive of the interest from the rendition of the judgment before the justice, there shall be included in his costs such additional fee not in excess of $15 for his attorney as the court may allow." In the course of the opinion in the Rosser Case the Ohio court says: "Upon what principle can a rule of law rest which permits one party, or class of people, to invoke the action of our tribunals of justice at will, while the other party, or another class of citizens, does so at the peril of being mulcted in an attorney fee, if an honest but unsuccessful defense should be interposed? A statute that imposes this restriction upon one citizen, or class of citizens, only denies to him or them the equal protection of the law. It is true that no provision of the Constitution of 1851 declares in direct and express terms that this may not be done, but, nevertheless, it violates the fundamental principles upon which our government rests as they are enunciated and declared by that instrument in the bill of rights. The first section of the Constitution declares that the right to acquire, possess, and protect property, is inalienable, and the next section declares, among other things, that 'government is instituted for the equal protection and benefit' of every person, while section 16 of article 1 provides that 'all courts shall be open, and every person, for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation shall have remedy by due course of law, and justice shall be administered without denial or delay.' The right to protect property is declared, as well as that justice shall not be denied, and every one entitled to equal protection. Judicial tribunals are provided for the equal protection of every suitor. The right to retain property already in possession is as sacred as the right to recover it, when dispossessed. The right to defend against an action to recover money is as necessary as the right to defend one brought to recover specific real or personal property. An adverse result in either case deprives the defeated party of property. If the general assembly has power to enact the statute in question, it could also enact one providing that lawyers, doctors, and grocers, or any other class of citizens might make out their accounts, and demand in writing their payment within a short time, which, if not complied with, would entitle the plaintiff to an attorney fee in addition to his claim if he recovered the amount demanded. We do not think the general assembly has power to discriminate between persons or classes respecting the right to invoke the arbitration of the courts in the adjustment of their respective rights. The legislative power to compel an unsuccessful party to an action—generally the defendant—to pay an attorney fee to his opponent has received the attention of a number of courts of last resort, as well as laws which impose as a penalty double damages or some similar penalty for some wrongful or negligent act injurious to another. Where the penalty has been imposed for some tortious or negligent act the statute has generally, though not always, been sustained, but, on the contrary, where no wrongful or negligent conduct was imputed to the defeated party, any attempt to charge him with a penalty has not prevailed. Millet v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 57 Am. Rep. 869; State v. Fire Creek Coal & Coke Co. 33 W. Va. 188, 6 L. R. A. 359; Durkee v. Janesville, 23 Wis. 464, 9 Am. Rep. 500; South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Morris, 65 Ala. 193; Wilder v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 70 Mich. 382; Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 22 L. R. A. 340; Wally v. Kennedy, 2 Yerg. 554, 24 Am. Dec. 511; Vanzant v. Waddel, 2 Yerg. 260; Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Baty, 6 Neb. 87, 29 Am. Rep. 856; State v. Loomis, 115 Mo. 807, 21 L. R. A. 789; San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Wilson (Tex.) 19 S. W. Rep. 910; Peoria, D. & E. R. Co. v. Duggan, 109 Ill. 537, 50 Am. Rep. 619. Various phases of this subject have received attention in the foregoing cases as well as in some others, to which we do not deem it necessary to refer. The general tendency of these authorities is towards the result which we have reached; but whether they do or do not support our conclusions, we are satisfied that the fundamental principles of government declared by our bill of rights clearly and unequivocally prohibit legislation of the character of that involved in this case. Judgment allowing an attorney fee reversed."

F. A. STRATTON.

(.....Tenn.....)

A statute making all joint obligations joint and several applies to the indorsement of a promissory note, so that notice of nonpay-

NOTE.—The above case is believed to be one of first impression so far as it touches the effect of a statute making joint obligations joint and several upon the rights of joint indorsers to notice of nonpayment.

ment given to any one of several joint indorsers is sufficient to bind him.

(November 15, 1895.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Washington County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce defendant's alleged liability as indorser of a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Isaac Harr and Crumley & Crumley for appellant.

Messrs. Kirkpatrick, Williams, & Bowman, for defendant.

The note being made payable to Singiser and Stratton, who are not shown to be partners, it can be transferred only by their joint indorsement.

Notwithstanding the order in which their names are indorsed, they are not to be regarded as successive, but as joint, indorsers.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 704; Lane v. Stacy, 8 Allen, 41.

Being joint indorsers, notice of protest must be given to both in order to render either liable.

Tenn. Code (Milliken & Vertrees), §§ 3484-3486, do not change the rule.

Caruthers, History of a Lawsuit, 49.

There may be an obligation joint in nature.

Hint v. Tillman, 2 Helsk. 202; Henry v. Walker, 11 Helsk. 194.

If it be true that a change in the character of the contract is wrought by the Code provisions, those cases holding that an unqualified release of one joint obligor releases the other are ill based.

Similar provisions have been incorporated in the Codes of nearly all the states.

Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 18; Caruthers, History of a Lawsuit, 49; Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights, § 118.

Yet no decision has been found holding that such a provision changes the liability of joint indorsers.

Willis v. Green, 5 Hill, 232, 40 Am. Dec. 351, anterior to New York Code, reaffirmed in Hubbard v. Matthews, 54 N. Y. 50, 18 Am. Rep. 562; Gates v. Beecher, 60 N. Y. 523, 19 Am. Rep. 207.

That portion of the Tennessee statute that provides that right of suit shall survive only had the effect to give the remedy in common law that had all the while been given in courts of equity.

Saunders v. Wilder, 2 Head, 578.

No motives of policy could prompt a legislature to deny to citizens the right to make a joint contract; and it may be doubted whether it would be in its constitutional power to do so.

Snodgrass, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, who was plaintiff below, sued the defendant as indorser of the following note:

"Duluth, Minn., Feb. 28, 1893.

"$2,500.

"July the 15, 1893, after date, we prom- 30 L. R. A.

ise to pay to the order of F. A. Stratton and T. F. Singiser twenty-five hundred dollars. Payable at the Iron Exchange Bank, Duluth, Minn.; value recd.; with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"A. R. Merritt.

"E. T. Merritt."

Indorsed:

"T. F. Singiser.

"F. A. Stratton."

This note had been presented by Stratton to the City Savings Bank of Chattanooga, indorsed as above shown, for discount, and he received the money thereon. The note was sent to the bank at Duluth for collection, was not paid, and duly protested, notice thereof being given to Stratton alone. The City Savings Bank assigned, and its assignee brought this suit against Stratton. He resisted payment on the ground that both he and Singiser were discharged by reason of the failure to give Singiser notice. The circuit court held him not liable, and the plaintiff appealed in error.

Here the argument is made for Stratton that he was a joint indorser of the paper with Singiser, and that his obligation as such was a joint obligation, and notice to his co-obligor was essential to bind him. On the contrary, it is insisted by plaintiff that, treating him as a joint indorser, notice to his co-obligor was not essential to bind him, but notice to one joint indorser was sufficient. There is very persuasive and respectable authority for this proposition. Dodge v. Bank of Kentucky, 2 A. K. Marsh. 917; Higgins v. Morrison, 4 Dana, 100. But the weight of authority is that (except in case of partners) notice to one joint indorser is not sufficient to bind either. Story, Prom. Notes, §§ 239, 255; 8 Kent, Com. § 44, p. 105, and note; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 336; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 594, 595; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 999a; 1 Parsons, Notes & Bills, chap. 12, p. 502. So, if the question stood only as put on the right of defendant as joint indorser, the judgment would be sustained by the weight of authority; whether by the weight of reason, and treated by us as controlling, we need not now determine, for plaintiff's right of recovery does not depend on the question thus settled, if it is assumed to be settled by the principles of the common law. Our statute provides that "all joint obligations and promises are made joint and several and the debt or obligation shall survive against the heirs and personal representatives of deceased obligors as well as against the survivors, and suits may be brought and prosecuted on the same against all or any part of the representatives of deceased obligors as if such obligations and assumptions were joint and several." Mill. & V. Code, § 3486. In addition to this statutory creation of joint and several liability on joint obligations and promises, with its added right of suit, another section provides for right of suit only, as follows: "Persons jointly or severally or jointly and severally bound on the same instrument or by judgment decree or statute, including the makers and indorsers of negotiable paper, and sureties may all or any part of them be sued in the same action." Mill.

& V. Code, § 8484. This latter section (which is first in order of Code arrangement) relates alone to procedure. The first quoted relates, not only to procedure, but fixes the right. It must be given its full legal effect. And its effect is to make defendant, not only a joint, but several, indorser with Singiser; not only a joint obligor, but a several obligor in the liability of indorser assured by his indorsement. The authorities and cases by them referred to, sustaining the proposition advanced that a joint indorser is not bound unless all are notified, deal with issues where the questions are as to presentment and demand of joint makers of a note, and as to notice to joint indorsers, as to which, on these questions, the rules of law are practically the same; but our statute deposes such an indorsement of its character of joint indorsement, and makes it joint and several, just as the joint note of the makers is made joint and several. Respecting such a note Mr. Story says: "Where the note is the several as well as the joint note of the makers, . . . the holder is at liberty to elect upon whom he will make the demand and presentment." Story, Prom. Notes, § 256. To the same effect see 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 596. The reason of the rule in both cases is the same. It is only necessary to make demand in the one case of all the makers where they are joint makers, and to give notice to all the indorsers where they are joint indorsers, to bind those notified. If they are joint and several indorsers, notice to any one is sufficient to bind him.

It follows that defendant Stratton is bound, and the judgment of the circuit judge to the contrary is reversed, and judgment will be rendered here against him, and for all costs.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

John ALLEN

v.

John P. ALLEN.

(19 R. I. —.)

1. Any inhabitant may take shellfish anywhere in the waters of the state and on the shores below high-water mark as it exists from time to time, in the absence of any express restriction on such right.
2. Disturbing the thatch of a riparian owner by digging clams below high-water mark is not a trespass, as the public right of fishery is paramount to the private right to cut grass or sedge.

(May 24, 1895.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Court in Washington County made during the trial of an action to recover damages for defendant's alleged wrongful destruction of plaintiff's thatch while digging clams, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. New trial granted.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. Frederick C. Olney for defendant.

Mr. Samuel W. E. Allen for plaintiff.

Per Curiam:

A riparian proprietor whose land borders upon tide water has, by the common law, certain private rights to the shore between high and low water mark. These do not amount to seisin in fee, but are in the nature of franchises or easements. East Haven v. Hemingway, 7 Conn. 186, 202; Simons v. French, 25 Conn. 846, 852; Lockwood v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 37 Conn. 387. The right to build wharves and to fill out the upland may be exercised, as against any one but the state, provided navigation is not impeded or a nuisance created thereby. Engs v. Peckham, 11 R. I. 210; Basley v. Burges, Id. 330. Some of these rights may be alienated, or annexed to other upland estates, as the right to cut sedge or grass (see citation by Potter, J., in Providence Steam-Engine Co. v. Providence & S. S. S. Co. 12 R. I. 369, 84 Am. Rep. 652), and the right to take seaweed which is stranded on the beach (Basley v. Sisson, 1 R. I. 283; Kenyon v. Nichols, Id. 106; Hall v. Lawrence, 2 R. I. 218, 57 Am. Dec. 715; Knowles v. Knowles, 12 R. I. 400). When it is necessary or convenient, these alienable rights may be defined by boundaries, but this circumstance does not enlarge the character of the right. The state holds the legal fee of all lands below high-water mark, as at common law, as has been uniformly and repeatedly decided by this court. Basley v. Burges, 11 R. I. 320; Engs v. Peckham, Id. 210, 224; Brown v. Goddard, 18 R. I. 81; Folsom v. Freeborn, Id. 200, 204. By the common law of Massachusetts and Maine, based upon or declared by a colonial ordinance, the fee in lands, to a certain distance below high-water mark, was given to the upland proprietor, and this rule applies to such portions of our shore as have been ceded from Massachusetts. This right of the state is held, however, by virtue of its sovereignty, and in trust for all the inhabitants,—not as a private proprietor. The public rights secured by this trust are the rights of passage, of navigation, and of fishery, and these rights extend, even in Massachusetts, to all land below high-water mark, unless it has been so used, built upon, or occupied as to prevent the passage of boats, and the natural ebb and flow of the tide. Weston v. Sampson, 8 Cush. 347, 54 Am. Dec. 764; Moulton v. Libbey, 87 collected in notes to Miller v. Mendenhall (Minn.) 8 L. R. A. 89, and Eisenbach v. Hatfield (Wash.) 12 L. R. A. 632.

Me. 472, 59 Am. Dec. 57; Packard v. Ryder, 144 Mass. 440, 59 Am. Rep. 101. The establishment of a harbor line permits the riparian owner to carry the upland or high-water mark out a certain distance from the natural shore. Actual extension of the upland to the new line extinguishes all public rights within it. The land which was formerly shore becomes upland, and, while the rights to shore and upland are not changed, they are carried further out into the tidal stream or sea. Engs v. Peckham, 11 R. I. 224; Providence Steam-Engine Co. v. Providence & S. S. Co. 12 R. I. 848, 855, 84 Am. Rep. 652. Until actual filling out, the public rights exist as before. Gerhard v. Seekonk River Bridge Comrs. 15 R. I. 384. Shellfisheries are public rights which may be regulated for the public good (State v. Cozens, 2 R. I. 561; State v. Medbury, 3 R. I. 188; New England Oyster Co. v. McGarvey, 12 R. I. 392), as may also the rights of navigation. In the absence of any express restriction, any inhabitant may take shellfish anywhere in the waters of the state, and on the shores below high-water mark as it exists from time to time. In doing so, he may disturb the soil, and dig up the grass or sedge, if necessary. The public right of fishery is paramount to the private right to cut grass or sedge. Bagott v. Orr, 2 Bos. & P. 472; Parker v. Cutler Mill Dam Co. 20 Me. 353, 37 Am. Dec. 56; Peck v. Lockwood, 5 Day, 22; Lakeman v. Burnham, 7 Gray, 437; Proctor v. Wells, 103 Mass. 216; and other Massachusetts cases cited above.

The instructions of the judge before whom the case was tried were erroneous in affirming that it was a trespass in the defendant to disturb the plaintiff's thatch in digging clams.

A new trial must be granted.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

HANOVER FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff in Err.,

SHRADER & ROGERS.

(.....Tex.....)

1. Sunday cannot be excluded from the computation of the thirty days after motion for rehearing before filing an application for a writ of error, although it is the thirtieth day and the clerk is not bound to file the application on that day, since he may lawfully do so.
2. The right to file papers on Sunday during the progress of a suit is clearly implied by Rev. Stat. art. 1184, prohibiting the commencement of suits on that day or the issue of process, with certain exceptions.
3. An application for a writ of error is sufficiently filed on Sunday when the clerk received it on that day, but, being doubtful as to his power to file it, merely noted the fact and date of its receipt, and upon the next day marked it filed.

(December 9, 1895.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of error to the Court of Civil Appeals, Second Supreme Judicial District, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Hardeman County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Writ refused.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinions.

An application for a writ of error having been filed in this case and a motion to dismiss the application having been made, Gaines, Ch. J., on November 21, 1895, delivered the following opinion:

In this case the motion for a rehearing was overruled in the court of civil appeals on the 18th day of October, 1895, and on the 17th day of November the application for a writ of error was delivered to the clerk of that court, who noted upon it the fact and date of its delivery, retained it in his custody, and marked it "Filed" on the 18th. The 17th of November was the thirtieth day after the motion for a rehearing was overruled, and was Sunday. The parties adversely interested in the proceeding have met the application in limine by presenting a motion to dismiss. If the application was not filed in time, it is the duty of the court to dismiss it without a motion. The precise question presented has not been passed upon in this court, and we therefore invite written arguments or citations of authorities from counsel for the respective parties upon the point or points presented. Was the filing on Monday, the 18th, too late? If so, was the delivery to the clerk on the Sunday, the 17th, of any effect? The clerk will notify counsel, and action upon the application will be suspended until the 8d day of December, next.

Messrs. Morgan & Thompson, A. G. Walker, and D. E. Decker for applicant. Mr. Burton P. Eubank, contra.

Gaines, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Counsel for the respective parties in this case, in response to the request of the court made at a former day of this term, have filed written arguments upon the questions to which their attention was then called, and have materially diminished the labors of the court.

Upon the first question, our conclusion is that Sunday, although the thirtieth day from that on which the motion for a rehearing was overruled by the court of civil appeals (32 S. W. Rep. 344), cannot be excluded from the computation. Such is the general rule, although there are some conflicting decisions. It was adopted by this court, after a careful consideration, in Burr v. Lewis, 6 Tex. 76, and we have found no case in this court which modifies that decision. Where the time allowed for doing an act is very short, it is usual to exclude a Sunday. The principle would seem to be that, when but a few days are allowed in which to do the act, it is not to be presumed that the legislature intended further to abbreviate it, in effect, by including a day ordinarily observed as a day of cessation from all ordinary business. For example, where two days are designated, it is not reasonable to hold that it was the purpose to include a Sunday, when the practical effect of the ruling would be to reduce the time to one day only. But, where weeks are included in the time allowed, the reason does not apply. Sunday at common law is dies non juridicus. Swan v. Broome, 1 W. Bl. 496, 526. When the point was first raised in the case cited, Lord Mansfield was evidently in great doubt whether a court could not render a valid judgment upon a Sunday, but, after full consideration, the question was resolved in the negative. That a judgment rendered on that day is void may now be regarded as settled law. It was so held by the court of appeals in Shearman v. State, 1 Tex. App. 215. But it was also recognized that, while a judgment could not be pronounced, a verdict might be returned on Sunday. See also Hoghtaling v. Osborn, 15 Johns. 118. A distinction is made between judicial acts and those of a ministerial character, and it seems to be generally held that, in the absence of a statute, ministerial acts performed on Sunday are valid. The service of process on Sunday was forbidden by the statute of 29 Car. II., and we think that the English cases which hold the ministerial acts of officers of the court void because performed on Sunday are referable to that act. Expressions of opinions may be found in the books to the effect that the statute was merely declaratory of the common law. Early decisions of the courts at Westminster hold to the contrary. Mackalley's Case, 9 Coke, 66b; Bedes v. Alpe, W. Jones, 156; Swan v. Broome, supra. See also Sayles v. Smith, 12 Wend. 59, 27 Am. Dec. 117. But we have not found it necessary to determine that question. In 1846 our legislature provided that "no civil suit shall be instituted, nor shall any process be had on Sundays, except in cases of attachment or sequestration." Pasch. Dig. art. 1424. The substance of this provision is found in article 1184 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows: "No civil suit shall be commenced, nor shall any process be issued or served, on Sunday or any legal holiday, except in cases of injunction, attachment, or sequestration." The prohibition against the filing of a petition (which is the commencement of a suit under our law), and against the issue and service of process, clearly implies that the filing of papers during the progress of the suit was to be allowed. See Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Harding, 63 Tex. 162; Crabtree v. Whitesells, 65 Tex. 111. The statute does not refer to judicial acts, and they are left as at common law. The filing of an application for a writ of error in the court of civil appeals is the continuation of a suit and not its commencement. In Bedes v. Alpe, cited above, the information was filed on a Sunday, and it was held that the filing was valid. We conclude from these considerations, that an application for a writ of error may be lawfully filed on a Sunday, but do not hold that the clerk is bound to do an official act of that character on that day. We think he may lawfully refuse to act when a paper is tendered to him to be placed upon the file, but that, if he does act, his act is valid. Sunday being regarded by our people generally as a day of rest, and by many as a day of religious observance, in our opinion, save in exceptional cases, the officers of the court are not required to perform any official functions on such a day; and it is their privilege to refuse their performance should they elect to do so. We may imagine cases in which it may be proper to hold that a ministerial duty performed on a Sunday would be voidable, if not void; such, for example, as a sale by a sheriff of personal property under judicial process. But, should it be so held in regard to such a sale, we think the ruling would rest upon the ground that it would be unjust to the defendant in execution that his property should be sold on a day which is usually devoted to a cessation of business, and on which the conscientious scruples of many persons would forbid their attendance upon and bidding at the sale. But see Sayles v. Smith, supra.

It follows from what we have said that we think the file mark put upon the paper on Monday was too late; and it remains, therefore, to consider the effect of the clerk's indorsement as to its receipt upon Sunday. The just inference from the indorsement is that the application was delivered to the clerk for the purpose of filing it, and that the clerk received it, but, being doubtful as to his power to place it upon the file upon that day, noted the fact and date of its receipt, and marked it "Filed" upon the next day. Where a paper is deposited with the clerk of a court for the purpose of making it a part of the records in the case, it is filed. The evidence which is looked to by the court in determining whether the paper has been filed or not is the clerk's indorsement of the fact upon the paper itself. The form of that indorsement is usually the word "Filed," with the date. We think, however, if the indorsement shows the fact in other words, it is sufficient.

We conclude that the application was lawfully filed on Sunday, and that the clerk's indorsement is evidence of the fact of its filing, and therefore that we have jurisdiction of the application; but, having examined it, we also conclude that it shows no error, and it is therefore refused.

STATE of Texas, Appl.,

AUSTIN CLUB.

(.....Tex.....)

An incorporated social club is not engaged in the business of selling intoxicating liquors within the meaning of Sayles's Civ. Stat. (Tex.) art. 8226a, imposing an occupation tax on such business, where the club does not sell liquors for profit, and sells them only to its members.

(December 9, 1896.)

QUESTIONS certified by the Court of Civil Appeals, Third Supreme Judicial District, for the opinion of the Supreme Court, which arose upon an appeal by the State from a judgment of the District Court for Travis County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of the license tax alleged to be due from defendant for selling intoxicating liquors. Affirmance advised.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. M. Crane, Attorney General, and H. P. Brown, Assistant Attorney General, for appellant:

An incorporated club organized for social and other purposes, that continuously from time to time purchases in bulk spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, and medicated bitters, and through its authorized agent and employee retails the same to its members only, without regard to profit, in quantities less than one quart, at an agreed price per drink, which each member pays according to the quantity he calls for and consumes, is liable to the payment of the annual tax imposed and levied by virtue of the act of the legislature of this state, passed on the 4th day of April, 1881.

Sayles's (Tex.) Civ. Stat. art. 8226a, §§ 1-8; United States v. Wittig, 3 Low. Dec. 406; People v. Soule, 74 Mich. 250, 2 L. R. A. 494; State v. Neis, 108 N. C. 787, 13 L. R. A. 412; *State v. Article 8226a, being applicable to all persons or corporations engaged or engaging in the business of selling spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, etc., in quantities less than one quart, and such liquors having been sold by said Austin Club within the quantity prescribed by statute, and said corporation or its agents having made a business of so selling such liquors, the sales constituted the business of selling, and was in violation of law.

Barden v. Montana Club, 10 Mont. 380, 11 L. R. A. 593.

Though the Austin Club may have been incorporated for other purposes, and its main business was the advancement and promotion of other objects, yet if, as an incident to such other business, it also engaged in the sale of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, it was guilty of a violation of the statute, and liable to the payment of the taxes sued for in this case.

La Norris v. State, 13 Tex. App. 34, 44 Am. Rep. 699.

Messrs. J. L. Peeler and Fisher & Townes, for appellees:

A club organized and maintained for social purposes only, and not with the view of conducting the business of a vendor of liquors for profit, is not subject to a state license tax; and such a club is not within the law requiring a license to be paid before liquors dispensed for a price paid by members can be distributed to and among them. The purpose of the legislature was to regulate the dealing in liquors as an occupation or business, and to require a license to vendors of liquor only where the selling is engaged in as an occupation or business followed as a means of or with a view to profit.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court of civil appeals of the third supreme judicial district certified to this court the following statement and question:

"On September 21, 1896, the state of Texas brought this suit to recover $1,200, alleged to be due from the Austin Club, a corporation, as occupation taxes for continuously engaging in the business of selling spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, and medicated bitters, in quantities less than one quart, from December 27, 1889, up to the date the petition was filed. The pleadings, evidence, and assignments of error raise the question herein certified. The trial court's findings of facts consist of an agreed statement of the facts upon which the case was there, and is here, submitted. Said statement is as follows:

"It is agreed by and between the parties hereto, the state of Texas acting by and through her district attorney, A. S. Burleson, and the Austin Club, acting by and through its attorneys of record, John L. Peeler, Esq., and Messrs. Fisher & Townes, that this cause shall be submitted to the court for its determination upon the following agreed statement of facts: The Austin Club is a corporation created under the laws of the state of Texas, the charter of which is, in substance, as stated below, except where it is copied. Article 1 provides that James R. Johnson, Lewis Hancock, A. P. Wooldridge, W. H. Tobin, E. Saunders, John Orr, and M. D. Mather, and their associates, are to constitute the body politic known as the 'Austin Club,' with the usual powers of contracting and being contracted with, suing and being sued, and the right to purchase and hold real, personal, and mixed property, to have a seal, and exist for a term of fifty years. Section 2 of the charter is as follows: 'Sec. 2. The purpose and objects of this corporation are the encouragement of social intercourse among its members, the support of literary undertakings and cultivation of literature, the maintenance of a library and reading room, and the promotion of fine arts.' Section 3 provides that the business shall be transacted in the city of Austin, and that it shall be under the control of a board of eleven directors, to be elected at the annual meetings of the members, to be held on the first Tuesday in January of each year. It provides for the filling of vacancies in the board, and names the directors for the first year. Section 4 provides that there shall be no capital stock, the funds of the club to be made up of initiation fees and monthly dues. The charter was duly executed and filed in accordance with law, and the corporation organized thereunder. 'Second. That, since the date of the incorporation of said club, it has from time to time purchased, in bulk, spirituous liquors and medicated bitters, and, through its authorized agent and employee, retailed same to its members in quantities less than one quart, and at an agreed price per drink, and has continuously so done to this day. Third. That each member of said club pays for the quantity of spirituous liquors, etc., he calls for and consumes. Fourth. That only members of said club are permitted to purchase, in any quantity, from said club, spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, etc. Fifth. That said club is carrying on its business and is domiciled in the second story of a building situated on lot No. 1, in block No. 84, in Austin, Travis county, Tex., and is using, in connection therewith, the following stock, fixtures, and personal property: two billiard tables and one pool table, and billiard racks, cues, and balls therefor; one oak sideboard; seven oak tables; two oak desks; ten upholstered chairs, and two upholstered sofas; thirty-six chairs in billiard room and reading rooms; three carpets, and bar glasses, fixtures, etc. Sixth. That said club has not paid to the collector of taxes of Travis county, for the state of Texas, the annual tax levied on every person engaged in selling spirituous liquors, etc., in quantities less than a quart,—$300 for the year ending December 27, 1890, nor $300 for the year ending December 27, 1891, nor $300 for the year ending December 27, 1892, nor $300 for the year ending December 27, 1893,—nor any part thereof. Seventh. That said club has continuously, since its incorporation, paid internal revenue license to the United States as liquor dealers. Eighth. That said club does not sell spirituous liquors, etc., for profit, and that the money arising from sales of spirituous liquors, etc., to members is placed in the treasury of the club, and is only used for the expenses of the club, and replenishing the stock of liquors, etc. Ninth. That said club is now in debt about $1,000, which is the excess of expense over the revenues derived from the sales of liquors, etc., dues, and initiation fees, received since its organization. Tenth. That said club numbers 100 members. Eleventh. That said club sells only the finest imported whiskies, and the price charged therefor is 25 cents for two drinks; and beer it sells in bottles, for 15 cents per pint and 25 cents per quart. Twelfth. That said club keeps on hand, for use of its members, the latest and most advanced literary periodicals and magazines. Thirteenth. That its by-laws, and rules for its regulation, are as follows.'

The association adopted by-laws, of which we will make extracts, substantially, and by quotation, where necessary, of so much as are material to the question certified for our decision. The first article of the by-laws states the purpose of the corporation to be the same as that stated in the charter. Article 3 of the by-laws provides for the membership of the club,—in substance, that such membership is not to be limited; each member is to be elected by the board of directors by ballot,—then proceeds to prescribe the qualifications of the members, and the method of proposing candidates and acting upon such application. Article 4 of the by-laws fixes the entrance and initiation fee at $25, and the annual subscription for all members at $80, payable monthly, in advance, on the 1st of each month. Article 7 makes it the duty of the president of the club, on the first day of each quarter, to appoint three members of the board of directors, called the "house committee," whose duty it is to exercise control and supervision, "in the broadest sense of these terms," over the management and conduct of the clubhouse. Article 8 is in these words: "Nonresidents of Travis county may be admitted as contributing members upon the payment, in advance, of the initiation fee provided for members: provided, that they shall be proposed and elected in accordance with article 3. Such contributing members shall be entitled to all the privileges accorded to regular members, except that of voting and holding office." Article 9 permits any member to introduce, on his own responsibility, a stranger, who does not live in the limits of Travis county, and is not engaged in business therein, for a period of one week, under certain regulations, and contains this provision: "In event of strangers so invited failing to settle their accounts, the member introducing them shall become liable for the amount of their indebtedness."

Under authority conferred by the by-laws, rules were adopted for the government of the club. Rule 2 authorizes and directs the house committee to make all purchases or direct the same, to regulate the prices to be charged for all articles served by the club, report to the secretary the names of members who may be in arrears, etc. Rule 4 permits strangers, not residing or engaged in business in Travis county, to be introduced as visitors, and makes the members introducing any visitors responsible for their deportment and for any debts contracted by them. No person residing or engaged in business in Travis county, not a member of the club, would be permitted to visit the club. Rule 6 of the club is as follows: "The club shall be open at 8 o'clock A. M., and shall be closed against the admission of members at 2 o'clock A. M. The lights shall be turned off, and the clubhouse closed, at 2 o'clock A. M. every night." Rule 16 is as follows: "No supplies furnished by the club shall be sold on credit. Supplies shall be paid for at the time of receipt, in such manner as the house committee shall from time to time direct."

"The statute under which the state claims that the Austin Club is subject to an occupation tax reads as follows: 'Hereafter there shall be levied upon and collected from any person, firm, or association of persons engaged in the business of selling spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, or medicated bitters, an annual tax upon every such occupation or separate establishment, as follows: For selling spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, or medicated bitters, in quantities of less than one quart, $800.' Sayles's (Tex.) Civ. Stat. art. 8226a.

"The material and controlling question in the case is this: Under the agreed facts as above set out was the Austin Club engaged in the business of selling spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, and medicated bitters, within the meaning of the statute? That question the court of civil appeals for the third district has decided to certify, and it is hereby certified, to the supreme court for decision."

In addition to the article of the Revised Statutes quoted by the court in its submission of the question certified, we call attention to section 4 of that article, which requires all persons desiring to engage in the sale of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors to give bond, among the conditions of which are the following: That "he shall keep an open, quiet, and orderly house or place for the sale of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, or medicated bitters capable of producing intoxication." In the same section, "open house" is defined as follows: "An open house within the meaning of this act is one in which no screen or other device is used or placed, either inside or outside of such house or place of business, for the purpose of or that will obstruct the view through the open door or place of entrance into any such house or place where intoxicating liquors are sold in quantities less than a quart." The same section defines "quiet house" in this language: "A quiet house or place of business within the meaning of this act is one in which no music, loud and boisterous talking, yelling, or indecent or vulgar language is allowed, used, or practiced, or any other things calculated to disturb or annoy persons residing or doing business in the vicinity of such house or place of business, or those passing along the streets or public highway." The 8th section of the same article provides: "The license required by this act shall be posted in some conspicuous place in the house where the business or occupation for which such license is necessary is carried on; and for a failure to so conspicuously post such license at or in such place of business, any person or any member of any firm or association of persons so failing shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not to exceed $25; and each day of such failure to so conspicuously post such license shall constitute a separate offense." Sections 9 and 10 of the said article apply particularly to persons engaged as retail liquor dealers, under the license required by the law.

The question presented is: Was the Austin Club, in dispensing, to its members and their guests, liquors, in the manner stated, engaged in the "business of selling spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors," within the meaning and intent of article 3226a, as above quoted?

In the cases of Williams v. State, 23 Tex. App. 499, and Standford v. State, 16 Tex. App. 881, the prosecutions were based upon article 110 of the Penal Code of this state, which is in the following language: "Any person who shall pursue or follow any occupation, calling, or profession, or do any act taxed by law, without first obtaining a license therefor, shall be fined in any sum not less than the amount of the taxes so due, and not more than double that sum." In the cases cited above, the court defined the word "occupation" as follows: "'Occupation,' as used in this statute, and as understood commonly, would signify a vocation, calling, trade,—the business which one principally engages in to procure a living or to obtain wealth. It is not the sale of liquor that constitutes the offense. It is the engaging in the business of selling without paying the occupation tax. It does not require even a single sale to constitute the offense, for a person may engage in the business without succeeding in it, even to the extent of one sale." In the case of Krenig v. State (Tex.) 26 S. W. Rep. 835, the appellant had been prosecuted and convicted for playing cards in a clubroom at Cuero, which club was organized and conducted substantially under the same rules as in the case now before us. The indictment charged that the game was played with cards in "a house for retailing spirituous liquors," and the court of criminal appeals, in an able and exhaustive opinion by Presiding Justice Hurt, held that the clubroom was not "a house for retailing spirituous liquors," within the meaning of the statute. In announcing the conclusion arrived at by the court, the learned judge said: "We are of opinion that, upon authority and reason, it must be held, under the facts of the present case, the transaction was not the sale of the liquor in the way of trade; and that neither the association, its members, nor its steward, were engaged in the occupation of selling liquors. If this be true, was the clubroom a place for retailing liquors? . . . It is very clear, both from the decisions we have cited, and our statutes, that the club, its members, or steward, are not engaged in the occupation of selling liquors in quantitles less than one quart." In the case before us, no question is made as to this being a device to evade the law. It is therefore to be treated as a bona fide club, formed for the purposes expressed in its charter.

The question as to whether or not the transactions of dispensing liquors to the members and guests, as in this instance, constituted sales within the meaning of statutes prohibiting such sales, has been the subject of much judicial investigation, upon which there is a great conflict of authority; but that question is not involved in the case now presented to us, and we refrain from discussing it, and will not undertake to review the many authorities bearing upon that question cited by the counsel for both parties in this case. Clubs like this have been formed and maintained in many of the states, and in some of them the question now before the court has been adjudicated, upon which there is likewise a conflict of authority. But we believe that the decided weight of authority upon this question supports the conclusion arrived at by the court of criminal appeals in the case of Koenig v. State, cited above, to the extent that it holds that the club was not engaged in the business of selling spirituous liquors. Martin v. State, 59 Ala. 84; Piedmont Club v. Com. 87 Va. 540; Tennessee Club v. Dwyer, 11 Lea, 452, 47 Am. Rep. 298; State v. Boston Club, 45 La. Ann. 585, 20 L. R. A. 185; Graff v. Evans, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 873. It has been held, on the other hand, by courts of eminent ability, and upon strong reasoning, that persons engaged in like business, either as a voluntary association or as a corporation, were engaged in the business of selling spirituous liquors. United States v. Wittig, 2 Low. Dec. 466, Fed. Cas. No. 16,748; People v. Soule, 74 Mich. 250, 2 L. R. A. 494; State v. Bacon Club, 44 Mo. App. 86.

The conditions of the bond, requiring obligee to keep an open, quiet, and orderly house or place for the sale of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, together with the provisions of the statute defining what are open and quiet houses, and the further provision requiring the posting of the license in a public place, indicate that the legislature intended that the business of selling spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors should be conducted in a public place, open to all persons to enter therein, to the observation of those passing by such place, and guarding against all of those things which would be calculated to lure the unsuspecting into such places, or to offend or corrupt those who might visit them. These provisions are inconsistent with the idea that the legislature was attempting to regulate the dispensing of liquors in the private manner shown by the facts of this case, but it shows that the business, as expressed in the article quoted, was intended to be a business conducted in a public manner, and in a place to which the public would have free access as stated above. We think that this tends very strongly to support the position taken by the appellee in this case, that the language of the statute does not embrace the business as transacted by this club. Under the conditions of the bond required of persons engaging in the business of selling liquors and the provisions of the statute regulating the manner of conducting it, no license could be obtained to sell spirituous liquors in the private manner that it was done by this club and has been done by many other clubs in the state for many years. The conclusion must be drawn that the legislature either did not intend that such business as that conducted by the Austin Club should be embraced in the terms of the statute, or it did intend that all sales of a private character should be absolutely prohibited. We do not think that the latter conclusion can be drawn from this and other provisions of the Penal Code upon the subject of selling spirituous liquors. The Penal Code prohibits the sale of liquors under various other circumstances, as, for instance, all sales to Indians, to minors, and in local option districts, without regard to whether the person selling has a license therefor or not; and if the legislature intended to prohibit this class of business, if it be termed a business, it might easily have done so in plain and unambiguous language, as it has done with reference to the prohibited sales above stated.

Article 110 of the Penal Code was enacted for the purpose of enforcing the license law, and compelling persons pursuing the occupations which were taxed by the state to pay the taxes levied and to procure the license required. In fact, it is the most efficient means provided for the collection of such taxes and the enforcement of the law. The court of criminal appeals is the court of last resort in this state in criminal matters, and to its final judgment must be submitted all questions arising upon criminal prosecutions. The statute now being construed by us is so closely related to and dependent upon the criminal statute (Penal Code, art. 110), that we feel constrained to follow the decision of the court of criminal appeals in this matter, more especially as it is well supported by authority, and, in fact, by the weight of authority; and, considering all the provisions of our statute, as cited above, it is not clear that the decision cited is not a correct statement of the law upon the question. If we should hold that a club such as this, transacting its business in the manner that this did, was engaged in the business of selling spirituous liquors by retail, we would, in effect, hold that the place where such club's business was being transacted was a house for the retail of spirituous liquors, and would be in direct conflict with the highest court in criminal matters in this state. If we were to hold that the appellee is liable for the taxes, then, if indicted, under article 110, Penal Code, for selling without having procured license therefor, it would logically follow that, if the case of Koenig v. State is a correct enunciation of the law, the person dispensing the liquors for the club would not be liable to indictment for so doing, and the court of criminal appeals must so hold. Thus, we would have the state of case in which one branch of this department of the state government would enforce the payment of a tax, and another branch of the same department would hold that such person was not liable for the tax; each court so holding being supreme in the sphere of its jurisdiction. In this matter, this court is situated differently from any of the courts of other states which have dealt with this subject, for the reason that this court is the court of last resort in civil matters, but has no jurisdiction in criminal matters, while in other states the same court had jurisdiction of matters, both civil and criminal, arising out of the matter in dispute. Harmony of decision between these courts is important, and should be preserved where it can be upon proper principles, and in no case of doubt would we be willing to conflict with the decisions of that court in matters so nearly related and intimately connected with the subjects of its jurisdiction. We therefore, for these reasons and upon the authorities cited, answer that the Austin Club, in the transactions stated by the court of civil appeals, conducted in the manner therein stated, was not engaged in the business of selling spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors and medicated bitters. We call attention to the fact that we have not considered, in this opinion, the difference between article 8226a and the act of the 28d legislature upon the same subject. See Laws 28d Leg. p. 177.

1. The reservation by an employer, under an independent contract for the construction of a building, of the right of inspection of the work, does not change the character of the contract so as to render the employer liable for the negligence of some of the workmen employed by the contractors.
2. The common council of a city has power to pass an ordinance requiring any owner or contractor building or causing to be built any building abutting on a public sidewalk, to cause a roofed passageway to be built in front on the sidewalk after completion of the first story, under a charter provision giving them power to control and regulate the construction of buildings, to control and regulate streets, and to regulate the manner of using the streets and pavements.
3. An ordinance requiring any owner or contractor constructing any building abutting on a sidewalk to cause a roofed passageway to be built in front of the building after the completion of the first story is a reasonable one, and any owner or contractor who fails to do so is liable for an injury to one passing on the sidewalk not guilty of contributory negligence.
4. One who undertakes to construct the iron work in a building, which is an integral and substantial part thereof consisting of iron girders, beams, and floor joists set in the walls, is a contractor within the meaning of an ordinance requiring any contractor who shall build or cause to be built any building abutting on a public sidewalk to cause a roofed passageway to be built in front on the sidewalk after completion of the first story.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Milwaukee County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Winslow, J. :

This is an action brought to recover damages for injuries to the person of the plaintiff, caused by the falling of a brick from the top of the fourth story of a partially completed building in the city of Milwaukee, owned by the defendant the Milwaukee Builders' & Traders' Exchange. The accident happened on the morning of the 18th of April, 1892. At the time of the accident the defendant exchange was constructing a five-story brick and iron building, and the appellant Neff had contracted with the exchange to build, and was then engaged in building, the masonry of the building, and had completed the walls to the top of the fourth story. The defendants Bayley, who were copartners, had contracted with the exchange to put in place the structural iron for the building. Both Neff and the Bayleys were performing the work undertaken by them under separate and independent contracts with the exchange. Each of said contracts contained a provision that the contractor should well and sufficiently perform and finish his work under the direction and to the satisfaction of Ferry & Clas, architects, acting as agents for the owner." The contracts also contained provisions for the inspection of the work by the architect and his employees. An ordinance of the city of Milwaukee was introduced in evidence, which was in force at the time of the accident, providing in substance that any owner or contractor who should build a building within the fire limits of the city of Milwaukee, abutting upon any public sidewalk, should, after the completion of the first story of the building, cause a passageway to be laid in the front of the building, upon the sidewalk, and cause the same to be roofed at a height not less than 10 feet, and providing for the punishment for failing to comply with the ordinance. The accident to the plaintiff occurred about 8 o'clock on Monday morning. On the Saturday previous Neff had completed the walls of the building to the top of the fourth story, in readiness for the iron girders to be put in place to support the floor of the fifth story. On leaving work Saturday night, Neff's men put canvass upon the walls of the building, with loose bricks thereon to hold it in place. On Monday morning Neff's men were not at work, but the Bayleys were commencing to put the iron girders in place for the fifth story, and hoisting girders and beams to the top of the fourth story by a derrick. The plaintiff resides about a block and a half from the place of the accident, and was thirty years old. She passed along the sidewalk on Fifth street, opposite the building in question, and went to a drug store on Grand avenue, and a few minutes afterwards she returned, and while passing along the sidewalk, within about 6 feet of the building, a brick was in some manner caused to fall from the top of the building, and struck her on the head, fracturing the skull and severely injuring her. The plaintiff claims that all the defendants are liable for her injuries, by reason of negligence. The evidence was conflicting as to whether there were any guards or barriers placed at the north and south ends of the wall, but it was admitted that no roof had been placed over the sidewalk on Fifth street. The jury returned the following special verdict: "(1) At the time the plaintiff first passed along the sidewalk adjacent to the building on Fifth street, on the morning of the accident, had the north end of that sidewalk been guarded by due precaution against accident to pedestrians? A. No. (2) At the time the plaintiff first passed along the sidewalk adjacent to the building on Fifth street, on the morning of the accident, was there a barrier across the north end of said sidewalk sufficient to warn pedestrians it was dangerous to pass along said sidewalk? A. No. (3) At the time the plaintiff passed along the sidewalk, adjacent to the building on Fifth street, on the morning of the accident, was the south end of said walk guarded by due precaution against accident to pedestrians? A. No. (4) At the time the plaintiff first passed along the sidewalk adjacent to the building on Fifth street, on the morning of the accident, was there a barrier across the south end of said sidewalk sufficient to warn pedestrians that it was dangerous to pass along said walk? A. No. (5) Was there any plank across the north end of the sidewalk, which was moved by the men at work in hoisting the iron upon said building, before the plaintiff was injured, and before she passed along Fifth street the first time on that day? A. No. (6) Was the brick which fell from the building and injured the plaintiff displaced from the pier? A. No. (7) Was the brick which fell and injured the plaintiff a loose brick placed on canvass covering the wall or pier? A. Yes. (8) Was the brick which fell and injured the plaintiff caused to fall by the men who were at work hoisting the iron upon the building? A. No. (9) Were men there employed in the business of hoisting iron upon the building at the time the plaintiff passed along said sidewalk the first time? A. Yes. (10) Was the defendant the Milwaukee Builders' & Traders' Exchange guilty of any negligence or want of care which was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff? A. Yes. (11) Was the defendant Max Neff guilty of any negligence or want of care which was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff? A. Yes. (12) Were the defendants the Bayleys guilty of want of ordinary care which contributed to the injury? A. No. (14) If the court shall be of the opinion that plaintiff is entitled to recover, at what sum do you assess her damages? A. $5,000." Judgment for the plaintiff against all of the defendants was entered upon the verdict, and they have appealed separately.

Messrs. Van Dyke & Van Dyke, for appellant Neff:

If the barriers had remained in place, and had not been moved by the iron men or others, without Neff's knowledge or consent, plaintiff would have been prevented from passing along the sidewalk, and even if the protection of the tops of the wall with canvass and loose brick was negligence, it would not have caused the injury complained of without the independent act of those who removed the barriers. Such an intervening, independent cause was the proximate cause of the injury.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The claim made by the defendant the Builders' Exchange, the owner of the building, that Neff and the Bayleys were independent contractors, seems to us well founded. It is true that in their contracts it is provided that the work is to be performed under the direction and to the satisfaction of the architects, acting as agents of the owner, but it is entirely certain from the whole contract that this is simply a reservation of the right of inspection. It is not a reservation of power to control the manner of the work, to change materials to be used, or prescribe ways and methods in which the work is to be carried out. The contractors have agreed to build the building according to fixed plans and specifications, and of certain materials. They can do the work in their own manner and with their own machinery, providing they comply with their contract. The architect can only require that the building be such as the contract demands. He has no control for any other purpose. We do not regard this reservation of the right of inspection of the work as changing the character of the contract. Hughbanks v. Boston Invest. Co. (Iowa) 60 N. W. Rep. 640. It is evident that the falling of the brick was collateral to the contract, and was, if negligence at all, the result of negligent acts on the part of some of the workmen employed by the contractors, and was not the necessary or natural result of any act which the contractors were employed to do. In this situation the owner is not liable, at least in the absence of some other distinct ground of liability. Hundhausen v. Bond, 36 Wis. 29; Hackett v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 80 Wis. 187.

In the present case, however, the plaintiff claims another distinct ground of liability on the part of the owner of the building, as well as the contractors, arising out of the failure to make a covered passageway along the Fifth street front of the building, thus violating the city ordinance referred to in the statement of facts. This ordinance was passed by the common council before the erection of this building was begun, and provides in substance that "any owner or contractor who shall hereafter build or cause to be built" any building abutting on a public sidewalk shall, after the completion of the first story, cause a roofed passageway to be built in front of the building, upon the sidewalk, under pain of a certain fine or imprisonment. The power to pass this ordinance seems clear. The charter gives the common council power "to control and regulate the construction of buildings," "to prevent and prohibit the erection or maintenance of any insecure or unsafe buildings," "to control and regulate streets," "to prevent the encumbering of streets and alleys in any manner and protect the same from any encroachment or injury," and "to regulate the manner of using the streets and pavements." Laws 1874, chap. 184, subchap. 4, § 8. An ordinance passed by the common council, which is within its power to pass and is reasonable, has the effect of law within the corporate limits. This ordinance, we think, is entirely reasonable, and it was therefore law to all intents and purposes, and it required both the owner and contractor to construct a covered way over the sidewalk where this accident happened. Had such a way been constructed the plaintiff could not have been injured. The failure to perform this statutory duty must be held negligence. 2 Thomp. Neg. p. 1232; Mueller v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. 86 Wis. 340, 21 L. R. A. 721, and cases cited; Karle v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. E. R. Co. 55 Mo. 476. If by reason of such negligence damage directly results to any one for whose benefit the law was passed, and who is not guilty of contributory negligence, a civil action for damages may be maintained. Bott v. Pratt, 38 Minn. 323, 53 Am. Rep. 47; McCall v. Chamberlain, 13 Wis. 637. Nor can the nonperformance of such a duty be excused by the plea of an independent contract by which another has agreed to perform the duty. Thomp. Neg. p. 904. The plaintiff's contention that the failure to comply with this ordinance constituted negligence on the part of the owner and on the part of Neff, who was the contractor for the walls and brickwork, must certainly be sustained. The situation of the Bayleys is somewhat different, but still we think that they are contractors who are building a building within the meaning of the ordinance. Doubtless the ordinance would not apply to a painter or a plumber, or a mere plasterer or decorator, or any one whose work does not constitute a substantial part of the building. But the iron work in this case is certainly an integral and substantial part of the building. It consists of iron girders, beams, and floor joists, evidently set in the walls, and without which there could be no building, but a mere shell. The mason and the iron contractor evidently must and do work together to make this building. The work of one seems to be fully as important as that of the other, and neither can do his work if the work of the other is not done. We hold, therefore, that the word "contractor," in the ordinance, applies as well to the Bayleys as to Neff, and that all the defendants are within the terms of the ordinance. The ordinance being a reasonable and valid one, and framed to protect the passenger from injury, when a passenger who is exercising ordinary care is injured by reason of the failure to comply with its provisions he may undoubtedly base a claim of negligence on account of such failure against all whose duty it was, under the ordinance, to make the covered way. These considerations demonstrate that there was no error in overruling the motions for nonsuit and the motions to direct verdicts made by the several defendants. A new trial of the case will be necessary, however, because of certain errors, which we will briefly state:

1. The jury were instructed on the subject of damages that the plaintiff would be entitled to compensation for the pain and suffering which she had endured, also for the pain which it may be likely, or that there is a reasonable probability, that she will endure in the future. This was error. The plaintiff is only entitled to recover for such future pain as the evidence shows she is reasonably certain to endure. Block v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. 89 Wis. 871, 27 L. R. A. 365.

2. The jury were also instructed as follows: "I instruct you, gentlemen, that a person is not guilty of contributory negligence in a case where that person receives an injury, being in a place of danger, because that person does not exercise his best judgment in avoiding injury and escaping from danger when warned. So, if the plaintiff, at the time the brick was seen to be falling from the top of that building, was warned and told to escape,—told to get away from the falling brick,—she is not chargeable with negligence because she did not use the best means of escaping from receiving an injury at that time, because, being in a place of danger, she is not chargeable with negligence if she did not use the best means of escaping." This was misleading in the present case, because no facts in evidence warrant it. The plaintiff denies having received any warning, and the evidence of the defendants' witnesses who testify to having shouted at the plaintiff when the brick was falling shows affirmatively that the plaintiff did not understand or know that she was in any danger, and did not adopt any course of action while facing an imminent danger or sudden peril. Under such circumstances the charge in question should not have been given.

3. The defendants Bayley were not parties to the suit as originally brought, and before they were made parties the deposition of one Kneer was taken. Upon the argument of the case the attorney for the defendant Neff was allowed, against objection, to read a part of this deposition to the jury, against the Bayleys, in reply to the argument of Mr. Sutherland on behalf of the Bayleys. This was error. It could not be used as against the Bayleys, because they were not parties to the action when it was taken.

4. The charge was erroneous, also, when treating of positive and negative testimony. The trial judge practically told the jury that negative testimony was confined to that of a witness who, though present at a transaction, says that he did not see or did not hear. This is too limited a rule. Testimony which is positive in form may amount merely to negative testimony. Ralph v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 32 Wis. 177, 14 Am. Rep. 725; Draper v. Baker, 61 Wis. 450, 50 Am. Rep. 148. It is erroneous, also, to say that the positive testimony of a witness to the existence of a certain thing, and the testimony of another witness that such a thing did not exist, are equally credible. This instruction ignores every well-settled principle which is to be applied in determining the credibility of witnesses, and lays down the rule that one witness will counterbalance another. Draper v. Baker, supra.

Numerous other questions were presented and argued, but we think the general principles laid down in this opinion so far simplify the questions presented that upon a new trial many of these questions will not again arise, and we do not deem it our duty to consider them in this opinion.

Judgment reversed upon all the appeals, and action remanded for a new trial.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

CINCINNATI STREET RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Alta G. MURRAY, Admr., etc., of John L. Murray, Deceased, et al.

(53 Ohio St. 87.)

*1. The act of May 4, 1891, 88 Ohio Laws, 552, provides, in substance, that before a street car shall cross over a railroad track at grade, the street car shall stop not less than 10 nor more than 50 feet from the railroad track, and some employee of the street-railroad company shall go ahead of the car, and ascertain if the way is clear and free from danger for the passage of such car, and said car shall not proceed to cross until signaled so to do by such employee, or said way is clear for the passage over said track. In the absence of extraordinary circumstances, it is negligence to cause such street car to cross such railroad track without stopping the car and going ahead as required by this statute.

2. Whether or not such violation of said statute could be justified or excused by any circumstances whatever,—quære.

*Headnotes by the Court.

3. In an action for damages, to make such negligence actionable it must appear that injury was directly caused thereby.

4. In a trial of an action for damages in such case it is proper for the court to instruct the jury that such failure to stop the car and go ahead, as required by said statute, constitutes negligence, and if the evidence tends to prove that such negligence was the direct cause of the injury, the case should be submitted to the jury. Whether the evidence does or does not so tend is a question of law for the court.

5. If there is only one employee operating such street car, it is his duty to stop the car and go ahead and ascertain if the way is clear and free from danger, and if he finds the way clear for the passage over the track, he may cross over with his car without signaling to any one; but if there are two or more employees operating such car, such signal is required before crossing.

6. Such stopping, going ahead, and signaling, are required at a crossing having gates and a watchman, the same as at other crossings.

judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of her intestate. Affirmed.

Statement by Burket, J.:

This action was brought in the superior court of Cincinnati, by Alta G. Murray, administratrix of the estate of John L. Murray, deceased, against the Cincinnati Street-Railway Company, and the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroad Company, under §§ 6184 and 6185, Revised Statutes, seeking to recover the pecuniary injury resulting from his death by the alleged negligence of said two companies.

The injury occurred on October 4, 1892, at a point where Harrison avenue, in the city of Cincinnati, crosses the double track of the railroad. The avenue is traveled and thronged with persons, vehicles, and street cars, and crosses the railroad at grade. The railroad has a double track, and operates sidings and yard tracks in the immediate vicinity of the crossing, and seventy-five regular trains pass over this crossing every day, besides many switch trains, so that the crossing is regarded as dangerous.

The railroad company had gates at the crossing and a watchman to lower and raise the same, so as to prevent accidents at the crossing. The street car upon which Mr. Murray, who had paid his fare, was a passenger, approached the crossing from the east after dark in the evening. A train of cars was standing on the east side track of the railroad, near the north line of the avenue, and extending some distance north so as to obstruct the view of the main track from persons on the avenue east of the railroad. As the car approached the railroad crossing, the driver of the car checked his horses and brought his car nearly to a stop something less than 50 feet from the railroad, and the conductor of the car was about to step from the car and go forward to see whether it was safe for the street car to cross, when the watchman in charge of the gates called to the employees in charge of the street car to "come ahead" or "come on." The gates this time were in an upright position, indicating that it was safe to cross the railroad tracks. And the watchman who gave the signal to "come ahead" was at the same time sounding the gong signal which was attached to the gates, and was so sounding for the purpose either of indicating to persons about to cross that they should cross promptly and that it was safe to do so, or to warn them that a train was coming and not to attempt to cross, the evidence on this point being conflicting. The driver and conductor of the street car listened and heard no sound of a locomotive bell or whistle or other sounds of an approaching train, and their view of the main track was obstructed by the cars upon the side track. Thereupon the conductor resumed his place on the rear platform of his car, and the driver, in pursuance of the invitation and signal from the watchman to "come ahead," started the street car and attempted to cross the railroad tracks. When the street car was partly across the railroad tracks, and it was too late to avoid a collision by stopping the street car, a "cut of cattle cars," composed of two or three box cars, loaded with livestock, and being pushed by an engine from behind, came down the west track of the railroad, running at the rate of 20 or 25 miles an hour, and blowing no whistle, ringing no bell, and displaying no signal light, approached the crossing. The driver of the street car then made every effort to get his car across the tracks and avoid a collision, but the railway train struck the rear platform of the street car, after the whole of said car, except the rear platform, had passed over the crossing, and thereby Mr. Murray received the injuries from which he shortly thereafter died.

The case was tried to a jury, and verdict rendered against both defendants. A motion was made for a new trial, which was overruled, and judgment entered on the verdict. On petition in error to the circuit court, which then had jurisdiction, the judgment was affirmed. Thereupon the case was brought here by petition in error on part of the street railway company, and by cross petition on the part of the railroad company.

Meers, Paxton, Warrington, & Boutet and Kittredge, Wilby, & Simmons, for plaintiff in error:

Several acts in pari materia and relating to the same subject are to be taken and comprised together in construing them, because they are considered as having one object in view and as acting upon one system.

The courts presume an intention in the legislature to be consistent in the making of laws, and also to have had a purpose in each enactment and all its provisions. Special circumstances often create a necessity for appropriate special provisions, differing from the general rule upon the same subject; and so, where such provisions are found in the statute, different from the general provisions that would apply to the case, the courts must assume that the special provisions were made for adequate reasons, and give them effect by construing them as exceptions to the general rule contained in the general provisions of the statute.

Under the issues as they were made in this case, the failure of the street-railway company to stop its car and send an employee forward, and to do the other things required by the statute, was a fact which, in connection with all the other facts in the case, and disclosed by the evidence, should have been submitted to the jury for their determination of the question whether the street-railway company exercised the degree of care which the law required of it, or whether it was guilty of negligence, which was the proximate cause of the injury.

Messrs. Harmon, Colston, Goldsmith, & Headly for Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroad Company.

Burket, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The errors assigned and relied upon arise upon the charge of the court to the jury as given, and refusal to charge as requested. The general charge as to the liability of the street-railway company in so far as the points made in the argument are concerned, is embraced in the following:

"The Cincinnati Street-Railway Company, at the time and place mentioned, through its agents or servants, was bound to exercise the highest degree of care which prudent men are accustomed to employ under similar circumstances, and to the end that the passenger might be safely carried to the end of his journey, however, without being an insurer of the safety of the passenger, for that the company did not undertake to do. Nor does it under the law stand as an insurer of the safety of the passenger.

"If the jury find from the evidence that the defendant, the Street-Railway Company, is a common carrier of passengers, and that on the 4th day of October, 1892, the plaintiff's intestate was a passenger on the car of the defendant, and having paid his fare, it was the duty of the said defendant to carry him safely to the point of his destination without injury; and when it is shown that the defendant failed to carry the plaintiff's intestate safely to the place of his destination, the failure puts the defendant prima facie or affirmatively in the wrong, and the burden of proof devolves upon the defendant to show that the injury was the result of another independent and intervening cause, and that the injury might not have been prevented by the exercise of that high degree of care to which we have alluded, and which prudent men are accustomed to employ under similar circumstances.

"The laws of Ohio make it the duty of a street-railway company to cause their cars to come to a full stop, not nearer than 10 nor further than 50 feet from the tracks of a steam railway at a crossing, before proceeding to cross; to cause some person in its employ to go ahead of the car and ascertain if the way is clear and free from danger for the passage of such street car, and not to proceed to cross until such action has been taken by such persons so employed and the way is clear for their passage over the said tracks. If you find that the death of the plaintiff's intestate resulted from the omission of such duty, or could have been avoided by the observation of said duty, you may consider it as the act of negligence on the part of the railway company, because of the invitation of the steam railway to come across, they should look and see that the way was clear, that does not relieve the street railway company from its duty to its passengers as I have described."

The plaintiff in error excepted to the last of the above propositions of the general charge.

The court also charged the jury that both railroad and street railway might be found guilty of the wrongful acts causing the injury, if both were concurrent in point of time and fact, and the wrongful act of each was the direct and proximate cause of the injury.

At request of plaintiff below, the court gave the following special charges, to which plaintiff in error excepted:

"1. The statute of Ohio made it the duty of the Cincinnati Street-Railway Company to cause its car to come to a full stop not nearer than 10 feet nor further than 50 feet from the crossing, and before proceeding to cross said steam-railway tracks to cause some person in its employ to go ahead of said car and ascertain if the way was clear and free from danger for the passage of said street car, and not to proceed to cross until signaled so to do by such person so employed as aforesaid, or said way was clear for their passage over said tracks; and I charge you that the omission of such duty is negligence on the part of said defendant, which will render it liable in damages, if you find that the death of the decedent resulted from such omission, or could have been avoided by the observance of this duty.

"2. So far as the street-railway company is concerned, the fact, if you shall find it so to be, that the gateman neglected to let down the gates, or invited the street-car driver to come ahead, does not excuse the company from its failure to send a person in its employ forward to examine the track, and to stop until such person shall have notified them to proceed."

The street-railway company then requested the following five special charges, which the court refused to give, and exceptions were duly taken:

"1. If you find that the defendant steam-railway company, in obedience to an ordinance of Cincinnati, had been and at the time of the accident was maintaining gates with a watchman at the crossing in question, then I charge you that the employees of the defendant street-railway company were not required at the same time and crossing first to stop the street car and then go forward to look for the approach of steam trains, but that such employees had the right to rely on the watchman with the gates of the steam-railway company.

"2. If you find that as the car of the street-railway company approached the steam tracks in question, the gateman of the defendant steam-railway company kept his gates open and by the use of this gong and oral invitation indicated to the driver of the street car that it was safe to, and he should drive across the tracks, and that the street-railway employees while in the exercise of their senses of sight and hearing did not know of such an approach of a train as to make it unsafe to cross the tracks, then I charge you that the street-railway employees were excused from stopping their car or going forward in advance of the car to examine for approaching trains, and that they were justified in accepting such invitation of the gateman and attempting to cross the tracks.

"3. If the jury find from the evidence that the gates established at the steam-railroad crossing were open at the time the street car approached the crossing; the open gates were an affirmative and explicit declaration that it was safe to cross, and that no train or locomotive was approaching the crossing near enough to make it unsafe for the employees of the street-railway company to act upon the invitation to cross; and if you find that the employees of the street railway in the use of their senses of sight and hearing did not know of the approach of a train and were not otherwise warned or advised of its near approach so as to make it unsafe to cross, they were not guilty of negligence in acting upon the invitation extended to them by the open gates.

"4. If you find that Harrison avenue and the steam-railroad track at the point where this collision occurred was a crossing much used both by the steam railroad and the street railroad and the traveling public generally, and the number of trains using the steam road and others using public conveyances and traveling along the street made it necessary and highly important for safety in crossing that persons driving wagons and public conveyances should cross over promptly and quickly, so that the passage of steam railroad trains and of persons desiring to use the street crossing should not be unduly delayed and hindered, and in order to avoid this you should find that it was necessary for the defendant's street car to cross over promptly and speedily—then I charge you that unless the employees of the defendant street-railway company were made aware, or by the exercise of their senses of sight and hearing could have ascertained, that a train was approaching, before they went upon the crossing, so near as to make it unsafe to cross, you may find that they were not negligent in acting upon the invitation presented by the open gates, or such other invitation, if you find any was given, by the employee of the steam railroad in charge of the gate.

"5. If the jury find that the defendant street-railway company's car was slowed up as it approached the tracks of the defendant Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroad Company on Harrison avenue, and that thereupon and before the street car reached the side track of the steam railroad, the gateman of the steam-railroad company personally called to the employees in charge of the street car to "come ahead," or called to them in any other words to that effect, and in response to which the street car went ahead,—then I charge you that there can be no recovery against the street-railway company."

Section 2 of the act of May 4, 1891 (88 Ohio Laws) provides as follows: "Whenever the tracks of any street railroads in this state cross the tracks of any steam railway at grade, the street-railway company operating said line of cars shall cause their street cars to come to a full stop not nearer than 10 feet nor further than 50 feet from the crossing, and before proceeding to cross said steam-railway tracks, shall cause some person in their employ to go ahead of said car or cars, and ascertain if the way is clear and free from danger for the passage of said street cars, and said street-railroad cars shall not proceed to cross until signaled so to do by such person so employed as aforesaid, or said way is clear for their passage over said tracks."

The penalty for a violation of this section is $100, together with liability in damages to the party injured, on the part of both the street-railway company and its employee.

On the part of the street railway, it is contended that the above statute should be read in pari materia with that section of the railroad statute requiring gates and a watchman to be maintained at dangerous crossings, and that when the gates are open and such watchman is at his post and signals the street car to come on and cross, that the employees of the street-railway are thereby relieved and excused from stopping the car and going forward to ascertain whether the crossing is clear and free from danger.

We do not agree with this view. The watchman is placed at his post to prevent accidents and injuries at the crossing, and he and the railroad company are chargeable only with ordinary care, while the street-railway company is a carrier of passengers, and as such is chargeable with a much higher degree of care.

The street-railway statute is for the protection of the lives of its passengers, and in addition is highly penal in its provisions, and by its terms makes no exception of crossings where there are gates and a watchman.

It is therefore clear that the car must stop and the employee go forward, whether there are gates and a watchman or not.

It is also contended, on the part of the street-railway company, that the court erred in its general charge, and in the special charge, in which the court called the attention of the jury to the above statute and the duty thereby imposed of stopping the car and going forward to see that the crossing is clear, and then added: "If you find that the death of the plaintiff's intestate resulted from the omission of such duty, or could have been avoided by the observation of said duty, you may consider it as the act of negligence on the part of the railway company, because of the invitation of the steam railway to come across, they should look and see that the way was clear, that does not relieve the street-railway company from its duty to its passengers as I have described."

The case was argued, both on brief and orally, as if the court had charged that the mere failure to stop the car and failure to go forward to see that the crossing was clear, constituted, per se, such actionable negligence as to warrant a recovery; and it is strongly urged that the question as to whether such failure to stop the car and go forward was or was not negligence on part of the street-railway company, should have been submitted to the jury. Four of the five requests to charge are also in line with this theory. But an examination of the above part of the general charge shows that the court only decided that in this case it was negligence to fail to stop the car and go forward, and then as to whether or not the injury was caused by such negligence was submitted to the jury. The language of the court is: "If you find that death resulted from the omission of such duty or could have been avoided by the observation of such duty."

This clearly leaves to the jury the question as to whether or not the injury was caused by the negligence of not stopping the car, and not going forward as required by statute.

True the effect of the charge was that the failure to stop the car and go forward was negligence. The charge in that regard was strictly correct. The statute requires that the car stop and that an employee go forward and ascertain if the way is clear, and a failure to obey the statute in this regard is negligence, but in an action for damages, and not for penalty, it is not actionable negligence, because to make such negligence actionable some injury must have been directly caused thereby. In such case if there is nothing which in law tends to justify or excuse such negligence, it is not only the right, but the duty, of the trial judge to say to the jury that such omission is negligence, and then, if the evidence tends to prove that such negligence was the direct or proximate cause of the injury, to submit that question to the jury; if the evidence does not so tend, a verdict should be directed for the defendant. Whether or not the evidence so tends is a question of law for the court, and not of fact for the jury.

It may well be doubted whether, under any circumstances, the street-railway company would be justified or excused for violating the statute, but that question is not necessarily involved in this case, as the facts shown at the trial did not even tend toward an excuse or justification.

The trial court in this case said to the jury that if they found that death resulted from the omission of such duty, or could have been avoided by the observation of such duty, the street-railway company would be liable. The true test in such case is, that the injury resulted directly from the negligence complained of, or was directly or proximately caused thereby; but, in the absence of a request to make the charge more specific in that regard, we cannot say that the street-railway company was prejudiced by the charge as given.

It is urged that this failure of duty on the part of the street-railway company was not averred in the petition, and that therefore it cannot be relied upon as a ground of recovery. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Whitacre, 85 Ohio St. 629. The statute prescribes the care to be taken by the street-railway company at a crossing, and the terms of the statute need not be pleaded, but in this case they were pleaded, and were, on motion, very properly stricken out. The petition avers that "the said street-railway company, without exercising any care on its part, negligently and carelessly caused said car, on which said decedent was riding, to be drawn across said steam-railroad tracks." If it drove on without exercising any care, it certainly did not stop its car nor go forward, because that would have been exercising some care, in fact such care as the statute requires. The averment of no care is broad and sweeping, and perhaps indefinite and uncertain, but all this might have been cured by motion.

It is also urged that it is not always necessary to stop the street car and go forward when a railroad crossing is reached, and that the last sentence of the section shows that if the track is clear the car may proceed without stopping and without any one going forward. The section of the statute in question, after providing for the stopping of the street car and an employee going forward to ascertain that the way is clear and free from danger, provides as follows: "And said street-railroad cars shall not proceed to cross until signaled so to do by such person so employed as aforesaid, or said way is clear for their passage over said tracks."

In many cities there is but one employee on a street car, and while he is bound to stop his car and go forward and ascertain if the way is clear and free from danger, he cannot well signal to himself to proceed, and in such case he shall not proceed to cross with his car, "until said way is clear for their passage over said tracks." This last sentence is clearly applicable only to cases where, afteone goes forward, there is no one left in charge of the car to whom a signal can be given. But this does not excuse the employee from stopping his car and going forward and ascertaining whether the way is clear and free from danger.

The railroad company in its brief, asks a reversal of the judgment against it only in case the judgment against the street-railway company should be reversed, but in oral argument it is urged that the judgment against the railroad company should be reversed, and that against the street-railway company affirmed. We find no error in the record prejudicial to either company, and therefore the judgment against both companies is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

HUDSON FURNITURE COMPANY et al.,
Plffs. in Err.,

v.

Edgar HARDING.

(70 Fed. Rep. 462.)

1. The relation to a note of a party whose name is signed on the back of it is a question of general law on which Federal courts are not bound by state decisions.
2. The liability of joint makers of a note is controlled by the law of the place where the contract is payable.
3. A state statute providing that all persons becoming parties to promissory notes payable on time, by signature on the back thereof, shall be entitled to the same notice of nonpayment as indorsers, must control the decisions of a Federal court as to the rights of parties to a note payable in that state.
4. State legislation with respect to the law merchant must be recognized and enforced by Federal courts, although in the absence of such statutes they are not bound by state decisions on the subject.
5. There is no common law of the United States, except possibly as the common law of England has been adopted with reference to the construction of powers granted to the Federal Union.
6. Insolvency of the maker of a note is no excuse for failure to give notice of dishonor.
7. The fact that persons who became joint makers of a corporation note were directors of the company and constituted a majority of the board does not make it unnecessary to give them notice of dishonor of the note, when, by the law of the state, joint makers are entitled to the same notice as indorsers.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Wisconsin to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed

Before Woods and Jenkins, Circuit Judges, and Baker, District Judge.

Statement by Jenkins, Circuit Judge:

This suit was brought to recover the amount of a promissory note executed by the Hudson Furniture Company (a corporation of the state of Wisconsin), dated Hudson, Wis., March 26, 1892, payable April 14, 1893, to the order of Edgar Harding, the defendant in error, for the sum of $5,000, payable at the North National Bank, Boston, Mass. Prior to its delivery or acceptance, the plaintiffs in error severally signed their names upon the back thereof for the purpose of giving credit to such note with the payee. It was thereupon sent by mail from Hudson, Wis., to the payee, at his residence in the state of Massachusetts, with the request that he would accept it in lieu of and in extension of a note of the Hudson Furniture Company for a like amount then held by him, and maturing at or about the date of the new note. It was received by the payee in the state of Massachusetts, and there accepted by him for the prior obligation of the company, upon the faith and security of the individual names upon the paper. The note was not paid at maturity. It was not properly protested for nonpayment, nor were the plaintiffs in error seasonably notified of its presentment and nonpayment. At the time of its execution and delivery, the Hudson Furniture Company was insolvent, to the knowledge of the plaintiffs in error, who were directors of the company, constituting the majority of its board of directors at the time of its execution, and so continued down to and after the maturity of the note.

By the statute of Massachusetts (Stat. 1874, chap. 404) it is enacted that "all persons becoming parties to promissory notes payable on time, by signature on the back thereof, shall be entitled to notice of the nonpayment thereof the same as indorsers."

The case was tried in the court below, without the intervention of a jury. The court found the facts as above stated, and, as conclusion of law upon such facts, held that the several individual defendants (plaintiffs in error here) were "joint and several makers of said note, and therefore not entitled to protest of said note," and judgment was rendered against all the defendants for the amount due upon the note.

It is assigned for error that the court erred in the following respects: (1) In the finding and decision of the said circuit court that at the time of the execution and delivery of the note upon which this action was brought to the plaintiff, the defendant, the Hudson Furniture Company, was insolvent;

(2) in that the said court also found and decided that such insolvency was known by the defendants, Phipps, Coon, Jones, and Goss; (3) in the finding and decision of the said court that the said Phipps, Coon, Jones, and Goss signed the said note; (4) in the finding and decision of said court that said Phipps, Coon, Jones, and Goss were not entitled to protest of said note; (5) in the finding and decision that plaintiff recover from the defendants above named the amount due on said note, with interest and costs; (6) in the finding and decision of said court by which judgment is ordered according to the findings.

Union Bank v. Willis, 8 Met. 504, 41 Am. Dec. 541; Way v. Butterworth, 108 Mass. 509.

The statute in question provides that such party shall be entitled to notice the same as an indorser. This act, being in derogation of the common law, is to be strictly construed, and the common law held repealed thereby no further "than is expressly declared, or the clear import of the language used absolutely requires."

23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 388.

Numerous conditions exist in the law, dispensing with the necessity of demand and notice:

1. Where the drawer, by virtue of the relations existing between himself and his drawee, has no reason to expect the paper to be cared for.

2. Where the facts are such as to make it the duty of the drawer or indorser to provide for the payment of the paper.

3. Where the relations between drawer and indorsers are such that the indorser must know, or the law will impute notice, of the nonpayment or dishonor.

Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 355; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1685; Hull v. Myers, 90 Ga. 674.

Jenkins, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

We are not at liberty to review the evidence to ascertain whether the finding of the court below upon the facts was warranted by the testimony. We are restricted to the comsideration of the question whether the facts as found support the judgment rendered. Jenks v. Stapp, 9 U. S. App. 84, 3 C. C. A. 244, and 52 Fed. Rep. 641. We must therefore consider the case upon the assumption that, at the time of the execution of the note, the Hudson Furniture Company was insolvent, to the knowledge of the individual parties to the note, who were its directors. Whether the term "insolvent," as employed in the findings, was used in the sense of inability to meet obligations as they mature, and in contradistinction to "bankruptcy," meaning an absolute inability to pay a debt, without respect to time,—a want of assets convertible into money sufficient to pay the debt,—it is not necessary for us to consider. It may be observed, however, that it appears from the record that this corporation continued a going concern after the making of the note, and until February 11, 1893, when, at a meeting of the stockholders of the company, it was resolved that owing to the large loss of the company in its business during the previous year, as disclosed by the treasurer's report, the board of directors was authorized to proceed at once to collect all outstanding accounts, sell the property of the company, and apply the proceeds to the payment of its debt, and generally to do every and all things necessary to wind up the affairs of the company at the earliest date practicable.

"Insolvency," in a popular sense, means "bankruptcy." There is, however, a state of insolvency which does not necessarily imply bankruptcy. This is true, doubtless, within the experience of most merchants and corporations engaged in trade. It is the incident of nearly every business that periods of depression are experienced, when there is a total inability to meet obligations as they mature; not from want of sufficient assets, but from inability to turn them presently into money for the payment of debts. That is a state of insolvency which, continuing, may ultimately result in bankruptcy. It, however, often occurs that by prudent management, well-directed energy, and by the indulgence of creditors, the business is kept upon its feet, and, with the advent of more prosperous times, at last re-established upon a sure and solvent basis. We are unable to say in what sense the term "insolvent" was employed in these findings of fact. The history of the company, as we read it in the evidence, and as stated in the letter inclosing and asking acceptance of this note by Mr. Harding, indicates that the company was financially embarrassed, but that its directors hoped, through the indulgence of its creditors, to restore the company to a solvent condition, and to pay its notes after the end of the then current year. We have said this much, not that we deem the fact essential to a correct decision of the case, but simply to call attention to the necessity that, in findings of fact which are to be presented for review in this court, care should be taken that terms should not be employed which are susceptible of double or of doubtful interpretation. This is of importance, since we are without authority to review the evidence to ascertain the sense in which terms are employed, or to declare the sense in which they should have been used.

It is settled doctrine that the Federal courts, in the exercise of their co-ordinate jurisdiction, are not bound by the decisions of the state courts upon subjects of general law, but are at liberty to follow the convictions of their own judgment. Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 1, 10 L. ed. 865; Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. National Bank, 103 U. S. 14, 26 L. ed. 61; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 27 L. ed. 359; Myrick v. Michigan C. R. Co. 107 U. S. 102, 27 L. ed. 325; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Prentiss, 147 U. S. 106, 37 L. ed. 101. Therefore, notwithstanding it has been held by the supreme court of the state in which this note was executed that parties standing in like relation to bills and notes with the plaintiffs in error here are to be treated as indorsers (Blakeslee v. Herrett, 76 Wis. 841), the Supreme Court of the United States, in Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 90, 24 L. ed. 841, and Bendey v. Townsend, 109 U. S. 665, 667, 27 L. ed. 1065, 1066, has determined that they must be treated as joint makers of the note with the party who appears thereon as maker. And such is also the law of Massachusetts. Union Bank v. Willis, 8 Met. 504, 41 Am. Dec. 541; Brown v. Butler, 99 Mass. 179; Way v. Butterworth, 108 Mass. 509; Allen v. Brown, 124 Mass. 77. We are therefore constrained to hold that the plaintiffs in error were joint makers with the Hudson Furniture Company of this note, and, if the contract is to be controlled by the law of the state of Wisconsin, were not entitled to notice of protest. Being joint makers of the note, their liability is controlled by the law of the place where the contract is payable, because they are deemed to have reference to the law of such place in the construction of the obligation assumed. Brabston v. Gibson, 50 U. S. 9 How. 263, 277, 18 L. ed. 131, 137; Calhoun County Supers. v. Galbraith, 99 U. S. 214, 218, 25 L. ed. 410, 411; Pierce v. Indseth, 106 U. S. 546, 27 L. ed. 254; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. § 895. It would be otherwise with respect to the indorser of a note, for he is treated as in fact entering into a new obligation, undertaking that the maker will pay at the time and place stipulated, and that he (the indorser) will respond to his obligation at the place of the execution of his indorsement, if there delivered, in the event of dishonor and notice. If delivered at a place other than at the place of execution, the law of the place where delivered controls. Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 868, 899; Slacum v. Pomeroy, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 221, 3 L. ed. 204; Musson v. Lake, 45 U. S. 4 How. 262, 11 L. ed. 967. The plaintiffs in error thus being joint makers of a note payable and delivered in the state of Massachusetts, their obligation is to be judged by the law of that state.

We are therefore brought to the inquiry whether the statute of that state to which reference has been made is operative to clothe the joint makers with the rights to notice of protest that an indorser is entitled to. This statute manifestly regards all parties to a note by signature on the back thereof, whether they were to be treated as guarantors or as joint makers, in the light of sureties for the maker, and recognizes the equitable right of such parties to notice of dishonor of the note by their principal. It sought to place them, with respect to presentment, demand, and notice of dishonor, upon the same footing with an indorser. The statute was thus construed by the supreme judicial court of that commonwealth in National Bank v. Law, 127 Mass. 72, prior to the execution of the contract in question. We are, of course, bound by that construction. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 133 U. S. 587, 38 L. ed. 784, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 801; Baltimore Traction Co. v. Baltimore Belt R. Co. 151 U. S. 187, 38 L. ed. 102. So that, assuming the validity of that statute, any one becoming a party to a note payable on time by signature on the back thereof, whether he be treated as guarantor or joint maker, is in fact a mere surety for the maker; his liability is conditional and secondary; and before he can be charged, he must have the same notice of protest that an indorser by the law merchant would be entitled to under like circumstances. He stands in this respect in the shoes of an indorser. The statute entered into and is a term of the contract. The engagement of the plaintiffs in error, therefore, was that if, upon due demand, the note should not be paid according to its tenor, they would compensate the holder or a subsequent indorser who was compelled to pay, provided the requisite proceedings on dishonor were duly taken.

It is urged, however, that we must disregard this statute; and in support of this contention the broad doctrine is asserted that the several states of this Union have no right by statute to change the general commercial law. This contention is rested upon certain observations of justices delivering the opinions of the court in Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 1, 18 L. ed. 885, 871, and Watson v. Tarpley, 59 U. S. 18 How. 517, 521, 15 L. ed. 509, 511. In the former case it is said: "In all the various cases which have hitherto come before us for decision, this court has uniformly supposed that the true interpretation of the 84th section limited its application to state laws, strictly local; that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state, and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character. It never has been supposed by us that the section did apply, or was designed to apply to questions of a more general nature, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation, as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial law, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves, that is, to ascertain, upon general reasoning and legal analogies, what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case. And we have not now the slightest difficulty in holding that this section, upon its true intendment and construction is strictly limited to local statutes and local usages of the character before stated, and does not extend to contracts and other instruments of a commercial nature, the true interpretation and effect whereof are to be sought, not in the decisions of the local tribunals, but in the general principles and doctrines of commercial jurisprudence. Undoubtedly the decisions of the local tribunals upon such subjects are entitled to, and will receive, the most deliberate attention and respect of this court; but they cannot furnish positive rules or conclusive authority by which our own judgments are to be bound up and governed. The law respecting negotiable instruments may be truly declared in the language of Cicero, adopted by Lord Mansfield in Luke v. Lyde, 2 Burr. 882, 887, to be in a great measure, not the law of a single country only, but of the commercial world."

In the latter case the observation which is supposed to warrant the asserted restriction upon the rights of the states is as follows: "The general commercial law being circumscribed within no local limits, nor committed for its administration to any peculiar jurisdiction, and the Constitution and laws of the United States having conferred upon the citizens of the several states, and upon aliens, the power or privilege of litigating and enforcing their rights acquired under and defined by that general commercial law, before the judicial tribunals of the United States, it must follow by regular consequence, that any state law or regulation the effect of which would be to impair the rights thus secured, or to divest the Federal courts of cognizance thereof, in their fullest acceptance under the commercial law, must be nugatory and unavailing. The statute of Mississippi, so far as it may be understood to deny, or in any degree to impair, the right of a nonresident holder of a bill of exchange, immediately after presentment to and refusal to accept by the drawee, and after protest and notice, to resort forthwith to the courts of the United States by suit upon such bill, must be regarded as wholly without authority and inoperative. The same want of authority may be affirmed of a provision in the statute which would seek to render the right of recovery by the holder, after regular presentment and protest, and notice for nonacceptance, dependent upon proof of subsequent presentment, protest, and notice for nonpayment. A requisition like this would be a violation of the general commercial law, which a state would have no power to impose, and which the courts of the United States would be bound to disregard."

It may not be denied that the language employed gives color of authority to the pretension. It is therefore necessary to ascertain the precise questions there involved, in order to discover whether the remarks quoted were pertinent to the subject under discussion, and necessary to be determined, and so authoritative and binding upon us as decisions of the court. In the former case the question was whether a certain defense to a bill of exchange, being a contract made within the state of New York, and governed by its law, was available; and this contention was rested upon the ground that the courts of New York had decided affirmatively upon that question. The supreme court held: First, that the question had never been definitely determined in the courts of that state; and, secondly, if it had been so determined, the decision would not be binding upon the Federal courts with respect to principles established in the general commercial law, under the 34th section of the judiciary act of 1789; that decisions of the state courts do not constitute laws within the meaning of the act, but are merely evidence of what the laws are; and that the term "law," as there used, refers to the acts of the legislature or long-established local customs having the force of law. It is to be observed that the judgment in that case was carefully limited to the effect of decisions of local tribunals. Mr. Justice Story, delivering the opinion, remarks with respect to the facts of the case that "it is observable that the courts of New York do not found their decisions upon any local statute or positive, fixed, or ancient local usage, but they adduce the doctrine from the general principles of commercial law." The decision in the case upon the precise question presented is now universally recognized as correct, but whatever was said with respect to local statutes and their effect was upon a question not involved in the case. The language of Cicero, adopted by Lord Mansfield, and quoted by Mr. Justice Story, is undoubtedly correct,—that the law of negotiable instruments is in a great measure, not the law of a single country only, but of the commercial world. That was the statement of an historical fact, as true to-day as in the time of Cicero. The underlying principles of the commercial law are the same in all commercial countries; but, as matter of fact, the customs and laws of the various commercial nations differ widely with respect to negotiable paper. The law merchant, as we have received it from the common law, grew out of the customs of the merchants of London, and in many essential particulars is at variance with the commercial law of continental Europe. The language quoted from Cicero by no means suggests, nor is it true, that it is beyond the power of each sovereignty to change the commercial law to suit its pleasure. In the latter case, of Watson v. Tarpoley, a statute of the state of Mississippi provided that "no action or suit shall be sustained or commenced on any bill of exchange until after the maturity thereof." This statute was invoked in defense of an action in the Federal court prior to the maturity of the bill against the drawer of the bill upon protest for nonacceptance. A question in the case was whether the statute of a state could thus restrict the right of a party to pursue his suit in a Federal court. The court held adversely upon that question. It is to be noted that the statute relied upon did not go to the question of liability upon the contract, nor impose any new term upon commercial contracts, but merely affected the remedy thereon, postponing suit until after maturity of the bill. The decision was certainly correct, because no state statute can thus control the remedy of a suitor in a Federal court.

The observations referred to in both the cases were certainly obiter so far as they seem to imply or can be properly construed as holding that a state is without power with respect to contracts made within its jurisdiction, and controlled by its law. In view of the eminent learning of the distinguished jurists referred to, their observations are to be treated with great deference; but, if susceptible of the meaning contended for, they cannot be held to declare the settled law of the land without determination of the question by the supreme court in a cause wherein the question was involved and necessary to be decided.

There are a number of decisions of the supreme court which distinctly recognize the right of such legislation by the state. Thus, in Bank of United States v. Donnelly, 88 U. S. 8 Pet. 361, 8 L. ed. 974, it is asserted that: "The general principle adopted by civilized nations is, that the nature, validity, and interpretation of contracts are to be governed by the law of the country where the contracts are made, or are to be performed [the remedy being governed by the lex fori]."

In Musson v. Lake, 45 U. S. 4 How. 262, 278, 11 L. ed. 967, 978, the question being whether the contract between the holder and indorser of the bill in controversy was to be governed by the law of Louisiana, where the bill was payable, or by the law of Mississippi, where it was drawn and indorsed, the court says: "This part of the contract was, by the agreement of the parties, to be performed in Mississippi, where the suit was brought and is now depending. The construction of the contract, and the diligence necessary to be used by the plaintiffs to entitle them to a recovery, must therefore be governed by the laws of the latter state."

In Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. National Bank of The Republic, supra, Mr. Justice Harlan speaking for the court, observes (page 25 of 103 U. S. and 66 of 26 L. ed.): "According to the very general concurrence of judicial authority in this country as well as elsewhere, it may be regarded as settled in commercial jurisprudence—there being no statutory regulations to the contrary—that where negotiable paper is received," etc.

And so in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 87 L. ed. 97, Mr. Justice Gray, delivering the opinion of the court, remarks upon the question then under consideration that "It is a question, not of local law, but of general jurisprudence, upon which this court, in the absence of express statute regulating the subject, will exercise its own judgment, uncontrolled by the decisions of the courts of the several states."

The contention that this statute of Massachusetts is invalid and inoperative goes to the extent of depriving a state of power to legislate with respect to the law merchant. It presents a bold and far-reaching proposition, striking at the root of power in the respective states to which we are not prepared to yield assent. We are referred to no provision of the Constitution which expressly or impliedly inhibits the exercise of such power by the state. The contention assumes that there is a commercial law of the United States distinct from and independent of the law of the states. Whence came it, and how was it adopted? Was it the common law of England or the civil law of continental Europe? Was it a law appropriated by the nation upon the adoption of the Constitution? It must, then, be universal in its application throughout the nation, overriding all state laws upon the subject and all right of the states to legislate. We know that most of the states are governed by the common law of England as modified and adapted to the peculiar circumstances and conditions of each, and that one state, at least, is governed by the civil law. And we know, moreover, that the commercial law existing in these various states, while alike with regard to underlying principles, is widely different in many essential respects. There is no common law of the United States, except possibly as the common law of England has been adopted with reference to the construction of powers granted to the Federal Union.

This subject received the consideration of the court in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 478, 31 L. ed. 503, 512, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, and was there determined, Mr. Justice Matthews, speaking for the court, saying: "There is no common law of the United States, in the sense of a national customary law, distinct from the common law of England as adopted by the several states each for itself, applied as its local law, and subject to such alteration as may be provided by its own statutes. Wheaton v. Peters, 38 U. S. 8 Pet. 591, 8 L. ed. 1055. A determination in a given case of what that law is may be different in a court of the United States from that which prevails in the judicial tribunals of a particular state. This arises from the circumstance that the courts of the United States, in cases within their jurisdiction, where they are called upon to administer the law of the state in which they sit or by which the transaction is governed, exercise an independent though concurrent jurisdiction, and are required to ascertain and declare the law according to their own judgment. This is illustrated by the case of New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, where the common law prevailing in the state of New York, in reference to the liability of common carriers for negligence, received a different interpretation from that placed upon it by the judicial tribunals of the state; but the law as applied was none the less the law of that state. In cases, also, arising under the lex mercatoria, or law merchant, by reason of its international character, this court has held itself less bound by the decisions of the state courts than in other cases. Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 1, 10 L. ed. 865; Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. Id. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044; Oates v. First Nat. Bank, 100 U. S. 239, 25 L. ed. 580; Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. National Bank, 102 U. S. 14, 26 L. ed. 61. There is, however, one clear exception to the statement that there is no national common law. The interpretation of the Constitution of the United States is necessarily influenced by the fact that its provisions are framed in the language of the English common law, and are to be read in the light of its history. The Code of constitutional and statutory construction which, therefore, is gradually formed by the judgments of this court, in the application of the Constitution and the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof, has for its basis so much of the common law as may be implied in the subject, and constitutes a common law resting on national authority. Moors v. United States, 91 U. S. 270, 23 L. ed. 346."

Mr. Daniel, in his valuable treatise upon the law of Negotiable Instruments (secs. 863, 864), defines the principle which should rule the question in the following explicit language: "Each one of the United States is, in contemplation of its own and of the Federal Constitution, a distinct and independent sovereignty, with its own peculiar code of laws and system of judicature. And while, in the aggregate, they compose one integral confederacy, which is itself an independent nation, paramount in certain respects to the states, in all other respects the states retain their separate autonomies, and are deemed as much foreign to each other as if not in any wise associated together. The regulation of contracts comes peculiarly within the province of the states, and therefore contracts between citizens of the different states, while they may be enforced by process in the Federal courts, nevertheless are to be construed and effectuated, not by a general system of laws which overspread the whole country, but in accordance with the principles of international law which govern transactions between parties of different nations.

"Sec. 864. As long as all the parties to a bill or note are confined within the limits of a single state, the local law alone determines their rights and liabilities. No suit can be brought in a Federal court, and any question which may be litigated begins and ends with the local tribunals. But the vast and constant traffic between the states, and the general use of bills and notes as a medium of exchange, give circulation to those instruments from hand to hand, and from state to state; and questions of nicety are often presented in the inquiry by what law the rights and liabilities of the parties are to be ascertained. In some of the states, as in Maryland, the English statute of 3 & 4 Anne is in force. In others, as in Virginia, where none but notes payable at bank are negotiable, there are peculiar statutory provisions respecting commercial paper. In all of the states, each recognizes the precedents of its own courts, as independently of the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States as of those of Great Britain, which may, indeed, shed great light on all commercial questions, but are of no binding authority. When suit is brought in one of the Federal courts, it, on the other hand, will be guided by the general law merchant in questions referable to it, and will follow its own views about it, unless the nature of the liability contracted has already been determined, in the particular state of the contract, at the time it was entered into."

We are of opinion that these principles are not shaken by the obiter dicta to which reference has been made. It will thus be seen that, in the exercise of the concurrent jurisdiction of the Federal court with respect to all contracts not within the exclusive control of the Federal government, we administer the law of the state which controls the contract, and that each state has the right to impose such conditions and limitations upon contracts, not inhibited by the terms of its own or the Federal Constitution, as it may see proper. It is, of course, most desirable that there should be uniformity of laws with respect to commercial paper,—a necessity becoming more and more emphasized day by day, and which may possibly result in the grant of exclusive control of the subject to the Federal government. It is not, however, within our province to bring about such a result, however desirable. We are constrained to hold that the act of Massachusetts here in question was a valid exercise of power, and became a term of this contract. The nature of the liability at the time of the making of the contract was declared by the statute law of the state of the contract, and we must construe the contract in the light of such statute law.

We are thus brought to the question whether the known insolvency of the maker at the time of the execution of the note, and the fact that the plaintiffs in error were directors, constituting a majority of the board of directors, of the maker of the note, obviate the necessity of presentment of the note for payment, and the giving of seasonable notice of dishonor. The contract of the parties was conditional. It was, as we have seen, that if, upon due demand, the note should not be paid by the corporation according to its tenor, they would compensate the holder, or a subsequent indorser who is compelled to pay, provided the requisite proceedings for dishonor were duly taken. That there should be demand of payment and notice of dishonor were terms incorporated into this contract. Rothschild v. Currie, 1 Q. B. 48. The reason of the condition imposed by the law doubtless was that the indorser might take prompt measures for his security, and the law presumed injury from want of notice of dishonor. This presumption is certainly not refuted by proof of the solvency of the maker evidencing that no injury resulted from want of notice to the indorser. It is said, however, that insolvency known to the indorser dispenses with the necessity of notice, because nothing could be lost by default of demand and notice. We are not prepared to concur in the conclusion of fact. We have said that the solvency of the maker, when no possible loss could result to the indorser from want of notice, will not excuse failure to advise of dishonor. Certainly, in the case of insolvency notice is more essential, that the party to be charged may take prompt measures for his security. The insolvency of the maker might possibly affect the sufficiency of indemnity, but it would not necessarily result in a total failure of redress. That would be dependent upon the extent of the insolvency. There have been cases, invested with peculiar equities, in which courts have sought to evade this wholesome rule of the common law, and in which they have permitted evidence of no injury to excuse notice. We are not prepared to follow a rule that will tend to confusion in commercial law in order to relieve a supposed hardship. We concur with the supreme court of Massachusetts in Farnum v. Fowle, 12 Mass. 89, 92, 7 Am. Dec. 85, that "the hardship, if any, arises from a fluctuation of opinions, and an uncertainty as to rules; and seldom from an inflexible adherence to them; because, when it is once known that exactness in the performance of duty is to be required, parties will adapt themselves to such a state of things, and be always diligent and punctual to avail themselves of their contracts." And we concur with Mr. Daniel (Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1184) that it is "a total misconception of the obligation of an indorser to place his liability at all upon any question involving the pecuniary circumstances of his principal." Hardship is more likely to happen from speculation of courts and juries in the determination of the question of fact whether injury has or has not resulted from want of notice than from strict adherence to the law and to the terms of the contract. The better opinion is, and, as we think, the settled doctrine of this country is, that insolvency is no excuse for failure of notice of dishonor. French v. Bank of Columbia, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 141, 2 L. ed. 576; Wilson v. Senior, 14 Wis. 880; Sandford v. Dillaway, 10 Mass. 52, 6 Am. Dec. 99; Farnum v. Fowle, 12 Mass. 89, 7 Am. Dec. 85; Granite Bank v. Ayers, 16 Pick. 392; Lee Bank v. Spencer, 6 Met. 308, 39 Am. Dec. 784.

Nor do we think that the fact that the plaintiffs in error were directors and constituted a majority of the board of directors of the maker of the note is matter of moment or excuses failure of notice. The case of Hull v. Myers, 90 Ga. 674, is urged upon our attention in support of this contention. The decision of the court upon this question is bottomed, as we think, upon incorrect reasoning, and is without the support of authority. The court says: "Though the debt is his and not their own, primarily, yet, having all his assets and full power over them, and over all his business, they are bound to know all that he would be bound to know were his business and assets in his own hands and under his own management."

If we grant this, we have already seen that the settled law of the land is that knowledge by the indorser of the solvency or insolvency of the maker will not excuse want of notice. The court further observes: "In this instance the principal being a corporation, and the indorsers the corporate directors, the latter could have no right or reason to expect that funds would be provided for liquidating the debt, unless it was done by their procurement or through their agency."

This is true if it means that the funds to meet the note are in a sense to be procured through and appropriated to the debt by the agency of the board of directors; but it is not necessarily true if it means that the funds are to be procured through the agency of the indorsers of the note. Their contract is personal and individual, and is not affected by their official relation to the company. The directors, in the management of the property of a corporation, have no duty imposed upon them or upon any member of the board to furnish funds for the uses of the corporation, save such as arise from the fact that the property of the corporation is committed to their care. Unless knowledge by the indorser of the insolvency of the maker of a note can avail to dispense with the necessity of a notice, we are unable to approve this decision. The defect in its reasoning seems apparent from the following clause: "A single director, or even a minority of the directors, indorsing a note for the corporation, might be entitled to notice of dishonor, for one only, or a small number, might have a right to suppose that the note would be attended to at maturity; but when the whole board, or a majority of its members, unite in the indorsement, each and all so indorsing should be charged with the duty and responsibility of protecting the paper, since the power to control the conduct of the corporation in respect to paying or not paying would be in their own hands."

It seems a curious conclusion that, because the note is indorsed by a majority of the board of directors, therefore the individual liability of each is fixed, and want of notice of dishonor excused, upon the ground that they should act together as a majority, and so could appropriate funds of the corporation to the payment of the note. The argument assumes that they must act together as a majority of the board of directors; that there are funds of the corporation which should have been applied to the payment of the note, and were not applied, because of the non-action by the indorsers. The argument concedes that, if the note were indorsed by a minority of the directors, failure to give notice would not be excused. But by what right does the court assume that the majority of the directors indorsing the note will or should act together as a majority in the board upon any question affecting the interests of the company? The argument proceeds upon the theory that they should act in their own interest to protect their liability, and possibly in opposition to the interests of creditors. We think the case is founded upon a mistaken notion of the duties and obligations of directors. They are only to administer the property of the corporation as they find it. They are not obliged to furnish funds for the use of their principal, nor ought they, as directors, to protect their individual interests against the interests of their principal. It is, moreover, to be observed, that, in the case we have now in hand, the body of the stockholders, some two months prior to the maturity of this note, directed the officers of the company to wind up the affairs of the company at the earliest date practicable, to collect all its assets, sell all its property, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the debts of the company. The corporation then ceased to be a going concern.

We have held in Sutton Mfg. Co. v. Hutchinson, 11 C. C. A. 320, 68 Fed. Rep. 496, that "when a private corporation is dissolved, or becomes insolvent, and determines to discontinue the prosecution of business, its property is thereafter affected by an equitable lien or trust for the benefit of creditors. The duty in such cases, of preserving it for creditors, rests upon the directors or officers to whom has been committed the authority to control and manage its affairs. Although such directors and officers are not technical trustees, they hold, in respect of the property under their control, a fiduciary relation to creditors; and necessarily, in the disposition of the property of an insolvent corporation, all creditors are equal in right, unless preference or priority has been legally given by statute or by the act of the corporation to particular creditors."

It would have been a violation of duty for the plaintiffs in error, as directors of the company, after this resolution of the stockholders, to have sought to apply the assets of the corporation to the payment of this particular debt for which they were conditionally liable, and thus to relieve themselves of liability, to the detriment of the general creditors of the company. Their duty was to refrain from applying the assets of the corporation to the payment of this note if the assets of the corporation were insufficient to pay all debts in full. Their power by the resolution became limited, and their duty was to marshal all the assets of the corporation, and apportion them ratably among all the creditors of the corporation according to their equality of right. They could not legally have done that which the supreme court of Georgia, in the case referred to, holds that they should have done, and failure so to do wrought legal excuse for failure of duty on the part of the holder of the note. In this respect this case is distinguishable from the case of Hull v. Myers.

The court below held that the plaintiffs in error were joint makers of the note, and therefore not entitled to notice of protest. We have seen that, by the law of Massachusetts which governs this contract, they were entitled to notice, notwithstanding that relation to the paper. We hold that failure of notice is not excused by anything apparent on the record, and that the plaintiffs in error are discharged from liability upon the paper by reason of failure of proper demand and of seasonable notice of dishonor.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to render judgment for the plaintiffs in error upon the findings.

Introduction.

The principal case adds another to the list of states which hold that the rules and doctrines of the common law regarding the husband's liability for the wife's torts have not been abrogated by state statutes, and therefore the husband remains liable as at common law for a libel or slander committed by the wife.

I. The common-law doctrine.

The common-law liability of the husband for the torts of his wife, such as slander, is placed upon the same ground as his responsibility for other wrongs committed by her.

Thus, in an action to recover damages against the husband alone for slander uttered by the wife, the court stated the rule as follows: For the wife's torts, committed during coverture, the husband is responsible, and such torts may be committed in either of the following circumstances: First, where the husband is absent and has no knowledge of the intended act; second, where the husband is absent, but where the tort is done under his direction and instigation; third, where the husband is present, but the wife acts of her own volition; and fourth, where the tort is committed in the company of the husband, and by his command or encouragement. In the first three cases they are jointly liable, and 30 L. R. A.

hours of the morning after Thanksgiving." These words involved moral turpitude on plaintiff's part, as well as charged him with the commission of an indictable offense. Held, that they were slanderous per se.

(November 5, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District court for Ramsey County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for slander. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Theodore M. Holland, with Mr. John L. Townley, for appellants:

The unprecedented enlargement of married women's property rights, which took place even before Minnesota passed into statehood, and which was known as section 115 (106) of chapter 61 (71) of the Public Statutes of Minnesota of 1849-1858, had swept out of existence the the wife must be joined, for the reason that she is in reality the offending party, and if the marriage should be dissolved by divorce or the death of either before judgment is recovered, the liability of the husband ceases, he being joined because she cannot be sued alone; but in the fourth case, the law considers the tort as committed by the husband, and he alone is liable, but in order to exempt her from liability, the concurrence of his presence and his command must be shown; a wrong done by his direction, but not in his company, does not excuse her; nor does his presence if unaccompanied by his direction. The court further stated that the rule as laid down in 2 Kent, Com. 149, to the effect that "if committed in his company, or by his order, he alone is liable," was too broad. Kosminsky v. Goldberg, 44 Ark. 401 (1884).

The reasons for the rule of the common law in such actions have been thus stated: At common law the husband has the control, almost absolute, over her person, is entitled, as the result of the marriage, to her services, and consequently to her earnings, to her goods and chatties; he has the right to reduce her chose in action to possession during her life, can collect, and enjoy the rents and profits of her real estate, and thus has dominion over her property and becomes the arbiter of her future. The wife is in a condition of complete dependence, cannot contract in her own name, is bound to obey him, and her legal existence is merged in that of her husband so that they are termed and regarded as one person in law; as a necessary consequence he is liable for her debts dum sola, and for her torts and frauds committed during coverture, if they are done in his presence or by his procurement, he alone is liable, otherwise they must be sued jointly. Martin v. Robson, 65 Ill. 129 16 Am. Rep. 578 (1872).

So, it has been held that at common law a husband is liable for slanderous words spoken by his wife. McElfresh v. Kirkendall, 36 Iowa, 224 (1873).

And the party slandered has an action against them jointly, and the husband's property is liable to be taken in satisfaction of the judgment rendered therein. Hill v. Duncan, 110 Mass. 238 (1872).

To the same extent as if she alone were answerable. Austin v. Wilson, 4 Cush. 273, 50 Am. Dec. 766 (1849).

For torts such as slander committed by the wife not in the presence of her husband and not by his coercion they are jointly liable, and must be joined in the action. Smith v. Taylor, 11 Ga. 20 (1852).

last remnant of the husband's common-law liability for his wife's torts, in this state.

Under similar provisions, the identically same question arose in Illinois which is the question in this case,—whether a husband was any longer liable for his wife's slanderous words. The court held not.

Martin v. Robson, 65 Ill. 129, 16 Am. Rep. 578.

Similar decisions were made in Norris v. Corkill, 82 Kan. 409, 49 Am. Rep. 489, and Boward v. Kettering, 101 Pa. 181.

Could it, after the passage of those acts, any longer be said that "the husband is the custodian of her fortune," or that he "adopts the wife and her circumstances together," or that "he takes her fortune, if she has one, and assumes all the liabilities therefrom,"—all of which are the reasons and only reasons assigned for his common law liability for her torts?

Schouler, Dom. Rel. pp. 102, 103.

Nothing short of a positive re-enactment of the husband's liability would suffice to overcome the legislation of 1849-58.

Bingham v. Winona County Supers. 8 Minn. 443.

We do not conceive of any reason why the fact that the legislature expressly declared that in this one particular instance of desertion the husband shall not be liable for his wife's torts, committed in the carrying on of her separate business, should prevent the remaining legislation from having its necessary and natural effect, to wit, to absolve him from liability for her personal torts.

The New York courts hold that the husband is exempted from liability for the wife's torts committed by her in the conduct of her separate estate, while they hold him liable for her personal torts.

Quilty v. Battie, 185 N. Y. 201, 17 L. R. A. 521; Rowe v. Smith, 45 N. Y. 230; Fiske v. Bailey, 51 N. Y. 150; Baum v. Mullen, 47 N. Y. 577; Fitzgerald v. Quann, 62 How. Pr. 331, reversed, 109 N. Y. 441.

Some very respectable authorities hold that to charge a person orally with an indictable crime, involving moral turpitude or subjecting him to infamous punishment, is actionable per se.

Kinney v. Nash, 8 N. Y. 177; Hewitt v. Ma-

So it has been held that such doctrine applies so long as the relation of husband and wife continues, no matter whether their separation be permanent or temporary, unless it operates upon the marriage so as to make that civil relation cease. Head v. Briscoe, 5 Carr. & P. 484 (1838). In that case the husband was held liable for the wife's libel, although they were permanently living apart.

And it has been held that the old principles and precedents of the common law must stand with respect to actions of this nature until they have been changed by intelligent legislative enactment, and that judicial decisions cannot attempt to think what the legislature ought to have done. McNicholl v. Kane, 2 City Ct. Rep. 57 (1884).

II. Effect of state legislation.

The effect of recent state legislation with reference to the rights and liabilities of married women has not been uniform as to the husband's common-law responsibility for the wife's torts, such as libel and slander, only a very few of the states holding that such legislation has entirely abrogated the common-law rule.

In Illinois the decisions of the court are strong in the construction of the statutes of that state as abrogating, to a great extent, the principles of the common law. So the statutes of Kansas, Indiana, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Vermont would seem to follow in the same line to some extent, although in Pennsylvania the statute of 1887 is the only one upon which the courts have placed such a construction. In other states, however, such as Iowa and Texas, the courts have held that the common-law doctrine has not been abrogated by state statute.

The common-law rule was declared abrogated by the Illinois statute of 1899, in the case of Martin v. Robson, 65 Ill. 129, 16 Am. Rep. 578 (1872), an action for slander brought against both husband and wife.

By the statute in question in that action, a married woman is "entitled to receive, use, and possess her own earnings, and sue for the same in her own name, free from the interference of her husband." Ibid.

The operation of this statute, the court held, was to discharge the husband from his liability for the torts of the wife during coverture, which he neither aided, advised, nor countenanced. Martin v. Robson, 65 Ill. 129, 16 Am. Rep. 578 (1872).

And this for the reason that if the wife alone was entitled to receive and appropriate to her own use damages recovered for slander of herself, she should answer for her slander of others. Martin v. Robson, 65 Ill. 129, 16 Am. Rep. 578 (1872).

The decision was also based upon the theory that the statutes in question give the wife during coverture the sole control of her personal estate and property acquired in good faith from any person other than her husband, and her own earnings for labor performed for any person other than her husband or minor children, with the right to use and possess the property and earnings free from the control and interference of her husband. Martin v. Robson, 65 Ill. 129, 16 Am. Rep. 578 (1872).

And upon the further ground that since the passing of such statute the husband cannot enjoy the profits of her real estate without her permission. He has no control over her separate personal property, it is not subject to his disposal, control, or interference, all her separate property being under her sole control. To be held, owned, possessed, and enjoyed by her the same as though she was sole and unmarried. He has no right to use or dispose of a horse or cow, without her consent. He can no longer interfere with her choses in action; they are under her sole control. The product of her labor is her exclusive property, which she alone can sue for and enjoy. Any suit or action for earnings must be in her own name, and she may sue and possess them free from the interference of her husband or his creditors. Ibid.

With reference to the above-mentioned acts, the court stated that the intention of the legislature was to abrogate the common-law rule, to a great degree, that husband and wife were one person; and that the intent to give to the latter the right to control her own time, to manage her separate property, and contract with reference to it, was plainly indicated by those statutes, which while they did not expressly repeal the common-law rule, that the husband is liable for the torts of the wife, made such modification of his rights and her disabilities as wholly to remove the reason for the liability; that the rights acquired by the husband by virtue of the marriage had almost all been taken away, and the disabilities of the wife had nearly all been removed, and therefore a liability which had for its consideration rights conferred should no longer exist when the consideration had failed; and that if the relation of husband and wife had been so changed as to deprive him of all right to her

Others hold that the words must charge an indictable offense, involving moral turpitude and subjecting the person to infamous punishment.

Newell, Defamation, Slander, & Libel, p. 84; Cooley, Torts, p. 195; Pollard v. Lyon, 91 U. S. 225, 23 L. ed. 806; Redway v. Gray, 31 Vt. 292.

The latter doctrine states the law.

Redway v. Gray, supra.

So far as appears from the complaint plaintiff was charged with misdemeanor punishable with a fine, or imprisonment commutable to a fine. This, emphatically, is not an indictable crime punishable with infamous punishment.

Buck v. Hersey, 31 Me. 558; Warren v. Norman, 1 Walk. (Miss.) 387; McKee v. Wilson, 87 N. C. 300; O'Hanlon v. Myers, 10 Rich. L. 128; Broughton v. McGrew, 39 Fed. Rep. 673, 5 L. R. A. 406; Lemons v. Wells, 78 Ky. 117; Seery v. Viall, 16 R. I. 517.

property, and to the control of her person and her time, every principle of right would be violated by holding him still responsible for her conduct; and that if she was emancipated he should no longer be enslaved. Martin v. Robeson, 65 Ill. 129, 132, 16 Am. Rep. 578 (1872).

In the same case the court also stated that so diverse were the rights and interests, the duties, obligations, and disabilities of husband and wife now, that it would be most unreasonable to hold him still liable for the torts committed without his presence and without his consent or approbation; and that if he was not bound to pay her debts he should not be responsible for her torts, for the reason that when the ground-work is gone as to the one, it is gone as to the other, and the structure of the parties must fall before the innovations of the present. Ibid.

From the opinion of the court in Martin v. Robeson, 65 Ill. 129, 16 Am. Rep. 578 (1872), as above expressed, however, Justices Sheldon, Breese, and Scott dissented, holding that the abrogation of the law left the party who might receive injuries at the hands of a married woman practically remediless, making wives as it were licensed wrongdoers.

Kansas Comp. Laws 1879, chap. 62, § 3, provides that a married woman may, while married, sue and be sued in the same manner as if she were unmarried.

The provisions of the Kansas statutes as stated above changed the common-law rule and discharged the husband from liability for the torts of the wife committed when he was not present, and with which he had no connection, and in that state the wife stands upon an equality in all respects with the husband, and she alone is responsible for her contracts, and should be alone responsible for her words and her acts. Norris v. Corkill, 32 Kan. 409, 49 Am. Rep. 489 (1884).

So that under the provisions of the Kansas statutes, the reasons assigned for the liability of the husband for the torts of his wife, such as slander, no longer hold good, and the liability no longer exists, it being a part of the common law that where the reason of the rule fails the rule itself falls with it. Ibid.

In the same case it was said that since the passing of the statute placing a married woman upon equal footing with her husband, "her brain, and hands, and tongue are her own, and she should alone be responsible for slanders uttered by herself. 30 L. R. A.

The mere charge of drunkenness, made against any ordinary person, would not be actionable in itself, but becomes so through the attending circumstances that it was made against the parties, so as to touch them in their special character or relation, office or trust.

Townshend, Slander & Libel, pp. 283 et seq. Mr. Frank M. Hopkins, for respondent:

At common law the husband is liable for all the torts of his wife committed during coverture.

Brasil v. Moran, 8 Minn. 236, 83 Am. Dec. 772; Jackson v. Kirby, 37 Vt. 443; Fowler v. Chichester, 26 Ohio St. 9; Baker v. Young, 44 Ill. 42, 92 Am. Dec. 149.

This is the law of this state to-day unless it has been changed by legislative enactment.

In Brasil v. Moran, supra, the husband's liability for the torts of his wife was held to exist.

The statutory provisions which appellant cites were enacted to enable courts of law to deal with the separate estates of married women to the same extent as courts of equity had previously been doing.

Carpenter v. Leonard, 5 Minn. 155.

Ibid.: Martin v. Robeson, 65 Ill. 129, 16 Am. Rep. 578 (1872).

In the case of Norris v. Corkill, supra, the slanderous words were spoken by the wife when the husband was not present, and was in no manner a participator, so that he was not liable.

By the Indiana statute of March 25, 1879, § 6 (Acts of 1879, p. 100), a married woman may bring and maintain an action in her own name against any person or body corporate for damages for any injury to her person or character the same as if she were sole, and the money recovered shall be her separate property, and her husband in such case shall not be liable for costs."

In Logan v. Logan, 77 Ind. 558, 561 (1881), the court held that such act was retrospective in its effect, affecting only the remedy, and that therefore the action could be maintained with respect to slanderous words uttered prior to the passing of the act.

By § 5120 of the Revised Statutes of Indiana of 1881, which came into operation in September, 1881, "married women without reference to their ages shall be liable for torts committed by them, and an action may be prosecuted against them for torts committed as if unmarried. Husbands shall not be liable for the contracts or torts of their wives." McCabe v. Berge, 89 Ind. 225, 229 (1883). In that case, however, a judgment rendered against the husband prior to the passing of the act was enforced against the husband by reason of his common-law liability.

In considering the effect of the Iowa statutes in the case of McElfresh v. Kirkendall, 36 Iowa, 224 (1873), the court stated that the enlargement of the liabilities of the wife did not of necessity restrict those of the husband; that the wife might be made liable for her torts the same as though she were unmarried, and yet that fact alone did not exempt the husband from liability also for her torts; and that therefore the statute must be looked to, to see whether, independently of a mere enlargement of the rights and liabilities of the wife, it contained anything which in terms, or by necessary or reasonable implication, discharge the husband from liability for a claim for damages for slander uttered by the wife, the court pointing out that the words "debts" and "liabilities," were used in connection with the responsibility of the husband for the legal obligations of the wife incurred before marriage, but that the word, "debt," was used alone when reference was made to her obligations

It certainly was not intended by that act to abrogate the husband's liability for the torts of his wife.

The husband's liability for his wife's torts was not limited to those committed in his presence.

Carleton v. Haywood, 49 N. H. 818; Nolan v. Traber, 49 Md. 460, 38 Am. Rep. 277; Cassin v. Delany, 88 N. Y. 178; Brazil v. Moran, 8 Minn. 236, 83 Am. Dec. 772.

Acts similar to our married woman's act have been enacted in most of the states of the Union, and the courts of last resort in the various states having such statutes have held that these married woman's acts do not abrogate the common-law rule of the husband's liability for his wife's torts.

The spirit of modern legislation on this subject does not require that the husband should be relieved of his liabilities for his wife's torts.

generally without reference to the time when they were incurred; and that the words "debt" and "liability" were not synonymous and were not commonly so understood, the term "liability" as applied to the pecuniary relations of the parties being a term of broader significance than debt.

In holding that the Iowa Revised Statutes did not relieve the husband of his common-law responsibility for the slander uttered by his wife, the court based its opinion upon the ground that usually the husband possesses and controls all the accumulations of their joint efforts, and that the slander uttered by the wife became hurtful in the proportion that his wealth and standing gave her social position, and that therefore, unless the injured party could hold the husband responsible he was without remedy, and that to exonerate the husband from responsibility under such circumstances would be to permit almost one half the adult members of society to slander the remainder with impunity, and further, that the exemption of the husband from liability for the torts of the wife would be a startling innovation of the common law which would be a radical change; but whether it would not be a change without reform might be a question. McElfresh v. Kirkendall, 36 Iowa, 224, 223 (1873).

The above case of McElfresh v. Kirkendall, 36 Iowa, 224 (1873), was followed by the court in the case of Luse v. Oaks, 36 Iowa, 562 (1873), the court holding the husband liable for the wife's slander.

The Massachusetts statute of 1871, chap. 312, provides that "any married woman may sue and be sued in actions of tort in the same manner as if she were sole, and her husband shall not be liable to pay the judgment against her for damages or costs in any such suit, but the same may be collected out of her property, real or personal, and all sums recovered by her in any such suit shall be her sole and separate property."

In Hill v. Duncan, 110 Mass. 238 (1872), it was held that the above statute did not exempt the husband from liability in an action for a slander committed by the wife where the proceedings were commenced prior to the passing of the statute, the words of the statute being satisfied and full effect being given to its provisions by construing it to apply only to suits thereafter commenced.

Under the Massachusetts act of 1871 the wife alone is liable to action, judgment, and execution for torts committed by her in the future. McCarty v. De Best, 120 Mass. 89 (1876), where damages were sought for slander uttered by the wife.

Where in such an action the husband answered that he was improperly joined, and the court refused a ruling to the effect that he was not liable, the verdict being returned for the plaintiff, the court held that, the tort having been committed since the passage of the act, the exceptions to the verdict as presented by the defendant husband must be sustained. McCarty v. De Best, supra.

In Warren v. Norman, Walk. (Miss.) 397 (1881), it was held that the words "got drunk on Christmas day" uttered by the defendant wife, regarding the plaintiff wife, were not actionable per se, and that a declaration which did not set forth all the circumstances and allegations would not support an action under the statute, and that therefore such declaration was defective under a statute making drunkenness a crime.

Under the New York statutes the separate property of a married woman is solely liable to execution when the judgment is against her alone, and also to execution when the judgment is against her and another person, whether such other person be her husband or a stranger; and the statutes do not prohibit a joint execution against the property of all the parties against whom the judgment is recovered when she is one of such persons, but authorize the seizure of her separate property for the satisfaction of such a judgment. Horton v. Payne, 27 How. Pr. 374 (1864).

The law is as it always has been, that the husband is jointly liable with the wife for her torts whether committed before or after marriage, but the rule has been changed respecting a satisfaction of judgments recovered upon such torts so that executions on such judgments may issue against the property of the wife as well as of the husband. Ibid.

In Hoffman v. Loehman, 1 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 278, note (1873), the husband was joined on the ground of his liability for his wife's torts, and an order in arrest was issued, and a motion made to vacate such order, based upon the ground of the nonliability of the husband for the personal torts of the wife, under the Code of Civil Procedure. The court held that the new Code had not changed the common-law liability of the husband for torts committed by the wife.

The legal existence of the wife was at common law suspended during the marriage, or at least con-

In Brown v. Nickerson, 5 Gray, 1, it was held that the charge of drunkenness falsely made was actionable per se.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The paramount question presented by this appeal is whether a husband is liable for slanderous words uttered by his wife when he is not present, and in which he has not participated in any manner,—in other words, Has the common-law rule which makes the husband answerable in damages for the torts of his wife during coverture been abrogated by statute? Counsel for appellant does not claim that this rule has been wiped out by direct enactment, but earnestly insists that this is the inevitable result of legislation respecting married women and their property, their and its legal status. To determine solidated in that of the husband, under whose wing, protection, and cover she was theoretically supposed to perform everything; and this rule continues excepting as to rights of property and the like, in respect to which the husband and wife are by force of express statute considered as two distinct persons. But the statute goes no further, and it is only in respect of those statutory rights and the liabilities growing out of them that the wife is by fiction of law regarded as a single woman for the purpose of suing and being sued alone, and therefore in an action against a husband and wife for a slander uttered by the wife, the husband was held liable although the wrong was committed in his absence, the New York Code making no difference in this respect, § 450 thereof not purporting to change the liabilities, but simply to allow married women, when solely interested or liable by force of existing laws, to sue and be sued as if they were unmarried. McNichols v. Kane, 2 City Ct. Rep. 57 (1884).

In the above case the court stated that if the legislature of New York had intended by § 450 of the Code to relieve the husband from his common-law liability for the tortious acts of his wife committed in respect to persons and things, in which, by the enabling statute, she acquired no right of property, language indicative of such intent would have been implied.

In Fitzgerald v. Quann, 100 N. Y. 441 (1888), affirming 38 Hun, 552 (1884), which reversed the same case in 62 How. Pr. 331, it was claimed that there was an express enactment in the New York statute of 1862 amending the prior act, passed March 20, 1860 (Laws 1862, chap. 172), abrogating the common law in regard to the liability of a husband for the torts of his wife, reference being made to § 7 of the statute of 1862, which provides: "A married woman may be sued in any of the courts of this state, and whenever a judgment shall be recovered against a married woman, the same may be enforced by execution against her sole and separate estate in the same manner as if she were sole;" but the court held that the section did not reach the result contended for, and that the rule of the common law was not thereby abrogated, the section only having reference to actions respecting her separate estate; and the court further held that §§ 450 and 1208 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not abrogate the common-law rule respecting such actions and the judgments recovered therein, the various statutes relating to the rights and liabilities of 30 L. R. A.

this question, we are required to examine statutory enactments from the days of territorial legislation, keeping in mind the well-settled rules of construction that the common law will be held no further abrogated than the clear import of the language used in the statutes requires, and that an intention to change the common law will not be presumed from doubtful statutory provisions. From the examination, we find that the earliest of our statutes relating to married women and their property, and in any way changing the common-law rules which theretofore prevailed, is found in section 105, chap. 71, Rev. Stat. 1851,—territorial legislation. This section appears in a chapter entitled "Issues, and the Mode of Trial," and as a part of the provisions respecting the issuance, levy, and satisfaction of executions in civil proceedings; and it seems to be a rearrangement and enlargement of the terms of chapter 375, N. Y. Laws 1849. We are unable to say more than this of its origin. It provided that all real or personal estate acquired by a married woman not having clearly shown an interest for the alteration of the common law or doctrine making the husband a party to such action. In the above case the action was to recover damages for slander uttered by the defendant wife.

As to the effect of the amendments to the New York Code of 1880, see infra, IV.

The Ohio act of May 1, 1861, as amended by acts March 23, 1866, and March 30, 1871, "concerning the rights and liabilities of married women," does not relieve the husband of his common-law liability for torts committed by his wife during coverture, and there is nothing in the act which evinces in any degree whatever an intent to change or abrogate the rules of the common law in this respect, and its provisions cannot be extended by implication. Fowler v. Chichester, 26 Ohio St. 9 (1874), in which case exemplary damages were awarded against husband and wife for the latter's slander.

The Pennsylvania statute of 1848, by its purpose, limitation, and specifications, shows that no exception is given the husband from liability for the torts of the wife other than as expressly named therein, and under the act of April 8, 1872, the husband is not relieved from any duties or liabilities except the provision that he shall not be liable for the debts of his wife contracted before marriage, but if a judgment be obtained against him for the torts of his wife, execution shall first be had against her property. Quick v. Miller, 103 Pa. 67 (1883).

But under the second section of the Pennsylvania married woman's act of June 3, 1887 (Pamphlet Laws, 333), a husband is no longer liable for torts committed by his wife alone, and therefore a verdict in an action against husband and wife for slanderous words uttered by the wife alone, which judgment was rendered against both, is a nullity as to the husband, and executions issued thereon are also null and void as to him, and such a judgment rendered against the husband will be set aside. Kuklence v. Vocht, 21 W. N. C. 521 (1888).

In Whalen v. Gabel, 120 Pa. 234 (1888), it was held that although, by virtue of the Pennsylvania statute of June 3, 1887 (Pamphlet Laws, 332), a married woman might sue and be sued for torts in all respects as if she were a feme sole, yet such statute did not authorize her arrest under a capias ad respondendum. In the above case the action was in trespass for certain slanderous words uttered by the defendant of the plaintiff.

And in Vocht v. Kuklence, 119 Pa. 365 (1888), it was held that the Pennsylvania act of 1887 did not female before her marriage, or to which she became entitled after marriage by inheritance, gift, grant, or devise, should be and continue hers after marriage, not liable for her husband's debts or liabilities, but liable for all of her debts contracted before marriage. We need not specially refer to the provisos, as they do not bear upon the question in hand. In Pub. Stat. 1848-59, this section, with a proviso added in 1858 (of no consequence here), appeared as section 106, chap. 61, which chapter was also entitled "Issues, and the Mode of Trial." It is further to be noticed that it still retained its position among the provisions regulating the issuance, levy, and satisfaction of executions upon judgments in civil proceedings. While this statute was in force, it was assumed by this court that the common-law rule of a husband's liability still prevailed. Brasil v. Moran (1868) 8 Minn. 286 (Gil. 205), 88 Am. Dec. 772. By chapter 122 of the General Statutes of 1866, all of the legislation we have referred to was expressly repealed; and, in place thereof, there was enacted chapter 69, entitled "Married Women," which radically changed the status of married women, and greatly enlarged their rights, powers, duties, and liabilities. This was the first law upon the subject after statehood. The first section provided when and how married women might hold property in their own right, not to be disposed of without the consent of their husbands; the record of a schedule of the property owned by them when married being necessary to protect it as against their husband's creditors. The next three sections are not pertinent to this discussion, but, by the fifth, provision was made for the transaction of any business or trade by a wife in her own name and for her own benefit when abandoned by her husband, or in case he neglected to properly care for his family. All contracts made by the wife in the usual course of the business or trade were declared to be as valid and binding upon her as if she were sole, and abrogate the common-law doctrine exempting a married woman from arrest under a capias ad satisfaciendum, in which case the action was to recover damages for slander uttered by the defendant wife.

Although the Texas statutes relating to married women secure to the wife her separate property, and protect her with reference to it against the recognized and controlling influence of the husband over her conduct, yet the common-law liabilities attaching to the husband for the acts of the wife are not abolished by implication. McQueen v. Fulgham, 27 Tex. 463 (1864). In that case the action was sustained against both husband and wife for the wife's slander.

The common law, except in so far as it is modified by the Constitution and statutes of the state of Texas, regulates the relationship of husband and wife, and his liabilities for her torts, and although many changes have been made by statute in reference to the property rights of married women, yet such statutes have not changed or altered the liability of the husband for the torts of the wife. Zelliff v. Jennings, 61 Tex. 458, 470 (1884), wherein the husband was held liable for the wife's slander.

In Seroka v. Kattenburg, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 177, 55 L. J. Q. B. 375, 34 Week. Rep. 542, 54 L. T. N. S. 649 (1886), it was held that the English married woman's property act of 1882 did not abolish the liability of a husband for his wife's wrongful acts, —in that case libel and slander of the female plaintiff by the female defendant,—and that the plaintiff might sue the husband and wife jointly, or the wife alone for wrongs committed by her after marriage.

The words used in the section of the English married woman's property act, § 1, subsec. 2 (Stat. 45 & 46 Vict. chap. 75), are as follows: "A married woman shall be capable of . . . suing and being sued either in contract or in tort, or otherwise, in all respects as if she were a feme sole, and her husband need not be joined with her as plaintiff or defendant, or be made a party to any action or other legal proceeding brought by, or taken against, her . . . and any damages or costs recovered against her in any such action or proceeding shall be payable out of her separate property and not otherwise." With respect to the words "need not be joined" as used in the above section, the court was of opinion that they did not discharge the husband from his old liability, that they were intended to give to the plaintiff the option of suing the husband and wife together, or suing the wife alone, and that judgment might be entered against the wife and execution issued against her separate property if she had any, but that where she had none the plaintiff was entitled to add the husband as a codefendant, the act not affecting the liability of the husband except in those instances where there was a specific limitation in his favor. Seroka v. Kattenburg, supra.

III. The question of the husband's presence and coercion.

In Kosminsky v. Goldberg, 44 Ark. 401 (1884), where the husband alone was sued, the complaint did not show whether the defendant was present or absent at the time the slander was uttered, and therefore a demurrer was sustained for nonjoinder of the wife. Plaintiff proposed to amend by stating that the injurious words were spoken in the presence and hearing of the husband, but such amendment was stricken out, the court looking upon the opinion of the court below as deciding that the amendment stated no case materially different from that which had already been adjudged insufficient, and as having insisted that the wife be brought in as a party. The plaintiff declining to plead further and electing to rest on his amended complaint, final judgment was entered dismissing the action; but this judgment was reversed and the defendant directed to answer the amended complaint.

Where the allegation was that the wife uttered the words complained of without alleging the husband's connection with such commission, it was held he could not be held responsible. Story v. Downey, 62 Vt. 243 (1890).

In O'Connor v. Welsh, 29 W. N. C. 92 (1891), upon a rule to show cause why the defendant husband should not be discharged on common bail, he having been arrested upon a capias for slanderous words uttered by his wife, the affidavit not averring that the words were spoken in the presence of the husband or with his knowledge or consent, the damages being payable out of her separate property and not otherwise, under the Pennsylvania act of June 3, 1887, it was held that the husband ought not to have been arrested and required to give bail.

Where the husband and wife were sued for slander uttered by the latter, and the absence of the husband when the words were spoken was not averred, an arrest of judgment of the court below was held error, the omission of the absence of the

she was to be free from all interference by her husband and his creditors in relation to the business or trade. To this section was appended a proviso "that the husband shall not be liable for any contract, default, or tort of the wife made, done, or incurred in the course of transacting any such business or trade." Among the provisions of this chapter is one to the effect that a married woman may be sued upon any contract made or wrong committed before her marriage, the same as if she were single. In the order of legislation, we now come to Gen. Laws 1869, chap. 56, now incorporated into Gen. Stat. 1894 as sections 5581 et seq.; and this enactment entirely superseded the law of 1866, supra. By this statute, further innovations were introduced, and again were the rights, powers, and liabilities of a married woman extended and enlarged, and she was expressly charged with personal liability for her torts; and it was enacted that the husband should not be held for her debts or contracts. Then, as if

to emphasize the matter, and place the legislative intention beyond all doubt, it was provided (sec. 5586) that nothing in the act should be construed as exempting a husband from liability for torts committed by the wife.

Counsel for appellant have not called our attention to any other legislation which, in their opinion, is pertinent, except Gen. Laws 1887, chap. 207 (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5590), and of that we shall hereafter speak; nor have we been able to discover any, and we are justified in asserting that there is none. The argument of counsel is mainly rested upon an application of the maxim, "cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex," to the territorial legislation found in Rev. Stat. 1851, chap. 71, with the amendments in Pub. Stat. 1849-58, chap. 61. Commenting upon the subsequent enactment (Gen. Stat. 1866, chap. 69), and especially that part of it which absolves the husband from liability for a tort committed by the wife in the course of transacting a husband in the averment being cured by the verdict. Quick v. Miller, 108 Pa. 67 (1883).

But the presumption of coercion by the husband arising merely from his presence, in the case of crimes, has been abolished by the Arkansas statute, and the execution has been left to be made out by proofs. Gantt's Ark. Dig. § 1238; Kosminsky v. Goldberg, 44 Ark. 491 (1884).

In a case where the slanderous words were alleged to have been uttered in the husband's presence, but not at his instigation, it was held that his presence raised a presumption that his wife was acting under compulsion, and that therefore a complaint in an action against the husband alone prima facie stated a cause of action against him, the presumption, however, being subject to rebuttal by proof that he did not authorize or influence her act. Kosminsky v. Goldberg, supra.

Where it was sought to charge the husband with a letter written by a defendant wife containing a libelous charge, it was held that in order to render the husband liable it must be shown that he assisted in or authorized the composition of the libelous letter. Mills v. State, 18 Neb. 575 (1886). In this case the husband was prosecuted under an indictment for libel contained in a letter written by his wife and signed in his name, and, the evidence not showing that he aided or assisted in the composition of such letter, or authorized the use of the language therein contained, the court reversed the judgment of the court below and held him not responsible. See also McNicholl v. Kane, 2 City Ct. Rep. 57 (1884) supra, II.

IV. Joinder of parties and actions.

Two actions by a man and his wife, one against a man and his wife, the other against the wife only, for slander, cannot be consolidated. Switlin v. Vincent, 2 Wils. 227 (1764).

In Penters v. England, 1 McCord, L. 14 (1821), it was held that it was error to join a wife in an action for words spoken by a husband only, and therefore if the slander was uttered by the husband and wife they must be sued separately, one action being against the husband for the slander spoken by him, and the other action against the husband for the slander spoken by the wife, and in such a case the court would never order such actions to be consolidated.

So an action against a husband for a slander committed by him cannot be joined with an action against him for his wife's slander. Malone v. Stillwell, 15 Abb. Pr. 421 (1863).

And with respect to the joinder of husband and wife as parties, it has been held that the wife has a personal interest in the suit and ought to have her day in court, for the reason that her interest may become antagonistic to that of her husband, for he may collude with the plaintiff, or he may have coerced her to commit the tort. Smith v. Taylor, 11 Ga. 20 (1852).

In Baker v. Young, 44 Ill. 42, 47, 32 Am. Dec. 149 (1867), the words were spoken by the wife alone, and the question raised was, whether a judgment could be recovered against the husband for slander uttered by the wife. The court held that the rule that for torts committed by the wife during marriage, as for slander, assault, etc., or for any forfeiture under a penal statute, they must be jointly sued, but that they could not be jointly sued for slander by both, was fully supported by authority, and that from it, if the jury found that the wife spoke the words, they were compelled under the issue and the law to find a verdict against both defendants they being husband and wife, and that a verdict which failed to state that the jury found them guilty in manner and form as alleged in the declaration was not defective.

Where the only question was whether an action would lie against a man and his wife for slanderous words spoken by the wife before marriage, the court stated that it was a question which did not admit of doubt, as the wife could not sue without her husband, and if the action did not lie against both it followed that a married woman by her own act might defeat the plaintiff's action, a principle not to be endured unless a positive adjudication on the point could be produced in support of it. Hawk v. Harman, 5 Binn. 43 (1812).

At common law the husband was a necessary party in an action for slander by the wife as well as in action for other torts. McQueen v. Fulgham, 27 Tex. 463 (1864).

And it has been held that he may be sued alone in such cases. Ibid.; Hasbrouck v. Weaver, 10 Johns. 247 (1813).

The husband is properly joined as a party to an action against a wife to recover damages for slanderous words spoken by the wife. Moulder v. Harding, 33 Ind. 176, 180, 5 Am. Rep. 195 (1870).

The Acts of the 13th General Assembly of Iowa, chaps. 126 and 167, § 11, did not change the common-law rule and exempt the husband from liability in such cases, the section in question simply providing a rule of practice. It enacts that a married woman may in all cases sue and be sued without business or trade for herself, they argue that it cannot be allowed to have the effect of preventing the prior legislation or the remaining sections of chapter 69 from having its and their legitimate and natural result; namely, of relieving the husband from the burden imposed at common law. And, referring to the act of 1869 (now found in Gen. Stat. 1894), they insist that, if the earlier statutes had the force and effect claimed for them,—had actually changed the rule,—the fact that the legislature which incorporated section 5536 into the law did not comprehend the situation and appreciate what had theretofore been accomplished is of no consequence, and that nothing less than a positive re-enactment of the common-law rule upon the subject could overcome the effect of the prior statutes.

It is evident from the provision found in Gen. Stat. 1866, chap. 69, exempting the husband from liability for all torts committed by the wife in the course of her separate business transactions, that it was then understood by the legislators that the common-law rule was still in force. If this had not been the understanding, and if it had not been the legislative intent to continue the liability as to other torts, this particular feature of the law would not have appeared. It is certain that there would have been no exemption from certain torts if it had been supposed that, under the earlier statutes, the husband had been absolved from all, and such legislation would have served no purpose whatsoever. The same thing can be said of the act of 1869, and with greater force, for in that act the legislature expressly provided in one section that the husband should no longer be liable for the wife's debts or contracts, not mentioning torts at all, and in joining her husband with her, except in cases where the cause of action exists in favor of or against both, thus recognizing the fact that there is, or may be, a class of cases in which they must be joined, whether they sue or are sued. McElfresh v. Kirkendall, 38 Iowa, 224 (1873).

Under the Revised Statutes of Iowa of 1880, § 2771, the husband is, as at common law, a necessary party jointly with the wife in an action for slander when the words are actionable per se. Enders v. Beck, 18 Iowa, 86 (1884).

In Burt v. McBain, 29 Mich. 200 (1874), error was brought to reverse a judgment for slander uttered by the defendant wife, in which action the husband was joined, the question as to the right of the plaintiff to join the husband as a defendant being raised. The court held that although he was not absolutely a necessary party to such an action, yet he was still a proper party, and no objection could be raised upon the ground of his being improperly joined, even though §§ 6129, 7332, of the Compiled Laws of Michigan wholly removed his responsibility, the words of the statute, "has been or shall be joined as defendant with his wife," showing that the joinder of the husband was assumed.

The New York cases prior to 1890 do not seem to be unanimous as to the necessity of joining the husband in such action, although the court of last resort decided in favor of his being made a party.

In an action against a wife for slander uttered by her the husband must be joined. Malone v. Stillwell, 15 Abb. Pr. 421 (1868).

The New York statutes of 1862 do not abrogate the common-law rule or the provision of the Code which requires that the husband be joined with the wife in actions against her for her tort. Horton v. Payne, 27 How Pr. 374 (1864).

By § 114 of the New York Code, as well as by the common law, the husband must be joined with the wife as a defendant in an action to recover damages sustained by reason of a libel written and published by the defendant wife. Ibid. In that case the action, which was originally commenced against the wife alone, was stayed until the husband was made a party.

But under such section (Laws 1862, chap. 172) the husband is not a necessary party if the action has relation to or concerns the sole or separate property of the wife. Ibid.

The husband is properly joined in an action against a wife for a tort committed by her, but a complaint for assault and battery and for slander by the wife will be bad upon demurrer. Anderson v. Hill, 53 Barb. 238 (1869).

In Tait v. Culbertson, 57 Barb. 9 (1869), the only question before the court was whether an action 30 L. R. A.

could be maintained against husband and wife for a libel uttered and published by the wife. The court held that the common-law rights and duties in respect to such matter had not been changed by the New York statutes, and that the husband and wife were correctly sued and judgment rendered against them jointly.

To the same effect is the decision of the court in the case of Fitzgerald v. Quann, 109 N. Y. 441 (1888), as to the joinder of the husband in actions to recover damages for slander uttered by the wife, which was followed and approved of by the court in the later case of Austin v. Bacon, 49 Hun, 386 (1888), the court in the latter case stating that the decision was regarded as decisive of the question.

In an action for slander brought against a married woman, wherein her husband was not made a party defendant, the wife demurred upon the ground of a defect in parties, and the question was whether § 450 of the Code had abrogated the common-law rule making the husband liable for the torts of the wife. The court gave judgment for the defendant unless the plaintiff, within twenty days after entry and service of the order, amended his summons and complaint by adding the husband as a party defendant, the court approving of the construction of the Code as arrived at in Fitzsimons v. Harrington, 1 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 360 (1881), which latter case was one of assault and battery by the wife. Trebing v. Vetter, 2 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 391 (1883). See also Hoffman v. Lachman, 1 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 273, note (1878), and McNicholl v. Kane, 2 City Ct. Rep. 57 (1884), supra, II.

But the rule laid down in the above cases was departed from in the case of Laude v. Smith, 6 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 51 (1888), where the defendants were sued to recover damages for slander uttered by the defendant wife of and concerning the plaintiff, and there was no allegation that the words were uttered in the presence, or by the direction, of the husband. The only reason for making him a party was the allegation that he was the husband, the sole question being whether the husband in an action against the wife for her personal tort was a proper party defendant, the court holding that, under §§ 450, 1204, of the New York Code of Civil Procedure, the husband was not a proper party defendant in such a case.

The amendments to the New York Code of Civil Procedure, § 450, made in 1890, however, would seem to settle the question, for they declare that "the husband is not a necessary or proper party" to actions for damages for the wife's torts "committed without his instigation."

In Story v. Downey, 62 Vt. 243 (1890), it was held error to join the husband as a codefendant with another it specifically declared that the prior sections of the statute should not be construed as exempting husbands from the common-law liability. Again do we find emphatic expression of the legislative understanding and its purpose and intent. We do not speak of the legislative understanding of the scope of some prior statutes, because it can be allowed to control such statutes, but simply in connection with the intent and purpose of the legislatures enacting the laws of 1866 and 1869. The intent of both of these statutes is exceedingly clear; and that, believing the common-law rule still in existence, it was the fixed purpose of the lawmakers to retain it, is obvious.

We are now brought to a consideration of the statute of 1851, which, in so far as affects the present question, stood unchanged until 1866. It is to be observed that section 105, chap. 71, Rev. Stat. 1851, was not passed as a "Married Woman's Act," as were its successors, and that it simply appeared among statutory provisions regulating procedure upon executions in civil actions. Its design was to protect the property of the married woman from seizure to satisfy a husband's debts. It did not purport to confer upon the wife any new duties, nor did it grant any rights not theretofore belonging to her, except as it declared in few words that her real and personal estate acquired before marriage by her personal industry, or before or after marriage by inheritance, gift, grant, or devise, should remain her own after marriage, and that none of it should be subjected to seizure to satisfy her husband's debts, engagements, or liabilities. She was prohibited from disposing of such property during coverture without the consent of her husband, except the wife in an action to recover damages for slander uttered by the wife, the third section of the Vermont act of 1864 limiting the liability of the husband to torts committed by his authority or direction, so that, in order to render him liable under that statute for a tort committed by his wife, it must be alleged and proved that the tort was committed by his authority or direction.

V. Necessity of service upon wife.

If the wife is a defendant in an action to recover damages for slander, she must, by virtue of the Georgia act of 1799, be served with process in the state of Georgia, she being a party even with rights of defense distinct from those of her husband. Smith v. Taylor, 11 Ga. 20 (1852).

But such want of service will be waived by the wife's appearing and answering to the merits, and the judgment in such case is binding upon her and will not be arrested. Ibid.

VI. Effect of death pending action.

If the tort of the wife, for which she and her husband were jointly sued, was not committed by her in his presence or by his coercion, the suit does not abate by his death. Douge v. Pearce, 18 Ala. 127, 129 (1848), in which case the husband and wife were sued for damages for slander uttered by the wife concerning plaintiff.

In such a case the suit survives against her. Smith v. Taylor, 11 Ga. 20 (1852).

But it does not survive against his personal representatives. Mousler v. Harding, 38 Ind. 176, 180, 5 Am. Rep. 195 (1870).

In such a case the wife is liable to the judgment against herself alone. Sunman v. Brewin, 52 Ind. 140, 144 (1875).

Where, in an action against the husband and wife for slander, the defendant husband died before judgment, and his widow married again pending the suit, upon a motion to abate the action the court inclined to the opinion that the same ought to be abated, but took time to consider the question. White v. Harwood, Style, 188 (1848).

VII. Husband and wife as witnesses.

In an action against husband and wife to recover damages for slanderous words uttered by the defendant wife, against the wife of the plaintiff, the wife is a competent witness in her own behalf, as is also her husband. Mousler v. Harding, 38 Ind. 176, 180, 5 Am. Rep. 195 (1870).

The wife has a right to testify because the cause of action is directly against her, and for her individual act, and she would therefore testify directly for herself, and the mere fact that her evidence might incidentally and unavoidably tend to benefit the husband would be no reason for excluding it. Ibid.

But from the opinion of the court in the above case Justice Elliott dissented, contending that the position of the husband was the reverse of that of the wife, and that as his evidence would be directly for the wife and only incidentally for himself it ought for that reason to be excluded. Ibid.

And in the later case of Bonham v. Keen, 40 Ind. 197 (1872), where the question was whether the husband of the defendant wife could testify as to what words were used or spoken by his wife, the court held he could not, thus overruling the prior case of Mousler v. Harding, supra, so far as it holds that the husband may be a witness in such a case.

So, the case of Bennfield v. Hypres, 38 Ind. 498 (1872), discussed the question involved in the above case of Mousler v. Harding, as to the husband and wife being competent witnesses in such an action, and held that the wife was a competent witness in her own behalf, and that the fact that the testimony of the wife incidentally, remotely, or contingently benefited or prejudiced the husband constituted no valid reason for excluding it.

VIII. Damages and evidence in mitigation.

In an action against husband and wife for slanderous words spoken by the wife exemplary damages may be allowed. Fowler v. Chichester, 23 Ohio St. 9 (1874).

And in such an action smaller damages will not be assessed than would have been legally recoverable if the libel had been published by the wife while sole, and the action had been against her alone. Austin v. Wilson, 4 Cush. 278, 50 Am. Dec. 766 (1849).

The fact that the husband caused his wife to go to the person concerning whom she had uttered the slanderous words and retract the same is not evidence, and cannot be received in mitigation of damages as testified by the defendant husband. Mousler v. Harding, 38 Ind. 176, 180, 5 Am. Rep. 195 (1870).

The same principle was upheld in Yeates v. Reed, 4 Blackf. 463, 38 Am. Dec. 43 (1859), where, on the trial in the court below, the defendants asked the court to instruct the jury, inter alia, that the conduct of the defendant husband in trying to prevent the circulation of the slanderous words at the time they were spoken and afterwards, and his statement that the charge was false, might be considered by the jury in mitigation of damages; but such instructions were declined, the court instructing the jury, inter alia, to take into consideration

STATE of North Carolina, ex rel. E. D. STANFORD, Appt.,

v.

J. C. ELLINGTON.

(.....N. C.)

1. A quorum shown to have been present will be presumed to continue present at proceedings taken the same day, until the contrary is shown.
2. The fact that less than a quorum of a legislative body are reported by the tellers as voting when the roll is called overcomes any presumption that a quorum present earlier in the day still continues present.
3. It seems that the presiding officer of a legislative body is powerless to count those who are present and do not vote, for the purpose of making a quorum, in the absence of any rule of the House or other express authority to do so.
4. A majority of the members of a legislative body constitute a quorum, unless the number is otherwise fixed by the Constitution or the power that creates the body.

(November 19, 1895.)

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wake County in favor of defendant in a quo warranto proceeding to test defendant's right to the office of state librarian. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas R. Funnell, for appellant:

The office of state librarian—if it be an office—is a legislative office created by statute and unknown to the Constitution.

Code, § 3604.

The general assembly had power to make such changes as to the election, term of office, etc., as the public good demanded.

The state Constitution expressly recognizes elections by the general assembly.

Const. art. 2, § 9, art. 6, § 3.

And these elections have been upheld by this court.

State v. Jones, 116 N. C. 570.

Was the relator duly elected librarian on the 18th of March, 1895? Upon this the journals are conclusive evidence.

If a quorum were present a majority of a quorum could elect.

Neither House shall proceed to business until a majority is present.

Const. art. 3, § 2.

There is but one method of raising the question of no quorum, i. e., as prescribed in the rules of the House.

This was not done.

Mears, MacRae & Day also for appellant.

Mears, E. W. Pou [and Shepherd & Busbee for appellee.

Furches, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in the nature of quo warranto, in which plaintiff claims to be state librarian, and alleges that defendant is in possession of the office and unlawfully withholds the same from him. Defendant, answering, admits that he is in possession of the office, performing its duties and receiving its emoluments; but he denies that he is holding it wrongfully or unlawfully, and alleges that he was duly elected thereto on the 8th day of January, 1895, for a term of two years next ensuing. Under the view we take of the case it is not necessary for us to consider or pass upon defendant's right to this office. The plaintiff's right to recover depends upon his right to the office. If he is not entitled to it, it is a matter of no importance to him who is. It is true that if plaintiff is entitled to the office it necessarily follows that defendant is not, but it does not necessarily follow that defendant is entitled to it if plaintiff is not.

Prior to the 18th day of March, 1895, the board of trustees of the state library, under existing law, elected to and filled this office. On that day (March 13, 1895) the legislature passed and ratified an act repealing the law authorizing the board of trustees to elect, and provided for the election of this officer by the legislature. And on the same day, to wit, the 18th day of March, 1895, the plaintiff claims that he was duly elected state librarian by the legislature pursuant to said act. And this not being a bill enacted into a law ratified and signed by the presiding officers of Senate and House, and deposited in the office of secretary of state, which then becomes the evidence of its passage (Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L. R. A. 787; United States v. Ballin, 144 U. S. 4, 36 L. ed. 324), it became necessary for plaintiff to introduce the record of the legislature for the purpose of proving his election and right to the office he was claiming. These records show that on the morning of the 18th of March there was a roll call of the House, a quorum answered, and the House proceeded to business. They also show that there was a proposition in both branches of the assembly (Senate and House) to go into the election of state librarian; that these motions prevailed, and both the president of the Senate and the speaker of the House appointed two tellers, each, to take this vote. And they reported that in the Senate there were 26 votes cast 25 being for the plaintiff and 1 against; and in the House there were 48 votes cast for the plaintiff, and none against him. It is admitted by plaintiff that there must be a quorum present to do business, or, in this case, to elect the plaintiff to the office he claims. But he claims that it appearing there was a quorum present that morning, and it not appearing there had been an adjournment since, it will be presumed that there continued to be a quorum present. We think this is undoubtedly true,—that the quorum will be presumed until it shall appear there is not one. Cushing, Contested Elections, 2d ed. 369. This is usually made to appear by what is called a "division;" and this is usually had after a vote by yeas and nays, when the presiding officer announces the vote and some opposing member doubts the correctness of the announcement and demands a division,—a call of the body. Id. § 1798. And strictly speaking this is what is called a "division." Cushing, Parliamentary Law, § 1814. The original purpose of a division was for the purpose of ascertaining who voted "Aye" and who voted "No," and it was effected in this way: the eyes occupied one part of the hall and the noses another, and there remained until the tellers appointed counted them. In this way it came to be called a "division." In more modern assemblies it is more usually affected by a call of the House,—a yea or nay vote when each member's name is called. Cushing, Contested Elections, § 1615. This mode is used for two purposes,—one to determine on which side the majority voted, and also for the purpose of determining whether there is a quorum present. United States v. Ballin, supra. In this case there was no viva voce vote preceding the roll call. With this exception, there seems to have been all done that is usually done before a division, which is now usually had by a call of the roll. Cushing, Contested Elections, § 1615. Why this was not done, we do not know. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 5, requires that in all elections under this Constitution the vote shall be viva voce. And if this section applies to this election it does not mean a roll call, but a vote by voice, and not by ballot. And if the vote had been taken that way, and announced by the presiding officers in favor of plaintiff, and no division called for, the presumption contended for by plaintiff would have availed him. But when the roll was called, the name of each member voting recorded, and the tellers appointed report the number voting for plaintiff and the number voting against him,—a modern division,—we have the facts, and they must prevail over the presumption which existed in favor of a quorum before that time. Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 168; United States v. Ballin, supra. It may be there was a quorum present when this vote was taken. But if there was it does not appear to us, and we have no means of finding out whether there was or not, and no authority to do so if we had the means. And if they were present, whether they could have been compelled to vote is not before us, as there was no such proposition made, so far as we know. But it seems to be conceded that the speaker of the house of representatives of the United States could not compel a member to vote. Nor had he any right to count members present and not voting, to make a quorum, until the House adopted a rule to that effect. He then counted nonvoting members present to make up a quorum, and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained his action. United States v. Ballin, 144 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 321. So may the legislature of North Carolina adopt a similar rule, as there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent its doing so. But it has not adopted such a rule, and under the authority of United States v. Ballin, supra, we suppose the presiding officers were powerless, if a quorum was actually present, either to make them vote or to count them to make up a quorum. This brings us to the consideration of what is a quorum. They are of two kinds,—one fixed by the Constitution or power creating the body or assembly. In this way a majority of a majority may constitute a quorum and do business. But, where the quorum is not fixed by the Constitution or the power that creates the body, the general rule is that a quorum is a majority of all the members (Cleveland Cotton Mills v. Cleveland County Comrs. 108 N. C. 678; Cushing, Contested Elections, § 247; United States v. Ballin, supra), and a majority of this majority may legislate and do the work of the whole. There is no constitutional quorum; that is, a number prescribed by our Constitution that shall constitute a quorum. We therefore fall under the general rule applying to legislative bodies. United States v. Ballin, supra. The legislature of North Carolina consists of 170 members,—50 in the Senate and 120 in the House. Therefore it takes the presence of 26 senators to constitute a quorum in the Senate, and 61 members of the House. In this election 26 senators voted, which was a majority of that body, and a quorum. But in the House there were but 48 members who voted. This we see was less than a quorum. For this reason plaintiff has failed to establish his right to the office.

There were various questions presented as to the defendant's rights, but the view we have taken of the case makes it unnecessary for us to consider them, and we do not.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

MINNEAPOLIS UNION ELEVATOR COMPANY, Respt.

*1. Scott v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. 21 Minn. 322, followed, as to the effect of a provision in the charter of a railway company authorizing it to take an "absolute fee" in lands condemned for public purposes.

2. The erection and operation of a public elevator and warehouse upon land acquired by a railway company by condemnation, for public purposes, either by itself or its lessee, are neither a misuser nor an abandonment of its easement in the land occupied by such structure, and the owner in fee cannot maintain ejectment for the land so occupied.

(December 2, 1895.)

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County overruling a demurrer to the answer in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Louis A. Reed, for appellants:

The railway company did not acquire the title in fee, because the act in question, under which it condemned, was unconstitutional so far as it purported to give the right to a title in fee, and the court had no power to grant a title in fee.

If by reason of the provisions of the Constitution, the company could acquire nothing more than an easement by condemnation, this provision of Laws 1857, chap. 1, § 18, would be qualified accordingly, on the theory that the greater includes the less. By condemning under the provision a fee-simple title, they would at least acquire an easement.

Scott v. St. Paul & U. R. Co. 21 Minn. 322; Cotton v. Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co. 22 Minn. 374; Fairchild v. St. Paul, 46 Minn. 540; Kaiser v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co. 23 Minn. 149; Weaver v. Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co. 30 Minn. 477.

Except as restrained by the Constitution, the mode of exercising the right of eminent domain rests in the discretion of the legislature.

Wilkin v. First Div. of St. Paul & P. R. Co. 16 Minn. 271.

The judgment and decree of the district court, in so far as it purports to adjudge and decree a fee-simple title to the railroad, are void and beyond its powers.

The erection of houses to rent to employees or officers of the road, of warehouses as such, of ships to accommodate vessels bringing freight to or taking it from the railroad, are not such uses as to justify the exercise of eminent domain under a general authority to construct a railroad and its appendages.

Messrs. Koon, Whelan, & Bennett and W. E. Dodge, for respondent:

Under its charter rights the railroad had the power to acquire, and did acquire, a fee simple, and not merely an easement or right of way, in the lands condemned.

The act was approved May 23, 1857; the Constitution of the state of Minnesota was adopted August, 1857. This cannot affect the contract obligation of the charter and the already vested rights of the Minnesota & Pacific Railroad Company.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action of ejectment to recover the possession of the premises described in the complaint, and the rents and profits thereof. The answer put in issue the allegations of the complaint, and, for a second or further defense, alleged title in fee to the premises to be in the St. Paul, Minneapolis, & Manitoba Railway Company, under which it claimed right of possession, as licensee. To this second defense the plaintiffs demurred, and from an order overruling the demurrer they appealed.

The material facts alleged in the answer and admitted by the demurrer are substantially as follows: The land in question is a part of a strip 220 feet in width, adjacent to the right of way of the railway company and the whole of the strip was acquired by it by the judgment of the district court of the county of Hennepin, in proceedings instituted by it under its charter and the laws of the state, and pursuant to the provisions of chapter 1, Laws 1857 (Ex. Sess.), and subsequent acts amendatory thereof. The condemnation proceedings were duly instituted and carried on, and the value of the land taken thereby was assessed and adjudged to be the sum of $17,075.82. Henry S. Gurney was at this time the owner of the land taken, and judgment was duly rendered in the condemnation proceedings by the court in his favor, and against the railway company, for such sum for the value of the land, and it was therein further adjudged that, upon the payment of such judgment, an absolute estate in fee simple to the land so taken and condemned should vest in the railway company, which judgment it paid, and the amount thereof was accepted by Gurney, and the railway company thereupon took possession of the land, and has ever since occupied and used it for railroad purposes. The answer further alleges that, after the railway company had so acquired the land, "it licensed and permitted this defendant to erect and construct upon the land, for the uses and purposes of the railway company, and in connection with, and as a necessary adjunct of, the business of the railway company, a public grain elevator and warehouse, with the necessary power house, engines, annexes, railway tracks, and other appurtenances useful and necessary in connection therewith, which grain elevator, warehouse, and appurtenances were erected upon, and occupy, substantially, that portion of the land described in plaintiffs' complaint herein. The defendant entered upon the land, and erected the elevator and warehouse thereon, and still occupies the same, under and by virtue of the license so granted to it, and not otherwise. That relying upon the title of the railway company in and to the land, and believing the same to be perfect, it in good faith erected the elevator, warehouse, and elevator plant, as aforesaid. That this defendant never had any notice or knowledge, in any manner, of any defect in the title of the railway company to the land, and that the plaintiffs in this action, and those through or from whom they claim, well knew of the occupation being made, and the possession of the land being taken, by the defendant, and that the plaintiffs, nor either of them, nor any of those through or from whom they claim made any objection thereto, legally or otherwise. That defendant in good faith actually expended and paid, in the construction and erection of the elevator, warehouse, and improvements, as aforesaid, the sum of $522,192.74, and that this defendant is now the owner of said elevator, warehouse, and appurtenances, as aforesaid, and is in possession, occupancy, and operation of the same, as a public grain elevator and warehouse, and has been since the erection thereof."

The law under which the condemnation proceedings were had gave the railway company the right to condemn lands for "the purpose of constructing bridges, dams, embankments, excavations, spoilbanks, turnouts, engine houses, shops, and other buildings necessary for the construction, completing, altering, maintaining, preserving, and complete operation of said railroads. . . ." It also provided: "An absolute estate in fee simple in such lands shall be and become vested in the said company as against all persons so receiving notice from the said commissioners, as aforesaid, and all such persons as, having received such notice, shall be forever concluded from questioning such title, so acquired by the said company."

1. The defendant asserts and the plaintiffs controvert the proposition that, under its charter rights, the railway company had the power to, and did, acquire a fee-simple title, and not a mere easement in the lands condemned (Laws 1857, § 13, chap. 1 [Ex. Sess.]); and the judgment in the condemnation proceedings, in terms, gives the railway company title in fee absolute to the land taken. But the plaintiffs urge that section 18 is unconstitutional. In the view we take of this case, it is unnecessary to consider or decide this question, or the effect of the judgment, for, in any event, the railway company acquired, by the condemnation proceedings and judgment therein, a perpetual easement in the land for all the public purposes for which it was authorized to take lands by the exercise of the power of eminent domain. Scott v. St. Paul & O. R. Co. 21 Minn. 323.

2. The railway company having acquired such easement in the land, the plaintiffs, even if it be conceded that they are the owners of the fee, cannot maintain ejectment for the premises, unless the company has abandoned the easement. The answer, then, states a defense, unless the act of the railway company, in licensing the defendant to erect and operate upon the land, for the uses of the railway company, and as a necessary adjunct of its business, "a public grain elevator and warehouse," constitutes in law an abandonment of its easement in the land. This case might be properly disposed of upon the ground that the mere use of an easement for a purpose not authorized, or a temporary disuse thereof, is not, of itself, sufficient to constitute an abandonment; and therefore, the defendant being a mere licensee of the railway company, the latter has not abandoned its easement in the premises by reason of such license to the defendant. Roby v. New York, O. & H. R. R. Co. 142 N. Y. 176; Peirce v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 141 Mass. 481. But, in view of the importance of this case, we place our decision upon the broad ground that the erection and operation of a public grain elevator or warehouse upon land acquired by a railway corporation in condemnation proceedings, either by the company, or its licensee or lessee, are neither a misuse nor an abandonment of its easement in the land occupied by such elevator or warehouse. Courts will, as a rule, take notice of whatever ought to be generally known within the limits of their jurisdiction, and we may well take judicial notice of the fact that the handling and transportation of grain constitute a very important part of the business of the railways of the state, and that grain elevators and warehouses are reasonably necessary, if not absolutely essential, to the feasible, prompt, and economical handling, storing, and transporting of grain by railroads. The erection and operation of grain elevators and warehouses upon the right of way of railroads, with side tracks thereto, are a matter of such general and public interest that the law has made provisions for the acquiring of the right to locate and operate them upon the right of way of railway companies without their consent. Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 7724-7729. The defendant's licensor, the railway company, was expressly authorized by its charter to condemn lands for the purpose, among others, of constructing and maintaining all buildings necessary for the complete operation of its railroads. That elevators are reasonably, if not absolutely, necessary for the complete operation of a railway in this state is a fact so obvious that it may be safely assumed without argument. How could a single railway system of our state handle and transport 60,000,000, or any less number of millions, of bushels of grain each year without the use of elevators along its right of way? It cannot be doubted that the railroad company has the right to erect and maintain on its right of way, as against the objection of the owner of the fee, elevators and warehouses, to facilitate the handling and transporting of grain by it; and, if the company may do this, why may it not license others to do this work for it? There is no reason nor consideration of public policy that forbids it. On the contrary, by the terms of the statute we have quoted, a railway company may be compelled to permit elevators and warehouses to be erected and operated on its right of way by private parties. How, then, can it be claimed that they may not voluntarily license the erection and operation, on land condemned by it for public purposes, of what is described in the answer demurred to as a public grain elevator and warehouse, for the uses and purposes of the railway company, in connection with, and as a necessary adjunct of, its business. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 454, 23 L. ed. 356; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wathen, 17 Ill. App. 582. The use which the railway company permits the defendant in this case to make of a portion of the land condemned by it is a use not inconsistent with the public purposes for which the land was acquired, but, on the contrary, it is a use directly in aid of such purposes; therefore, the railway company has neither misused nor abandoned any portion of the land so acquired by it by the act complained of.

Order affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

James T. WHITE et al.
v.

James M. SOLOMON.

(184 Mass. 516.)

1. The refusal to accept an article which a person has expressly agreed in consideration of its delivery to an express company to pay for in instalments does not relieve him from liability to pay the whole price or restrict the seller to his remedy for damages.
2. A contract to pay the whole value of a chattel before the title passes may be lawfully made.
3. Refusal to answer a cross interrogatory which does not appear to have been material will not prevent the admission of a deposition in evidence.
4. There is evidence of a signature to a contract where the party testifies that it resembles his, but that he wishes to have the contract identified before answering further, if there is no later denial of the signature.

(Field, Ch. J., and Allen and Morton, JJ., dissent.)

(November 26, 1895.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover the price of a manikin alleged to have been sold to defendant which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr James E. Kelley, for defendant:

There is no evidence of a tender of delivery to the defendant as called for by the said alleged contract or order; and such acts by the parties as would pass the title of said merchandise to the defendant are not shown. The plaintiff is therefore not entitled to recover the price of the said article.

Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Heck, 50 Ind. 808, 19 Am. Rep. 718.

If an action lies, it is for damage for breach of said alleged contract; and the measure of damages is not the contract price of the merchandise, it not having been manufactured for a special purpose to the defendant's order, or of a kind unsalable in market.

Gordon v. Norris, 49 N. H. 388; Allen v. Jarvis, 20 Conn. 38.

The alleged contract or order is not a contract of sale, but an order to deliver upon certain conditions named in said order, which are not fulfilled by delivery, even, and title could not pass to the defendant by mere tender of delivery.

Hirschorn v. Oanney, 98 Mass. 150.

Whenever personal property is sold upon a condition precedent, the title does not pass until the performance of the condition, even though the goods have been actually delivered into the possession of the buyer.

Whitwell v. Vincent, 4 Pick. 449, 16 Am. Dec. 355; Salomon v. Hathaway, 126 Mass. 482.

The title of the merchandise involved in this case has never passed from the plaintiff.

Coggill v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 8 Gray, 549; Benner v. Puffer, 114 Mass. 376.

The law will not tolerate the palpable injustice of permitting the vendor to hold the property and also recover the price of it.

Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Heck, 50 Ind. 808, 19 Am. Rep. 718.

NOTE.—For effect of delivery to a carrier to pass title, see note to Ramsey & G. Mfg. Co. v. Kelsea (N. J.) 22 L. R. A. 415.

As to the right to recover price before title 30 L. R. A. passes, but on delivery to carrier, the above case is unusual and presents a very close distinction between such a case and one of delivery or attempted delivery to the purchaser in person.

The refusal to answer any material cross in interrogatory renders the deposition inadmissible.

Chase v. Kenniston, 76 Me. 209; Smith v. Griffith, 8 Hill, 883, 38 Am. Dec. 639.

Mr. George H. Ryther, for plaintiffs:

The refusal of the defendant to accept the manikin from the express company was equivalent to a refusal to pay the first instalment, and the refusal to pay any instalment, according to the contract, made the whole amount due and payable.

Wilkie v. Day, 141 Mass. 78.

The deposition was properly received.

Gould v. Hawkes, 1 Allen, 170; Todd v. Bishop, 136 Mass. 386; Akers v. Demond, 108 Mass. 818.

No evidence of the execution of the contract sued on was necessary.

Spooner v. Gilmore, 136 Mass. 248.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action upon the following contract:

"White's Physiological Manikin.

"Place and date: 75 Court Street, Boston, Mass., June 7, 1889.

"Messrs. J. T. White & Co., Publishers, New York—Gentlemen: Please deliver according to shipping directions given below, one White's Physiological Manikin, Medical Edition, price $35.00. In consideration of its delivery for me, freight prepaid, at the express office specified below, I promise to pay the sum of $35.00, as follows: $10.00 upon delivery at the express office, and the balance in monthly payments of $5.00, each payable on the first of each and every month thereafter, until the whole amount is paid, for which the publishers are authorized to draw when due.

"It is expressly hereby agreed that, in case of the failure to pay any one of the said instalments after maturity thereof, all of said instalments remaining unpaid shall immediately become due and payable, and the said James T. White & Co. may take, or cause to be taken, the said manikin from the possession of the said subscriber or their representatives, to whom he may have delivered the same, without recourse against said James T. White & Co. for any money paid on account thereof; it being expressly agreed that the money paid on account shall be for the use and wear of said manikin.

"Shipping directions to be filled out by the agent.

"To whom sent, J. M. Solomon, 75 Court Street.

"Town, Boston. County of Suffolk.

"State, Massachusetts.

"James M. Solomon, 75 Court Street.

"Agent, W. F. Byrd."

There was evidence, and we must assume the judge who tried the case to have found, that the manikin was delivered, as agreed, to the express company, freight prepaid; that the defendant refused to receive it; that, in consequence, the express company, after a time, left the manikin at the plaintiffs' place of business, in pursuance of a rule of 30 L. R. A.

the company, and without the plaintiffs' assent; and that it is held subject to the defendant's order. There had been no repudiation of the contract by the defendant before the delivery of the manikin at the express office.

The main question is whether the judge who tried the case ought to have ruled that "the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover the price of the article in question, but must offer evidence to the court upon the question of damages for the alleged breach of said contract." A majority of the court is of opinion that this ruling properly was refused. We assume in favor of the defendant, but without deciding, that the title to the manikin did not pass by delivery at the express office; but that assumption does not dispose of the case. In an ordinary contract of sale, the payment and the transfer of the goods are to be concurrent acts; and if the buyer refuses to accept the goods, even wrongfully, he cannot be sued for the price, because the event on which he undertook to pay the price has not happened; and, although the fact that it has not happened is due to his own wrong, still he has not promised to pay the price in the present situation, but must be sued for his breach of contract in preventing the event on which the price would be due from coming to pass. The damages for such a breach necessarily would be diminished by the fact that the vendor still had the title to the goods. But in the case at bar the buyer has said in terms that although the title does not pass by the delivery to the express company, if it does not, delivery shall be the whole consideration for an immediate debt (partly solvendum in futuro), of the whole value of the manikin, and that the passing of the title shall come as a future advantage to him when he has paid the whole. The words "in consideration of its delivery" are not accidental or insignificant. The contract is carefully drawn, so far as to make clear that the vendors intend to reserve unusual advantages and to impose unusual burdens. We are not to construe equities into the contract, but to carry it out as the parties were content to make it. If a man is willing to contract that he shall be liable for the whole value of a chattel before the title passes, there is nothing to prevent his doing so, and thereby binding himself to pay the whole sum. See the observations of Blackburn, J., in Martineau v. Kitching, L. R. 7 Q. B. 486, 455. Benjamin, Sales, 4th ed. 716, 717. When, as here, all the conditions have been complied with, the performance of which by the terms of the contract entitles the vendors to the whole sum, if the vendors afterwards have not either broken the contract or done any act diminishing the rights given them in express words, the buyer cannot, by an act of his own repudiating the title, gain a right of recoupment, or otherwise diminish his obligation to pay the whole sum which he has promised. See Smith v. Bergengren, 153 Mass. 236, 238, 10 L. R. A. 768.

If the first payment of $10 upon delivery were to be made upon delivery to the buyer, it well may be that, if the buyer refused to accept the manikin or to pay the $10, the sellers' only remedy would be for a breach, and that they could not leave the manikin at his house, and waive the payment against his will, with the result of making the whole sum due. But here the delivery is to be to an express company, and the provision for payment of $10 "upon delivery at the express office" must mean after the delivery; so that the delivery is the first act, and by itself, without more, fixes the rights of the vendors to the price, just as the transfer of the stock did in Thompson v. Alger, 12 Met. 428, 444. Our decision is in accord with the following cases; we know of no decisions to the contrary: Martin Safe Co. v. Emanuel, 21 Abb. N. C. 181; Brewer v. Ford, 54 Hun, 116, 120; Id. 59 Hun, 17, 19, 126 N. Y. 648; Cornahan v. Hughes, 108 Ind. 225. See further Burnley v. Tufts, 66 Miss. 48; Tufts v. Griffin, 107 N. C. 47, 10 L. R. A. 526. But compare Tufts v. Grever, 88 Me. 407; Swallows v. Emery, 111 Mass. 855, 857.

Two remaining exceptions may be disposed of in a few words. It is objected that a deposition of one of the plaintiffs was not admissible, because he refused to answer a cross interrogatory. The cross interrogatory was whether or not one Byrd had made other sales than the contract in suit for the plaintiffs. It does not appear to have been material. Therefore the deposition properly was admitted. We need not consider whether, if the question had been material, the deposition ought to have been excluded, unless before the trial the defect had been brought to the attention of the court, that it might pass such order on the subject as should seem proper.

It was objected that there was no evidence of the defendant's signature. But the defendant's answer to an interrogatory, "The signature resembles mine. I wish to have the contract identified before answering further," coupled with the absence of any later denial, was enough.

Exceptions overruled.

Field, Ch. J., dissenting:

It is not easy, perhaps, to reconcile all our decisions upon the measure of damages in actions for goods bargained and sold or for goods sold and delivered; but the general rule is, I think, that where the title passes to the vendee by the contract, and the contract has been executed by a delivery, or by what is equivalent to a delivery, the vendee is liable to the vendor for the price; but where the title does not pass to the vendee by the contract, and he declines to receive and accept the goods sold, the damages are the injury suffered from the breach, which usually is the difference between the price agreed upon and the market value of the goods at the time and place of delivery. Collins v. Delaporte, 115 Mass. 159; Whitney v. Thacher, 117 Mass. 528; Schramm v. Boston Sugar Ref. Co. 146 Mass. 211; Tufts v. Bennett, 163 Mass. 898; Laird v. Pim, 7 Mees. & W. 474-478. This question, in a contract for the sale of stock in a corporation, was considered in Thompson v. Alger, 12 Met. 428, 443. In that case the court held 80 L. R. A.

that the plaintiff was entitled to recover as damages the price agreed to be paid, and says: "The argument against such recovery is, that this stock was never accepted by the defendant; that this, at most, was a mere contract to purchase; and that the defendant, having repudiated it, is only liable to pay the difference between the agreed price and the market value of the stock on the day of the delivery. Such would be the general rule as to contracts for the sale of personal property; and such rule would do entire justice to the vendor. He would retain the property as fully in his hands as before, and a payment of the difference between the market price and that stipulated would fully indemnify him. Such would have been the rule in this case, if nothing had been done to change the relation of the parties. If, for instance, the defendant had repudiated the contract, before any transfer of stock to him had been made on the books of the corporation, it might properly have applied here. But this is a case of somewhat peculiar character in this respect. The contract of the vendor to sell to the defendant 180 shares of railroad stock required a previous transfer of the shares on the books of the corporation. This, from the very nature of the case, was a previous act; and when done it passed the property on the books of the company to the defendant. This was done by the vendor as early as October 14, 1841, in respect to all the shares stipulated to be sold. At this time the defendant had not repudiated the contract. . . . In this state of the case, as it seems to us, the true rule of damages is the contract price. The stock has been transferred to Alger on the books of the corporation, and the vendor, having done this, in the proper execution of the contract, and before it was repudiated by the defendant, may well insist upon this rule as the measure of damages." This rule of damages has been applied in this commonwealth to contracts for the sale of stock in corporations where the vendor has before trial duly tendered the stock, or offered to transfer it, and has renewed the tender or offer in court at the trial. Thorndike v. Locke, 98 Mass. 340; Pearson v. Mason, 120 Mass. 53. See Nichols v. Morse, 100 Mass. 528; Frazier v. Simmons, 189 Mass. 531.

If the contract in this case could be considered as an absolute contract of sale, it may be that the court could have found from the evidence such a delivery as, in accordance with our decisions, might be held to pass the title as between the parties. But then it might be necessary to consider whether, if the manikin was of value, it would not be necessary for the plaintiffs to keep the delivery good in some manner, as by storing it for the defendant at or near the place of delivery, or by tendering it to him at the trial, in order to enable the plaintiffs to recover the entire price. If the manikin had been sent by the plaintiffs from a distant foreign country, and, on the defendant's refusing to receive it, had been sent back to them with their assent, and retained by them there, it would seem more reasonable to permit the plaintiffs to recover their damages caused by the defendant's refusal than to recover the entire price agreed to be paid, and to leave to the defendant only the chance of obtaining possession of the manikin in such manner as he could. If, on the vendee's refusing to receive the property bought, it is resold by the vendor by public auction, after notice to the vendee, the damages recovered are, of course, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the sum obtained by the vendor from the resale, if reasonable care is taken to obtain for the property all that it is worth.

It becomes necessary in the present case to consider the nature of the contract. The contract, I think, is in effect a contract for a conditional sale, and the intention is that the title shall not vest in the defendant until the price is paid. If the price is not paid according to the terms of the contract, the plaintiffs are authorized to retake the manikin without being accountable to the defendant for any of the money paid by him on account of the price. If the plaintiffs exercise this right of retaking the manikin into their possession because the price is not paid, they have both the title and the possession, because they have never parted with the title. What, then, is the rule of damages under such a conditional contract of sale, when the vendee refuses to receive the article, and it is returned to and retained by the vendor? I think that the construction to be given to the contract is, that if the defendant does not pay the price according to the contract, the plaintiffs may retake the manikin from the possession of the defendant, and retain what he has paid on account of the price, or they may leave the manikin in the possession of the defendant, and sue him for the instalments of the price which remain unpaid. But the plaintiffs cannot collect the whole price, and also retake the manikin. They cannot hold the title to the property, and also recover the price of it.

But it is said that the plaintiffs have not retaken the manikin. The manikin has been returned to the plaintiffs, and is retained by them, subject, as they say, to the order of the defendant. It is retained in New York City, and, by retaining it there, I think it must be held that the express company returned it to them with their assent, and that the plaintiffs have ratified this action of the express company. The damages to be recovered when a vendee in a conditional contract of sale refuses to receive the property, and it is returned to the vendor by his assent, and is retained by him, seem to me analogous to the damages to be recovered when a vendee in an executory contract of sale refuses to receive the property. Morse v. Sherman, 106 Mass. 480-484; Tufts v. Bennett, supra. See Tufts v. Grever, 88 Me. 407. The title in each case remains in the vendor; and the damages, when the thing sold is a commodity usually bought and sold in the market, are generally the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the market value of the property at the time and place of delivery. In my opinion, such should be the rule in this case. I find nothing in the agreement which distinguishes the present case from the ordinary one where the vendee of property agrees to pay a part of the price on delivery, and the remainder of the price in instalments after delivery.

Allen and Morton, JJ., concur in this opinion.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

JACKSONVILLE ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY, Appt.,

City of JACKSONVILLE et al.

(.....Fla.....)

1. A municipal corporation can exercise only such powers as are granted to it in express terms, or those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted, or those that are essential and indispensable, not simply convenient to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of the power is resolved by the courts against the corporation.

2. While a strict construction should be applied to the grant of powers, and especially those which result in public burdens, or which are out of the usual range of corporate action, yet if a power is fairly or necessarily implied in or incident to those clearly given, it should not be impaired by a strict construction.

3. All the powers conferred upon a municipal corporation should be construed with a view of carrying out the objects and purposes of its creation as a public agency.

4. Supplying the inhabitants of a city with electric light for use in their private residences and houses is such a municipal purpose as to authorize its delegation by the legislature to municipal bodies.

5. The charter act of the city of Jacksonville (Acts of 1887, chap. 3776) conferring power upon the city council to provide for lighting the city by gas or other illuminating material, or in any other manner, together with other specified powers,—Held, sufficient to authorize the erection and maintenance at public cost of an electric plant of sufficient power and capacity to light, not only the streets and public places in the corporation, but also for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants of the city with electric light for use in their private residences and houses.

(October 15, 1896.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Duval County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enjoin defendants from constructing and operating an electric light plant. Affirmed.

Statement by Mabry, Ch. J.:

The appellant company, a corporation existing under the laws of Florida, was complainant in the circuit court, and owned an electric plant of the value of $30,000, and subject to taxation, in the city of Jacksonville. It alleged that it had been and was then engaged in furnishing electric light to the city of Jacksonville and the inhabitants thereof in their private houses and places of business, and that its plant had sufficient power and capacity to furnish all the electric light that the city and its inhabitants might desire; that the city, through its board of public works, had entered into a contract with the General Electric Company, a corporation existing under the laws of New York, for the purpose of constructing an electric light plant within said city, and also contracted with other persons and corporations, unknown to complainant, for the purpose of purchasing engines and boilers to provide motive power for said plant. The right of the board of public works to so act is claimed under and by virtue of some ordinance of the city. That, under the agreement with the General Electric Company, the city had contracted to purchase material, machinery, apparatus, lamps, and lights, not only for the purpose of establishing an electric plant to light the streets, public buildings, and places of the city, but for the purpose of furnishing and selling electric light to the inhabitants of the city in their private residences and places of business. For the material, apparatus, and lamps to be procured from the General Electric Company, the city was to pay $47,500, and for the engines and boilers the sum of $25,000 was to be paid, making a total of $72,000. That the city intended to appropriate the public revenues of the municipality to pay for such electric plant, and it was the design of the city and its board of public works to construct said plant with such power and capacity as would be necessary to supply lamps and light to all the inhabitants of said city in their private houses and places of business, and for this purpose had provided in said contract to purchase 4,000 incandescent lamps which were not necessary and could not properly be applied to light the streets and other public places of the city, and that independent of said 4,000 lamps, the city had provided for all lamps, both arc and incandescent, necessary and proper for lighting the streets and public places in the city. The cost of the plant, engines, boilers, machinery, and attachments, it is alleged, exceeds the cost of such plant in full and adequate power to light the streets and public places of the city by between $35,000 and $40,000, and that the expenditure of such excess was improvident, unauthorized by the laws of the state, and a wrong to the taxpayers of the city. That the city had no power to appropriate any of its revenues or levy and collect taxes for any purpose and object other than a strictly municipal purpose, and that the appropriating of its revenues for the purpose of buying machinery and apparatus to furnish lights to the inhabitants of the city in their private houses and places of business was not a municipal purpose, and the city had no authority to do so. It is also alleged that the board of public works and the city had violated the 9th and 13th sections of the charter act of the city, being chapter 8775, in reference to letting contracts for over $200 to the lowest responsible bidder, and that the General Electric Company was not the lowest bidder for furnishing machinery and apparatus for said electric plant, but other responsible parties bid a less sum for the same material than the said General Electric Company.

The bill prays that the city and the board of public works be enjoined from executing and performing the contract entered into between the board of public works and the General Electric Company, and from applying any revenues of the city towards the execution of the said contract, and also that the city and board of public works be enjoined from appropriating any revenues of the city to pay for the 4,000 incandescent lights and the other portions of the apparatus and machinery designed for commercial purposes, or to pay for any engines, boilers, or machinery other than strictly necessary to furnish motive power for an electric plant of sufficient power and capacity to light the streets and other public places and buildings of the city of Jacksonville.

The answer of the city and the board of public works on information alleges that complainant's plant did not have as much as one half the necessary power or capacity to furnish all the electric lights that the city and its inhabitants desired or would pay for if electric lights were furnished to them at a reasonable price. The contracts with the General Electric Company and other companies for the construction of an electric light plant in the city of Jacksonville are admitted, and it is alleged that they were entered into by virtue of and in compliance with the laws of the state and ordinances of the city of Jacksonville. It is also averred that, in making the contracts for the erection of said electric plant in the city provision was made for such a plant as would have the power and capacity to furnish all the lights needed for lighting the streets and public places of the city, and also for furnishing some electric lights to the inhabitants of the city in their private residences and places of business. The answer further alleges that under the provisions of the laws of this state and ordinances of the city of Jacksonville the city had authorized the issue and sale of $75,000 of bonds to pay for the erection of an electric plant, and it was not contemplated that the plant contracted to be erected would be paid for from the ordinary revenues of the city derived from taxation. It is denied that the city of Jacksonville contemplated, or any of her authorized officers or agents had ever declared their design to construct an electric light plant with sufficient power and capacity to furnish lamps and lights to all the inhabitants of the city in their private residences and places of business, and it is averred that the city had not contracted for sufficient lamps and material for furnishing such amount of lights. It is further stated that the officers of the city having in charge the erection of said electric light plant had used their best discretion in contracting for the same, and had contracted for the erection of a plant sufficient, and only sufficient, to furnish adequate lights for the streets and public places of the city, and such number of private residences and business houses as complainant's plant was unable to supply, and to supply a want in this respect that complainant, through a long term of years, had deliberately abstained from supplying. The answer claims that defendants had authority, under the laws of the state and the ordinances of the city, to contract for the erection of such plant as was contemplated. The allegations of the bill in reference to not letting out the contract to the lowest bidder are denied, and defendants say that they believe the contracts were made with the lowest and best responsible bidders. It is also further alleged that the Jacksonville Electric Light Company was, and had been for many years, the only electric light company in the city, and that the persons who control this, the only electric light company in the city, also control, and for several years have controlled, the only gas company in the city, so that there has been practically, if not in fact, a single corporation controlling the supply of gas and electric light to the city of Jacksonville and its inhabitants, and that for years the price of gas and electric lights has been maintained at such extortionate rates that a very large proportion of the people of the city who desired and would use at reasonable prices, has been forced to abstain from the use thereof, and the city and other of its inhabitants have been forced to pay very largely more than a reasonable price for the gas and electric lights used; also the city has been unable to procure from either the gas or electric company proper lights for lighting the city as it should be; and, in fact, to properly light the city and furnish the lights for private residences and business houses would require a plant of very much more capacity than that of the complainant. The General Electric Company, of New York, demurred to the bill.

A motion for temporary injunction on bill, answer, affidavits, and documentary evidence, was made and denied.

Subsequently a supplementary bill was filed, in which reference is made to the allegations of the original bill, the answer thereto and the proceedings thereon, and further alleging that since the order denying the temporary injunction the city of Jacksonville, acting through its board of public works, had given it to be understood that the city intended engaging in the business of furnishing electric lights to any person, natural or artificial, who may desire to contract for the same, and also to furnish electric light to private residences and business houses and to charge therefor at a schedule of prices which had been published for the information of the public by way of inducement to persons to contract for electric light. It is alleged that the city had no power under its charter to contract with individuals to furnish electric light, or to furnish the same for private residences or business houses, or to in any way enter commercially into the business of furnishing electric lights, and that such proposed action on the part of the city is not a municipal purpose within the scope of the powers granted by the legislature, and also that such proposed action violated complainant's rights in bringing a branch of the government into competition with the complainant, chartered for the special purpose of furnishing electric light and engaging commercially in the electric lighting business. The prayer in the supplemental bill is that the city and its board of public works be restrained from engaging commercially in the business of electric lighting, and from furnishing electric lights to persons, either natural or artificial, or to private residences or business houses.

A motion for temporary injunction was again denied, and the bill dismissed for want of equity. The order denying the motion and dismissing the bill recites that the cause came on to be further heard upon the original and supplemental bills, the motion of complainant for temporary injunction, and defendant's motion to dismiss for want of equity.

Complainant appealed from all the orders of the circuit court to the June term, 1895, of this court, and upon the transcript of the record has moved here for a temporary injunction as prayed for the original and supplemental bills.

Messrs. John E. Hartridge and Henderson & Raney, for appellant:

Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved by the court against the corporation, and the power is denied.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. ¶ 80.

Messrs. A. W. Cockrell & Son, for appellees:

The furnishing of light by the city to individuals is a public service or "public purpose." Crawfordville v. Braden, 180 Ind. 149, 14 L. R. A. 268; Opinion of the Justices, 150 Mass. 592, 8 L. R. A. 487.

If to provide the "city" with water, etc., means the mayor and city council have the power by ordinances to provide and supply water to each and every inhabitant of the corporation in their residences and places of business (Grealey v. Jacksonville, 17 Fla. 174), then the grant of power to provide for lighting the "city," etc., is the grant of authority to provide for and supply to each and every inhabitant the means of lighting their residences and places of business with "gas or other illuminating material, or in any other manner."

Mabry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The motion made by appellant in this court involves its power to grant a temporary injunction pending an appeal in a case where such injunction had been refused by the circuit court. If this court had such power, it must be because of its authority to issue all writes necessary or proper to the complete exercise of the jurisdiction conferred on it by the Constitution in other matters than those in which it exercises original jurisdiction. The case of Cohen v. L'Engle, 24 Fla. 542, does not expressly affirm the jurisdictional authority of this court to grant the injunction asked for, and we are without a direct adjudication on the point in this state. An examination of this question has led to an investigation of the entire case presented by the record, and as it has been argued by counsel, and we have reached a conclusion thereon, we have decided to dispose of the appeal on its merits, without reference to the power of the court to grant a temporary injunction pending the appeal.

The question presented on the merits is whether the city of Jacksonville has the power to erect and maintain an electric plant of sufficient power and capacity to light the streets and public places of the city, and at the same time supply from said plant the inhabitants thereof with electric lights for their private residences and business houses. The original bill alleges that the city, through its board of public works, had failed to comply with the law regulating the letting out of contracts to the lowest bidder, in awarding the contract for the erection of the plant in question, but this is denied by the answer, and it is not contended here that appellant was entitled to an injunction on this ground. The supplemental bill would seem to go to the extent of alleging that the city had declared its purpose to engage in the manufacture and sale of electricity for commercial purposes without reference to its use by the inhabitants of the city, but there is nothing to show a purpose to dispose of electric lights to any other persons than the inhabitants of the city for use in their private residences and houses, and the question presented is as we have stated it. We have been unable to find any authorities bearing directly on the question involved in the merits of this case than those cited in the briefs of counsel, and the decisions cited speak of the paucity of adjudications on the point. The general rule stated by Judge Dillon (vol. 1, Mun. Corp. § 89) is recognized as a correct summary of the decisions on the question. The author states the rule as follows: "It is a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others: First, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation,—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied. Of every municipal corporation the charter or statute by which it is created is its organic act. Neither the corporation nor its officers can do any act, or make any contract, or incur any liability, not authorized thereby, or by some legislative act applicable thereto. All acts beyond the scope of the powers granted are void. Much less can any power be exercised, or any act done, which is forbidden by charter or statute." The same author says (sec. 91) that "the rule of strict construction of corporate powers is not so directly applicable to the ordinary clauses in the charter or incorporating acts of municipalities as it is to the charters of private corporations; but it is equally applicable to grants of powers to municipal and public bodies which are out of the usual range, or which may result in public burdens, or which, in their exercise, touch the right to liberty or property or, as it may be compendiously expressed, any common-law right of the citizen or inhabitant." While a strict construction should be applied to the grant of power, yet if a power is necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to those clearly given, it is not to be impaired by a strict construction. Kyle v. Malin, 8 Ind. 84. In speaking of the powers of municipal corporations, it is said in Bridgeport v. Housatonic R. Co. 15 Conn. 475: "They may exercise all the powers within the fair intent and purpose of their creation which are reasonably proper to give effect to powers expressly granted. In doing this they must (unless restricted in this respect) have a choice of means adapted to ends, and are not to be confined to any one mode of operation."

In construing a charter giving to a city the right to pass ordinances for the prevention and suppression of fires, and to appoint and remove fire wardens, and to prescribe the powers and duties of such fire wardens and of fire engineers and firemen, and to raise money to support the fire department, it was held that although no express grant of power was conferred to purchase engines and apparatus, yet such power was necessarily or fairly implied as incident to the power expressly given. Green v. Cape May, 41 N. J. L. 45. The charter of the city of Greenville, construed in the case of Moulton v. Greenville, 38 S. C. 1, 8 L. R. A. 291, provided that the council might purchase, hold, possess, and enjoy any estate, real, personal, or mixed, and sell, lease, alien, and convey the same, provided that it did not exceed at any time $100,000, and also to make and establish all such rules, by-laws, and ordinances respecting roads, streets, markets, and police department of the city, and the government of the city, as should appear necessary and requisite for the security, welfare, and convenience of the city for preserving health, life, and property, and securing the peace and good government of the same. The further power was given to levy taxes sufficient to discharge and defray all expenses of carrying into effect the ordinances, rules, and regulations established as provided, with the limitation that the tax should not exceed 75 cents upon every $100 of real and personal property assessed. The city was also authorized to borrow money for the public use of the corporation by issuing bonds bearing a certain rate of interest, and not to exceed $100,000. It was held that the city had the express power to purchase, and the implied power to operate an electric light plant, so far as it is used for lighting the streets and public buildings of the city, but so far as it was used for furnishing light to private residences and places of business at a compensation, it was not for the public use of the corporation, and therefore its purchase and maintenance to that extent were ultra vires. Aside from the express power to buy and hold property, the city had only the powers granted by what is usually called the "general welfare clause," in municipal charters. After referring to the rule announced by Judge Dillon, given above, the court says: "Now, tested by this principle, so clearly stated, how does the matter stand? Clearly the charter does not give the power to purchase this plant in express words. It does not so give even the power to light the city, but we assume that this latter power may be fairly implied from the grant of the police power." Under a statute giving cities power to establish and maintain electric light plants, or to authorize the erection of the same, upon a majority vote of the city, and to issue bonds for the purpose of establishing electric plants, the total amount not to exceed 5 per cent of the assessed taxable property within the city, Judge Shiras held that the city had the power to erect an electric plant for the purpose of furnishing light to its inhabitants in their stores and houses, as well as for lighting the streets and public places of the city. He says that it had been "the uniform rule that a city, in erecting gas works or waterworks, is not limited to furnishing gas or water for use only upon the streets and other public places of the city, but may furnish the same for private use; and the statutes of Iowa now place electric light plants in the same category." Thompson-Houston Electric Co. v. Newton, 42 Fed. Rep. 723; 3 Am. Electrical Cas. 507. An Indiana statute conferred upon municipalities the power "to light the streets, alleys, and other public places" of cities and towns with electric light or other form of light, and to contract with any individual or corporation for lighting such streets, alleys, and public places with electric light or other forms of light, on such terms and for such times, not exceeding ten years, as might be agreed upon. Other provisions in the act authorized the granting to any person or corporation the right to erect and maintain the necessary fixtures for supplying electric light to the inhabitants of the municipality, but it was conceded by the court, in the case of Crawfordsville v. Braden, 130 Ind. 149, 14 L. R. A. 268, that no provision was made in terms for the municipality to supply electric light to its inhabitants. It would seem from the terms of the act in conferring power upon the municipality to light the "streets, alleys, and other public places," that it was the purpose of the legislature to confine the corporation to such use in supplying electric light, but the court held that the corporation had the right to furnish the inhabitants light for their private residence and business houses, as well as lighting the streets and public places of the city. It appears that this right is based, in the case cited, upon the general police power of the city. The charter of the city of Nashville conferred the power "to provide the city with water by waterworks, within or beyond the boundaries of the city, and to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires, and organize and establish fire companies." The right of the city to establish waterworks, and in addition to making provision for the extinguishment of fires, to furnish water to the inhabitants, was affirmed in the case of Smith v. Nashville, 88 Tenn. 464, 7 L. R. A. 469. The act passed on in the case of Linn v. Chambersburg, 160 Pa. 511, 25 L. R. A. 217, expressly authorized any incorporated borough to manufacture electricity for commercial purposes for the use of the inhabitants of said borough, and the constitutional power of the legislature to confer such right was recognized. The court said: "In view of the fact that electricity is so rapidly coming into general use for illuminating streets, public and private buildings, dwellings, etc., why should there be any doubt as to the power to authorize such corporations to manufacture and supply it in like manner as artificial gas has been manufactured and supplied?" A statute in Kansas gave to cities of the second class authority to provide for and regulate the lighting of the streets, and to make contracts with any person, company, or association for such purpose. The city of Hiawatha entered into a contract with the General Electric Company to construct a plant to be used by the city exclusively for the purpose of lighting the public streets, without any intention to furnish lights to private citizens or to use of the same for any private purpose. The court held that the city had the right to construct the plant. State v. Hiawatha, 58 Kan. 477. The right to furnish to individuals for use in their private houses was not involved or considered. It was enacted in Ohio that "the council of any city or village shall have power, whenever it may be deemed expedient and for the public good, to erect gasworks at the expense of the corporation, or to purchase any gasworks already erected therein." Former statutes gave municipalities the right to contract with gas companies to supply cities with gas, and the right of a city to erect gasworks therein without any avowal of the purpose for which they were erected, although a contract had formerly been made with a gas company to supply gas, was affirmed in the case of State v. Hamilton, 47 Ohio St. 52. The power of the legislature to authorize incorporated cities and towns to erect and maintain electric plants to light the streets and other public places of the municipality, as well as supply light to private individuals, is expressly stated in Linn v. Chambersburg, supra, and the Opinion of the Justices, 150 Mass. 593, 8 L. R. A. 487.

The authority of the city of Jacksonville to erect the electric plant in question, and, in addition to lighting the streets and public places therein, to supply the inhabitants light for their private residence and houses, must depend upon the charter act of 1897, chap. 3775. The act of 1893, chap. 4339, gave the right to the city to issue bonds under conditions therein stated to refund the bonded indebtedness of the city, and for such other municipal purposes as might be provided by ordinance in submitting the question of the issuance of the bonds to a vote of the people. The issue of $75,000 of bonds for the erection of an electric plant having been carried, the city undertook the construction of the plant. Unless the erection of the plant was a municipal purpose within the meaning of the charter powers of the city, it could not be erected at public expense. The act of 1887 provides that the city "may purchase, lease, receive, and hold property, real and personal, within said city; and may sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of the same for the benefit of the city; and may purchase, lease, receive, and hold property, real and personal, beyond the limits of the city, to be used for the burial of the dead; for the erection of waterworks; for the establishment of poor houses, pest houses, houses of detention and correction; for public parks and promenades, and for any other public purpose that the mayor and city council may deem necessary or proper; and may sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of such property for the benefit of the city to the same extent as natural persons may." Among the powers conferred upon the city council are the following: "To make regulations to secure the general health of the inhabitants and to prevent and remove nuisances; to provide the city with water by waterworks within or beyond the boundaries of the city; to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires and to organize and establish a fire department; to provide for lighting the city by gas or other illuminating material, or in any other manner; . . . to make appropriations for lighting the streets and public buildings, and for the erection of all buildings necessary for the use of the city; . . . to pass all ordinances necessary for the health, convenience, and safety of the citizens, and to carry out the full intent and meaning of this act, and to accomplish the object of this incorporation." Among the limitations upon the city council are the following: "The mayor and city council are forbidden to make any appropriations of money or credit in the way of donation, festivities, pageants, excursions, or parades; nor shall they be authorized to subscribe for stock in any railroad company or in any other corporation, or give or lend any money, aid, or credit to any person or corporation whatever; and they are hereby prohibited from employing or appropriating the revenues and taxes in any other manner than for purposes strictly municipal and local according to the provisions of this act." Under the provisions regulating the duties of the board of public works, that body is given exclusive control over the lighting of all such public places as may be deemed necessary, and "shall have exclusive power to organize and control the fire department, the waterworks and its appurtenances, the gas and other illuminating works of the city, and its jails and houses of correction and detention."

There can be no doubt about the power of the city of Jacksonville to erect and maintain at public cost an electric plant of sufficient power and capacity to light the streets and public places in the corporation. Counsel for appellant do not insist here that the city does not possess such power, but the contention is that no power exists to erect and maintain such plant for the additional purpose of supplying the inhabitants of the city with electric light for use in their private residences and houses. Under a strict construction, as applied in the South Carolina decision, the city would have the power, even under the general welfare clause, to erect and maintain an electric plant to supply light for the streets and public places of the city. The grant of power to the city of Jacksonville to provide for lighting the city by gas or other illuminating material, or in any other manner, is clear and explicit, and this carries with it the power of choice of means to accomplish the end. Should this power be construed into a right to light the streets and public places of the city, but not to supply the inhabitants thereof with light for use in their private houses? The power of lighting the city is given in connection with the powers of providing the city with water and the establishment of fire departments for the prevention and extinguishment of fires. The Tennessee court construed a clause in the charter of the city of Nashville, similar to the one in the Jacksonville charter, into a power to supply water, not only for the public use of the city, but for private use by the inhabitants. The statute in Iowa simply gave the power to cities to erect electric plants without designating the purposes for which light might be generated, and it was held that it could be furnished by the city to its inhabitants for private use in their residences. The Indiana decision clearly sustains the power claimed by the city of Jacksonville in this case; and if the South Carolina case can be considered the other way, the preponderance of adjudication seems to be in favor of sustaining the power claimed in the case before us. The South Carolina court did not have before it a statute like ours, and we are of the opinion that a fair construction of the grant "to provide for lighting the city by gas or other illuminating material, or in any other manner," will authorize the erection and maintenance of an electric plant, not only for lighting the streets and public places of the city, but also for supplying, in connection therewith, electric light for the inhabitants of the city in their private houses. The power given is to light the city, and the connection indicates that the legislature was conferring powers for the benefit of the people generally of the city. The restrictions contained in the 5th section, prohibiting the appropriation of the revenues of the city in any other manner than for purposes strictly municipal and local and according to the provisions of the act, do not curtail the right if given in the grant of the power mentioned. Express authority is given to appropriate revenue to accomplish the purposes of the act. The city of Jacksonville is a municipal body, and of course all the powers conferred upon it should be construed with a view of carrying out its creation as a public agency of the state. None of its grants should be held to confer powers disconnected with municipal purposes. That the supplying the inhabitants of a city with electric light is such a municipal purpose as will authorize its delegation by the legislature to municipal bodies is sustained by all the authorities we have found. To the extent of supplying light to the inhabitants of a city for use in their private houses, we discover nothing that cannot, in the light of the decisions, be called a municipal purpose, and beyond this we are not called upon to go, and do not go, in this decision.

It is not insisted here that the dismissal of the bills, independent of the refusal to grant the injunctions prayed for, was error. No other relief was asked for except the injunctions.

Our conclusion is that the decrees appealed from should be affirmed, and it will be so ordered.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Hannah R. MORRISON et al., Appts.,
v.
ST. PAUL & NORTHERN PACIFIC RAIL-WAY COMPANY, Repts.

(.....Minn.....)

"The plaintiffs conveyed to the defendant by deed a right of way along the street in front of their lots. The deed contained the agreement 'that, in case the second party shall sell the above-mentioned right of way to any other company, the party of the first part shall be entitled to receive one half of the purchase money.' The defendant leased to another company its entire railway property, including this right of way, reserving rent payable quarterly, for the term of 999 years. Held, construing the agreement with reference to the allegations of the answer as to the inducement and consideration for the execution of the deed, and the terms and conditions of the lease, that the latter was not a sale of the right of way within the meaning of the contract.

(Duck, J., dissents.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County overruling their demurrer to the answer in an action brought to recover the sum which defendant had contracted to pay to plaintiffs upon selling a right of way which it had procured from them. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ripley & Brennan, for appellants:

Defendant was incorporated for fifty years. The grant was therefore for the life of the company twenty times renewed, and was practically as valuable as the fee.

Robbins v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co. 23 Minn. 286; Vandermulen v. Vandermulen, 108 N. Y. 195.

A case somewhat similar to the present one was National Car & L. Builder v. Cyclone Steam Snow-Plow Co. 49 Minn. 125.

*Headnote by START, Ch. J.

NOTE—The above case, holding that a lease of a railroad for 999 years is not a sale, turns on facts peculiar to itself, but may quite likely be important by analogy, if not as a direct precedent, in other cases of long railroad leases.

As to the right of a railroad company to sell land, see Chamberlain v. North Eastern R. Co. (S. C.) 25 L. R. A. 136, and note.

The term "sale" does not always mean a technical sale in such cases.

Watson v. King, 78 Hun. 340; Dennison v. Chapman, 105 Cal. 447; Hill v. Sumner, 132 U. S. 118, 33 L. ed. 284.

Mr. John H. Mitchell, Jr., for respondent:

"Sale" is a word of a precise legal import both at law and in equity. It means at all times a contract between parties to give and to pass rights of property for money which the buyer pays or promises to pay to the seller for the thing bought and sold.

Williamson v. Berry, 49 U. S. 8 How. 495, 12 L. ed. 1170.

A sale is an entire and absolute disposition and transfer of all the grantor's rights of property, to the extent of the interest granted, in the thing sold.

Benjamin, Sales, § 1; Taylor, Land. & T. § 14; Hufschmacker v. Harris, 38 Pa. 491, 80 Am. Dec. 503; Schermerhorn v. Talman, 14 N. Y. 98; Barker v. Marine Ins. Co. 2 Mason, 369, 2 Fed. Cas. 817; Park & L. Co. v. White River Lumber Co. 101 Cal. 37.

A careful analysis of all the provisions of the lease, considered in connection with the provisions of the deeds and the relations of the parties thereto, justifies the conclusion that respondent's transfer was a lease, and not a sale within the meaning of that term as used in the deeds.

Herryford v. Davis, 109 U. S. 235, 26 L. ed. 160.

There is now no limitation to the extent of a term of years of a lease, either in England or the United States.

Taylor, Land. & T. § 78; Union P. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 51 Fed. Rep. 309.

It is not reasonable to contend that the respondent has parted with its entire interest in this property merely because the term of the lease extends beyond the period of its corporate existence as specified in its articles of incorporation.

Union P. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 51 Fed. Rep. 309; Wood, Land. & T. §§ 61, 144; Gere v. New York O. & H. R. R. Co. 19 Abb. N. C. 198; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. p. 602.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs on October 6, 1884, were the owners of certain lots described in the complaint, fronting on a street in Minneapolis, and on that day they executed and delivered to the defendant two deeds, and thereby conveyed to it, its successors and assigns, the right to construct and perpetually maintain and operate its line of railway in the street in front of the lots. Each of the deeds contained the following agreement: "It is mutually understood by the parties that, in case the second party shall sell the above-mentioned right of way to any other company, the party of the first part shall be entitled to receive one half of the purchase money." The defendant leased its entire line and system of railway, including the right of way along the street in front of plaintiffs' lots, to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, for the term of 999 years. The plaintiffs, claiming that the lease was a sale of the right of way in front of their lots, within the meaning of the agreement in their deeds to the defendant, brought this action for an accounting, and to recover from the defendant one half of the amount received by it from the lessee on account of the lease to the latter of the right of way in front of the lots. The defendant answered, admitting the execution to it of the two deeds, and the making of the lease by it, and alleged that the deeds were executed to the defendant by the plaintiffs as an inducement to secure the construction and maintenance of its line of railway to points north and in the vicinity of the plaintiffs' lots, whereby a benefit and advantage would accrue to them in the enhanced value of their lots by the location of industries in their vicinity, as a result of the construction of a line of railway along the street, and its operation in connection with the defendant's system of railroads, and that such was a part of the consideration for the execution of the deeds. The answer also alleges that the line of railway was constructed and has ever since been operated as intended by the parties, and that the lease was entered into for the purpose of securing to the defendant, for its system of railway, including the line along the street in front of the plaintiffs' lots, transcontinental connections east and west, and thereby securing the safe, economical, and profitable operation of its lines of railroad. The answer also alleged the terms and conditions of the lease. It is unnecessary to here set them forth in detail, for they are the usual ones found in leases of railroads, and they negative any suggestion that the lease was made, instead of an absolute sale, for the purpose of defeating the agreement in plaintiffs' deeds. The lease, as set out in the answer, does not include the defendant's right to be a corporation, and by its terms was terminable at any time after the expiration of ninety days, upon default in the payment of rent, or in any of the covenants and conditions contained in the lease; and upon its termination for any cause the defendant is given the right of entry, possession, and the continuous use and enjoyment of the property, including all improvements, the same as if the lease had never been made. The plaintiffs demurred to the answer, and from an order overruling it they appealed.

The record presents only one question for our decision: Was this lease a sale of the right of way, within the meaning of the agreement in the deeds? The term "sale," as ordinarily used, does not mean a lease, but an entire and absolute transfer of the thing sold, without reservation. The term, however, is not always used in this sense, and, in determining whether this lease was in fact a sale, the name which the parties have given to the instrument, or its form, or any particular provision it contains, disconnected from all others, is not controlling; but the intention of the parties, and the legal effect of the instrument, are to determine its classification. The lease in question, unless terminated by the default of the lessee in the performance of its conditions and covenants, is in legal effect a perpetual one; and if it can be collected from the instrument as a whole that the real intention of the parties was a sale of the railway property, and the form and name of the instrument were adopted for the purpose of defeating the plaintiffs' rights under the agreement in the deeds, it would be the duty of the court to construe the transfer by virtue of the lease as a sale. National Car & L. Builder v. Oyocone Steam Snow-Plow Co. 49 Minn. 125. In the case cited the defendant had agreed to pay for certain advertising when it sold its first machine, and in form and name it made a lease of the machine for ninety-nine years, but in fact it was a sale, and so intended, and the name and form were but a device to enable the defendant to postpone the payment of its debt. The court gave effect to the transaction according to the intention of the parties, and held it to be a sale. So in the case of St. Paul & C. R. Co. v. McDonald, 84 Minn. 195, a transaction in name and form a mortgage was held to be a sale for the reason that the real character of the transaction was a sale of the lands described in the instrument, which the parties called a mortgage for the purpose of keeping the lands exempt from taxation. But these cases have no analogy to the one at bar, for the allegations of the answer as to the consideration for the deeds, the intention of the parties, and the terms and conditions of the lease, are all admitted by the demurrer; and there is no ground for claiming, and it is not claimed, that the transaction between the defendant and its lessee was or was intended to be anything except an actual and bona fide lease of its railroad property, or that the transaction was given the form of a lease, instead of an absolute sale, to defraud the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs are by the terms of their agreement entitled to one half of the purchase price when the defendant sells the right of way, not one half of the amount the defendant may receive for the use of the right of way, whether operated by itself or its lessee. To so construe the contract as to give the plaintiffs one half of the amount received by the defendant for the use of the right of way would be to make a new contract for the parties, by adding to the agreement in the deeds the words, "or, in case of a lease of the right of way, one half of the rent received." That the transfer of the defendant's system of railway to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was a lease, and not a sale, would seem to be quite clear. Suppose that the subject-matter of the deeds in question was two city lots, instead of the right of way in the street in front of them, and that the defendant had leased the lots for ninety-nine or any other number of years, reserving an annual rent equal to 6 per cent of their value; would this be a sale of the lots, within the meaning of the agreement in the deeds? If so, suppose, further, that the defendant and lessor, after a time, actually sold and conveyed the lots to a third party, subject to the lease, for the full value of the lots; would not this be a sale, and the amount received the purchase price, and one half thereof belong to the plaintiffs, under their contract in their deeds? If this last proposition is true (and it must be), what becomes of the first one,—that the lease was a sale, and the rent the purchase price? Where does the supposed case differ in principle from the one we are considering? The defendant, notwithstanding its lease, may sell its railway at any time it sees fit, subject to the lease, and thereby invest the purchaser with the right to receive the rent reserved in the lease. In case of such a transfer the subject-matter of the sale would be the railway property itself, and the purchase price a sum approximating the real value of the property as an income-bearing estate, as shown by the stipulated rent reserved in the lease. We are of the opinion that the word "sale," as used in the deeds, cannot be construed as including the lease of the right of way in question in connection with the defendant's entire railway property; especially so in view of the allegations of the answer as to the inducement and consideration for making the deeds, and the terms and conditions of the lease.

Order affirmed.

Buck, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The defendant agreed with the grantors in the deed to pay them one half of the proceeds in case of a sale to another railroad company,—an event which both parties evidently contemplated might probably be done at some future time. Judging from the allegations of the complaint, this right of the grantors to half the proceeds of a sale was a valuable one; but by a cunning, and that which seems to me an indefensible, proceeding, if the construction thereon placed by the majority opinion is the correct one, the defendant has accomplished indirectly, for its own benefit, what the parties intended should only be done directly and for the equal benefit of both parties. If this is not practically and in legal effect a sale, then the defendant, by this sharp practice, has entirely defeated its power to make any sale for a period of 999 years, and thus cheated the grantors or their successors in interest out of any right or interest in the premises during all that long period of time. The practical difference between a lease for such a long time and a sale is too dim and gauzy, and should not be tolerated, because, in my opinion, it is one of those attempted multi-form methods of practising fraud under the guise of legal formality which should not receive judicial sanction. The defendant could not practically do any more to effect a sale for a period of 999 years than to make the lease which it has done, and which, in my opinion, is an unconscionable attempt upon its part to evade the provisions in the deed, which required it to pay the grantors one half of the proceeds in case of a sale to another railroad company. "A lease is properly a conveyance of any lands or tenements in consideration of rent or other annual recompense, made for life, for years, or at will." Wood, Land. & T. § 75. "Independently of the idea of a contract, a lease also possesses the property of passing an interest, and thus partakes of the nature of an estate." Taylor, Land. & T. § 14. "A lease is a conveyance by the owner of an estate to another of a portion of his interest therein for a term less than his own, in consideration of a certain annual or stated rent, or other recompense." Gray v. La Fayette Co. 65 Wis. 567. A devise of the rents and profits of land is equivalent to a devise of the land itself, and will convey the legal as well as the beneficial interest therein. 2 Jarman, Wills, 38; Thompson v. Schenck, 16 Ind. 194. So this lease conveyed the legal as well as the beneficial interest in the premises for 999 years, and its practical effect is equivalent to a sale thereof. In the case of Watson v. King, 73 Hun, 840, the construction of a contract was under consideration which contained a provision that "one half the avails of any sales hereafter made of the lands now unsold" should be equally divided between the parties, and it was construed by the court as including rents of the same land. And I think that disposal by the defendant of the right of way, either by the technical sale or term lease, entitled the grantors or their successors in interest to one half the proceeds thereof. I also think that any other construction imposes a great wrong upon the plaintiffs herein.

(.....Wis.....)

1. Partnership creditors may prove pari passu with separate creditors against the estate of a partner, when there is no living solvent partner and no partnership assets applicable to the partnership debts, either at law or in equity.
2. Creditors who have trusted persons as partners and a business as that of the firm may hold the property used to carry on the business of the ostensible partnership subject to their claims in case of insolvency, to the exclusion of any claim of either of the ostensible members of the firm or of their separate creditors.
3. Partnership creditors have no lien on the partnership assets independent of the equities of the partners, but must work out their preference over the individual creditors of the members of the partnership through the equities of such members.
4. On a sale of the interest of a partner his equity to have the assets of the firm applied to the existing partnership debts ceases, even if the purchaser agrees to pay them as part of the consideration, unless there is an express or implied agreement to apply the assets to such purpose.
5. A sale by a partner of his interest in an insolvent firm for the purpose of paying the old firm debts, and thus winding up the old partnership concern by applying the assets to such debts, does not change the equity of the outgoing partner and of the firm creditors to have the assets applied to such debts.
6. Creditors of the old and of the new firm may prove their claims pari passu and be preferred over individual creditors of the members of the new firm, when the new firm assumed the debts of the old with the intention of all parties to have the business continue and pay the old debts out of the business, but the new firm has made an assignment for the benefit of creditors.

(Newman and Pinney, JJ., dissent.)

(November 8, 1895.)

A PPEALS by claimants from orders of the Circuit Court for St. Croix County disallowing claims against the assigned estate of A. J. Goss. Affirmed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Each of the above-named appellants filed a claim against respondent's assignor in his assignment proceedings, and such proceedings were had that an issue was made up as to each in respect to whether he was entitled to share pari passu with the other creditors of such assignor. The decision was against the claimants, upon the ground that they were partnership creditors. The facts in regard to the existence of a partnership doing business at River Falls, Wis., composed of J. D. Putnam and A. J. Goss, its dissolution, and the subsequent existence of the ostensible firm of J. B. Goss & Co., composed of J. B. Goss, the actual owner, and A. J. Goss, the ostensible partner, as stated in Thayer v. Goss (Wis.) 64 N. W. Rep. 312, Thayer v. Humphrey and Gibbs v. Humphrey, (Wis.) Id. 750 (decided at this term), may be considered as facts here; and otherwise the facts necessary to present the legal questions involved are sufficiently set out in the opinion.

Messrs. F. M. White and J. S. White, for appellants:

Any and every claim, legal or equitable, in any form, recoverable against an assignor, may be filed against his estate in the hands of the assignee.

Sanborn & Berryman, Anno. Stat. § 1700.

That this was a claim recoverable against A. J. Goss is set at rest by the judgment in the case.

Thayer v. Goss (Wis.) 64 N. W. Rep. 312; Freeman, Judgm. § 249; Lawrence v. Milwaukee, 45 Wis. 306; Woodward v. Hall, 6 Wis. 148; Van Pelt v. Kimball, 18 Wis. 368; Bruen v. Hone, 2 Barb. 596; Clemens v. Clemens, 87 N. Y. 72.

The assignments of A. J. and J. B. Goss were both individual, and made about the same time. She had the right to file and prove the whole amount of her claim against the estate of each of them.

Re Meyer, 78 Wis. 615, 11 L. R. A. 841.

The company's indebtedness is admitted, making A. J. Goss jointly liable without assumption.

Collyer, Partn. § 6.

From the day A. J. Goss assumed and promised to pay, it became and remained his individual obligation.

Kimball v. Noyes, 17 Wis. 696; McDowell v. Laev, 85 Wis. 175; Houghton v. Mulburn, 54 Wis. 561; Warren v. Farmer, 100 Ind. 598; Ladd v. Griswold, 9 Ill. 25, 46 Am. Dec. 448.

Taking the new note signed J. B. Goss & Co., in the belief that A. J. Goss was the continuing responsible party therein and continued bound by such note, was not payment or substitution of debtors.

Ford v. Mitchell, 15 Wis. 808; Matteson v.

NOTE.—As to the rights of creditors of an ostensible partnership when no real partnership exists the above case is very important, as the question is almost a new one in the courts of this country. The case also presents other important questions concerning the distribution of assets between creditors of a firm and of its members, which are 80 L. R. A.

discussed with great fullness both in the opinions and briefs. See the somewhat similar case of Darby v. Gilligan (W. Va.) 6 L. R. A. 740, and note.

As to the power of a firm to assume a debt of an individual partner, see note to Goddard-Peck Grocery Co. v. McCune (Mo.) 22 L. R. A. 681.

Ellsworth, 38 Wis. 502, 14 Am. Rep. 766; Hoeftinger v. Wells, 47 Wis. 631; First Nat. Bank v. Case, 68 Wis. 504.

The surrender of the old note does not raise any presumption of extinguishment of the original debt.

Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1266a; First Nat. Bank v. Case, 63 Wis. 509.

Including the accrued interest in the new note did not affect the character of the debt or the liabilities of the parties.

Campbell v. Floyd, 153 Pa. 84.

Retirement from the firm would not release from liability for the old debts.

Jones v. Foster, 87 Wis. 296.

A. J. Goss being thus, long before and at the assignment, personally and individually liable for his debt, it was a proper claim against his estate, in common with his other personal liabilities, and stood on an equal footing.

Re Lloyd, 22 Fed. Rep. 88; Warren v. Farmer, 100 Ind. 593; Alexander Bros. v. Gorman, 15 R. I. 421; 2 Bates, Partn. § 832.

Even were this claim yet a partnership debt, and the payment thereof unassumed by A. J. Goss, there being no partnership property and no solvent partner, the individual creditors would have no priority over the firm creditors, in the distribution of the separate estate of A. J. Goss.

Curtis v. Woodward, 58 Wis. 499, 46 Am. Rep. 647; 2 Bates, Partn. § 833; Shackelford v. Clark, 78 Mo. 491; Huteler Bros. v. Phillips, 26 S. C. 136; Harris v. Peabody, 73 Me. 262; Ladd v. Griswold, 9 Ill. 25, 46 Am. Dec. 443; Brock v. Bateman, 25 Ohio St. 609; Camp v. Grant, 21 Conn. 41, 54 Am. Dec. 321; Higgins v. Bector, 47 Tex. 361; Bardwell v. Perry, 19 Vt. 292, 47 Am. Dec. 687; Alexander Bros. v. Gorman, supra; White v. Dougherty, Mart. & Y. 309.

The firm, and its assets as such, ceased to exist on the day of dissolution and transfer to A. J. Goss individually; both firm and firm assets then relegated to oblivion, and A. J. Goss thereafter stood forth sole owner of the property and debtor to the creditors.

Warren v. Farmer, 100 Ind. 593; Pool v. Seney, 66 Iowa, 503; 1 Bates, Partn. §§ 559-824; Ladd v. Griswold, 9 Ill. 25, 46 Am. Dec. 443.

If this yet remained a joint obligation in virtue of the old copartnership only, there being no J. D. Putnam & Company funds, and no solvent partner, the joint creditors could come upon the separate estate of Goss pro rata with his separate creditors.

Bates, Partn. §§ 832, 833; Brock v. Bateman, 25 Ohio St. 609; Ladd v. Griswold, supra; Shackelford v. Clark, 78 Mo. 493; Harris v. Peabody, 73 Me. 262; Huteler Bros. v. Phillips, 26 S. C. 136; Curtis v. Woodward, 58 Wis. 499, 46 Am. Rep. 647; Bardwell v. Perry, 19 Vt. 292, 47 Am. Dec. 687; Camp v. Grant, 21 Conn. 41; Re Lloyd, 22 Fed. Rep. 88.

The rule for marshalling firm assets as between firm and individual liabilities is for the benefit and protection of the partners themselves, and has no application where there is no available property.

1 Bates, Partn. § 559; Pool v. Seney, supra; Haggood v. Cornwell, 48 Ill. 64, 95 Am. Dec. 516; Shackelford v. Clark, supra.

The moment the property was deeded to A. J. Goss it became his individual property. A. J. Goss then transferred the property to J. B. Goss, by which transfers the property as to appellant ceased to be partnership property.

Re Lloyd, supra; Bates, Partn. §§ 547, 548; Glenn v. Gill, 2 Md. 1.

The right or equity of partnership creditors to share in partnership assets to the exclusion of individual creditors is derived from the rights of the partners themselves, and can be worked out only through the partners themselves.

Grabenheimer v. Rindskoff Bros. 64 Tex. 49; Glenn v. Gill, 2 Md. 16; Bates, Partn. § 840.

Messrs. Spooner, Sanborn, Kerr, & Spooner, for respondent:

Partnership creditors cannot prove against individual assets in competition with individual creditors.

Story, Partn. 6th ed. § 876; Parsons, Partn. 4th ed. § 833; Burrill, Assignm. 6th ed. § 179; Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 670, 83 L. ed. 696; Davis v. Howell, 38 N. J. Eq. 72; Severson v. Porter, 78 Wis. 70.

The equities of the creditors are worked out through the equities of the partners, and each partner has a right to require the firm assets to be exhausted by firm creditors before contributing from his private funds; and where there are two funds it is equitable, all things considered, to confine the two classes of creditors each to a separate fund.

Story, Partn. 6th ed. §§ 876, et seq.; Burrill, Assignm. 6th ed. § 180; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1199; Hankey v. Garret, 1 Ves. Jr. 236, note to page 241; Emanuel v. Bird, 19 Ala. 596, 54 Am. Dec. 200; Harris v. Peabody, 73 Me. 262.

At the time of the transfer from J. D. Putnam & Co. to J. B. Goss & Co. of all their assets, the first-named firm was insolvent. J. D. Putnam & Co. could not, as against their creditors, transfer their property in this way, and such creditors had the right, at their election, to treat the transfer as void and go against the assets in the hands of J. B. Goss & Co.

Cribb v. Morae, 77 Wis. 322.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There are no findings of fact in these cases, but the evidence distinctly shows that the firm of J. D. Putnam & Co., on the 3d day of November, 1891, when Putnam sold out as hereafter stated, was hopelessly insolvent; that J. D. Putnam, the managing partner of the firm, was insolvent as well; that he desired to retire from the business and have its affairs closed up, and, in order that this might be done without an assignment on his part and on the part of the firm as well, which, it was thought, would imperil the private business of A. J. Goss, it was agreed that the firm should be dissolved, and that Putnam should transfer his interest in the firm property, and also his individual property, for the benefit of the firm, and that the business should be thereafter continued under some new management, in which the old debts should be assumed and paid through its operations. J. B. Goss, the son of A. J.

Goss, conducted the negotiations for the latter, but it was concluded in such a way that Putnam believed, and had a right to believe, that the son was to take his (Putnam's) place in the firm; that Putnam was simply to step out, and J. B. Goss to step in. When the transfer was made, it was in form to A. J. Goss, but it satisfactorily appears that Putnam supposed that J. B. Goss was the real purchaser, and that the business was to be carried on so as to liquidate the firm debts, and eventually relieve him from liability. The agreement of dissolution expressly stated that the business would be conducted by J. B. Goss & Co., who would settle all claims of the old partnership. It was so advertised to the world, over the signatures of J. D. Putnam and A. J. Goss; J. B. Goss managing the whole affair. At this time the legal title to the property was in A. J. Goss, but he soon afterwards conveyed it to J. B. Goss, who thereafter held it as the real owner of the business, though the same was always carried on under the name of J. B. Goss & Co., and all the old creditors, pursuant to the agreement made at the start, as they presented their claims, were recognized as creditors of J. B. Goss & Co., down to the time of the assignments of J. B. Goss and A. J. Goss, hereafter mentioned. Through the confusion surrounding the sale, by reason, among other things, of the claim on the part of Putnam that J. B. Goss was the purchaser and came in and took his place, while the title was, nevertheless, at first made to A. J. Goss; that the business was, however, from the start, advertised as that of J. B. Goss & Co.; and that, soon after the new arrangement, the property was actually conveyed to J. B. Goss; and that it continued to the end to be administered by him as J. B. Goss & Co., and the old debts to be recognized as the debts of J. B. Goss & Co., while there was no firm in fact,—it may be clearly seen that the real purpose on the part of Putnam was to turn over his property for the benefit of the creditors of the partnership; that this was well known to both A. J. and J. B. Goss; that J. B. Goss immediately took charge of all the assets of the concern, and administered them according to such understanding; that A. J. Goss made the title over for the same reason, and for the purpose of having the partnership business settled up without involving him in his private enterprises,—to have it so run along, pending the settlement, that all the old debts might become really the debts of his son, while the delusion was kept up that there was a firm, J. B. Goss & Co., and that the "& Co." stood for A. J. Goss. In short, it is clear that J. D. Putnam, J. B. Goss, and A. J. Goss intended, in all they did, to have the business and the assets of J. D. Putnam & Co. devoted to the payment of the debts of the old partnership and of the new management, and all their acts are consistent with such intention, and not with any other, though, of course, J. D. Putnam was not a party to the scheme by which it was attempted to convert the liabilities of J. D. Putnam & Co. into the personal liabilities of J. B. Goss.

It is quite clear that while, after the Putnam sale, the business was run by J. B. Goss as J. B. Goss & Co., and though he was at law the actual owner of the property, A. J. Goss was, by his consent, so held out to creditors generally as a partner; that all persons who had dealt with the old firm and constituted its creditors, and all who dealt with the new firm as well, had a right to, and did, consider that the only change that had taken place was that J. D. Putnam had stepped out, and that J. B. Goss had stepped in, and that the debts of the old firm had been assumed by, and became the debts of, the new firm. We must assume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, though the evidence fairly establishes the fact, that all persons who did business with J. B. Goss & Co. supposed that there was a firm in fact as well as in name, and that the "& Co." stood for A. J. Goss. The ostensible firm actually assumed, by agreement with the creditors, nearly all the debts of the old concern, and among them the debt of Lottie Thayer, but did not so assume the debt of Davies. Such ostensible firm also incurred other obligations. It was insolvent from the start, and, in the course of events,—in effect by the act of J. B. Goss,—made an assignment for the benefit of creditors; and A. J. Goss, being insolvent, made an assignment for the benefit of creditors as well. There was then in fact no firm, though there was an ostensible firm; no firm assets, strictly so called, because there was no firm in fact; yet there are assets that were owned and used in the business of the ostensible firm of J. B. Goss & Co., and that passed into the possession of the assignee of J. B. Goss,—hence assets of the ostensible firm; there is no living, solvent partner.

Now, in this situation, can the creditors of J. B. Goss doing business as J. B. Goss & Co., who are so circumstanced as to be entitled to hold J. B. Goss and A. J. Goss liable as members of an ostensible firm,—and all the creditors, at least of the new concern, including those having claims against the old firm that, by arrangement with them, have been assumed and made debts of J. B. Goss & Co., are so circumstanced in fact,—prove their claims pari passu with the individual creditors of A. J. Goss in his assignment? Also, can the creditors of the firm of J. D. Putnam & Co. so prove? This presents interesting questions of law, some of which have not heretofore been presented to or decided by this court,—questions upon which there is such conflict of authority in this country that the true rule to be adopted has not been arrived at without difficulty, and then not with the unanimous decision of the court, which is to be regretted. Nevertheless, after careful consideration of the state of the law as held by the courts of this country and of England as well, we have, as we believe, reached a conclusion thoroughly grounded in the well-recognized principles of equity jurisprudence, which should be applied in the progressive spirit that ever has and should ever characterize the growth and application of such principles. They should not only not be lost sight of, but they should not be fenced in and restricted within such narrow limits as to lead to a suspicion of their correctness, but should be applied on such well-defined lines as to leave no doubt in respect to their true character and scope.

There are several propositions of law that apply which are well established,—too well to need to be more than stated,—among which are that the assets of an insolvent partnership, in insolvency proceedings, must be applied first to the payment of the partnership debts; that, generally speaking, partnership creditors cannot prove in competition with the individual creditors of a partner; that the fixed rule is that joint estate must go to joint creditors, and separate estate to separate creditors, though the former may prove pari passu with separate creditors when there is no living solvent partner and no partnership assets. Now, in this case there is no solvent partner. J. D. Putnam, J. B. Goss, and A. J. Goss are all insolvent. So, keeping in mind the above-stated propositions of law, the vital question is: Are there any partnership assets to which appellants can resort? If there are such, then the foundation stone upon which they construct their claim of right to share pari passu with the individual creditors of A. J. Goss disappears.

On that subject we shall not attempt to harmonize the large number of cases that can be found in this country. The simple question of whether, when there is an ostensible firm by holding out to creditors generally, the property of such firm is to be considered, in equity, joint property for the administration thereof in insolvency, the same as if such property belonged to a firm in fact,—is the key to the situation. That it ought to be so considered is, we assume, too clear for argument; that is to say, if A and B do business with persons generally as A & Co., and incur liabilities to such persons, who deal in good faith, believing that there is a firm in fact as well as in name, and under such circumstances that they have a right to believe it is composed of A and B, and the business becomes insolvent, the property of the ostensible firm should be considered, to all intents and purposes, in regard to the administration of the business in insolvency under the control and direction of a court of equity, the same as if they were partners in fact. The doctrine that estops B from saying that he is not a partner of A at the suit of the creditors of the ostensible firm should estop A from holding that the property is his individual property, to the prejudice of those who dealt with the firm as a firm in fact, and should estop the creditors of the ostensible firm, in the case of the bankruptcy of such firm, from resorting primarily to the individual property of the members of such firm; in short, should work effectually to compel liquidation in all respects the same as if the members of such firm were just what they seem to be. This is what the doctrine of estoppel is for; that is what equity is supposed to accomplish,—to prevent fraud and promote justice between man and man in the administration of human affairs. And we are therefore prepared to find that such is the law as substantially declared by the court of appeals in chancery of England.

80 J. R. A.

In Re Rowland & Crankshaw, L. R. 1 Ch. 421, the precise question here under consideration was presented. The business was conducted in the name of Rowland & Co. Crankshaw was held to be the ostensible partner, in a contest to determine whether the property should be administered in bankruptcy as joint property of Crankshaw and Rowland, partners, or as the individual property of the one who was the actual owner. The opinion of the court, which, being short, can best be stated by quoting it in full so far as relates to the particular question under consideration, is by Lord Cranworth, as follows: "In the administration of bankruptcy, it has been the object from the earliest times to apportion the assets, as fairly as possible, between the joint and separate creditors. There is found much difficulty in doing this satisfactorily, but some rules have been clearly laid down; for instance, that the joint property pays the joint creditors, and the separate property pays the separate creditors. Now, what is said here is that this estate, though said to be joint, is in fact separate. These two gentlemen traded under the name of Rowland & Co., and tradesmen supplied them with large quantities of goods, and thus they became bankrupt; and now it is said that they were not partners, and that the real arrangement between them was that everything belonged to Crankshaw. That is no reason; and as Crankshaw suffered Rowland to trade in the name of the firm, any persons trading with him are entitled to say that Rowland & Co. are the persons with whom they dealt, and the goods are joint goods." This is a most concise statement of the law as held by the English court of chancery. The meaning is too plain and unmistakable to leave any room for discussion, and we find that the rule so tersely stated has been adhered to, and repeatedly approved, in subsequent cases, in language rather tending to extend than restrict the principle involved. In Ex parte Sheen (Re Wright), L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 385, the question was again before the court, where the circumstances were that there was no general holding out, and the court held that where there is no ostensible partnership by a holding out to creditors generally, but only a holding out to two or three creditors, the facts are not sufficient to make the property of the alleged ostensible firm joint estate. This, though not referring to, inferentially approves, Re Rowland & Crankshaw. In Ex parte Hayman (Re Pulsford), L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 11, the question again came before the court of chancery, on appeal from the chief judge in bankruptcy, and Re Rowland & Crankshaw was expressly approved. The case so clearly covers the two cases under consideration that we quote liberally from the opinion, after stating the facts. Such facts are as follows: Prior and up to August 31, 1875, Hayman, Catford, and Pulsford carried on business as Hayman, Pulsford, & Co. On that date the firm was dissolved, and notice was published stating the fact. At the same time a letter was sent to each of the persons with whom the firm had done business, stating the fact of dissolution, and that thereafter the business would be carried on by Thomas Pulsford under the style of Pulsford, Son, & Co. Thereafter the business was so conducted. Tom Pulsford, the son of Thomas Pulsford, took an active part in conducting the business up to the time the insolvency occurred, when Thomas Pulsford filed a petition in bankruptcy; and on the suggestion that, on account of the way the business had been conducted, it might be held that the father and son were partners, a petition was also filed by them as joint traders. The creditors resolved upon a liquidation by arrangement, and such resolution was registered. Hayman, a separate creditor of the father in respect to matters outside the firm of Pulsford, Son, & Co., appealed from the order for a liquidation of the business as that of a firm, on the ground that there was no partnership. He prevailed, and the registration was canceled, and the decree was not appealed from. Thereafter the father and son signed a declaration in insolvency, upon which Ravenscroft, a creditor, presented a petition alleging that they had treated father and son as partners under the firm name of Pulsford, Son, & Co., on which an adjudication was made against them by consent. Hayman then appealed to the court to annul the adjudication. On this application, following Re Rowland & Crankshaw, the application was dismissed on the ground that, though no actual partnership had subsisted between father and son, yet the son had been held out as a partner to the petitioning creditor to such an extent as to enable him to maintain the adjudication. This decision was not appealed from. Hayman then applied to the court for an order declaring that all, or such portion as the court should think proper, of the estate which appeared in the acts of the bankrupts or either of them as joint estate, formed part of the separate estate of the father, and for a direction that the trustee should treat the same accordingly as separate estate of the father. Hayman was the only separate creditor; that is, creditor outside those of the business of Pulsford, Son, & Co. On the hearing, the evidence showed that substantially all the creditors did business with Pulsford, Son, & Co. as a firm consisting of the father and son, though it appeared that the father was the actual owner of the business, and that there was no firm in fact. Hayman's application was refused, and he appealed. On the hearing of this appeal in the chancery division of the high court of justice, James, L. J., propounded to appellant's counsel the following interrogatory: "If I go to a shop, and find the names Thompson & Jones on the door, and I go in, and find Thompson and Jones selling goods, am I not warranted in believing that they are partners?" to which answer was made in effect: "That would not change the nature of the assets, and make property which belonged to the father in fact the joint property of father and son,"—just as it is claimed in this case, it will be observed. Appellants contend that the fact of holding out sufficient to constitute an ostensible firm of J. B. Goss & Co. will not change the nature of the assets so as to make the individual property of J. B. Goss joint property, in equity, of J. B. Goss & Co. The positions are identical. In the opinion of the court this is answered by James, L. J. After reciting the facts in Re Rowland & Crankshaw, as in Lord Cranworth's opinion in that case, he says: "Every point of that judgment applies to this case, with this single exception, which fact is in favor of the decision of the registrar, that, instead of the words used being '& Co.,' which is an ambiguous term, and might mean anybody in the world, the words are 'Pulsford, Son, & Co.' But it is said that this conclusion will work hardship to the appellant, who is a creditor of the father alone. I think that is only one of those misfortunes which occur to persons who deal with others who afterwards become insolvent and become bankrupt, having partners. The hardship would have been exactly the same upon Hayman if there had been a real partnership created by a formal instrument. The same consequences would then have happened as happen where there is only an ostensible partnership." It will be distinctly noted at this point that the court makes no distinction in the administration of estates of an ostensible and an actual firm in bankruptcy. The Lord Justice proceeds: "The rule has been established that joint creditors take the joint estate, and separate creditors take the separate estate; and you only have to consider what is joint and what is separate estate; and you must apply the rule independently of the hardship. The supposed hardships are those which it may inflict in any particular case. We can only apply the fixed rule that that which is joint estate shall go to the joint creditors, and that which is separate estate shall go to the separate creditors."

The reasoning of these cases is, in our opinion, unanswerable, and we deduce therefrom the principle of law that, if a persons allows another to carry on business in such a way as to amount to a holding out to persons generally that he and such other are partners, and credit is given to both on the supposition that they are partners in fact, the property with which such business is carried on, though in law that of such person, in equity will be treated as the joint property of such person and such other; and neither of them, nor the creditors of either, can prove up in insolvency in competition with the creditors who have trusted the two as partners and the business as that of the two. To the same effect is Van Kleeck v. McCabe, 87 Mich. 599. Applying the law thus stated to the question under consideration, the conclusion is easily reached that, while there are no firm assets at law of the ostensible firm of J. B. Goss & Co., all the property used by J. B. Goss in conducting the business, in equity, is the joint property of such ostensible firm, and to it all the creditors of such ostensible firm can resort, the same in all respects as if there had been a firm in fact.

This effectually disposes of the appeal of appellant Lottie Thayer, though it is as effectually ruled by the law applicable to the Davies appeal, as will appear by what follows. Appellant Davies never became a creditor of J. B. Goss or of J. B. Goss & Co., by any agreement to which he was a party; and, while his appeal presents the question of whether there is any joint property to which he can resort, such question involves a different question from the one discussed as particularly applicable to the Thayer appeal.

We must start the discussion of the Davies appeal with the propositions of law—in respect to which, though there is some conflict, they are too well established by the great weight of authority to be questioned by this court—that partnership creditors have no lien on the partnership assets independent of the equity of the partners, but must work out their preference over the individual creditors of the members of the partnership through the equities of such members; that, so long as the equity of the individual members of the partnership exists to have the partnership property applied to the partnership debts, the creditors have the equity to compel its enforcement; that if one member sells his interest, bona fide, to his copartner or a stranger, without in any way retaining his equity to have the partnership creditors paid out of it, the joint property is thereby converted into the individual property of the purchaser. The question to be determined is, in view of the facts that the sale was made by Putnam in consideration of the debts of the partnership being paid; that the firm was insolvent at the time; that the whole transaction was really made by him to relieve himself from the partnership liability; that the property was put into the possession of J. B. Goss for the purpose of continuing the same business with the same assets, and effecting a settlement of the old partnership affairs,—all of which clearly appears, can it be held that the equitable title to the property was changed so as to affect the equitable right of Putnam to have the creditors of the old firm paid out of it, or were the equitable rights of the outgoing partner and the creditors preserved by reason of the facts, and the assets in the hands of J. B. Goss impressed with a trust to carry out the intention of the parties? In discussing these questions, full effect should be given to the significant controlling words in the rule correctly stated in Willis v. Thompson, 85 Tex. 301, “bona fide,” without in any manner retaining the lien. In Conroy v. Woods, 18 Cal. 628, 73 Am. Dec. 605, it was held that where a sale is made by one partner to his copartner, and the consideration for the sale is the payment of the partnership debts, the sale is not “bona fide,” within the meaning of the rule, so as to cut off the equity of the vendor to have the property applied to the payment of the partnership debts. Very few cases can be found that go as far as the California court on this subject, except in the New Hampshire court, which does so, holding that the creditor has an equitable interest independent of the equity of the individual partner. In Ex parte Cooper, 1 Mont. D. & De G. 358, and Ex parte Williams, 11 Ves. Jr. 3, it is held that where an outgoing partner sells bona fide to his copartner, and takes for his consideration an agreement that the purchaser shall pay the debts, no equitable interest in the property is retained. To the same effect are Stanton v. Westover, 101 N. Y. 265; Fulton v. Hughes, 63 Miss. 61; Dimon v. Hazard, 32 N. Y. 65, and many other cases that might be cited. In Darby v. Gilligan, 38 W. Va. 246, 6 L. R. A. 740, it is held that where a firm is insolvent, if a partner sells out to his copartner, and the purchaser agrees to pay the firm debts, the sale cannot be considered bona fide so as to cut off the equity of the firm creditors to be preferred; and to the same effect is Olson v. Morrison, 29 Mich. 395. In the latter case Olson and Jones were partners. Olson sold out to Morrison, the consideration being that the vendee should pay the debts of the firm. It sufficiently appears that the firm was insolvent. The vendee neglected to comply with his agreement, and the creditors, joining with the vendor, brought suit to compel performance of the agreement, and to subject the property to the payment of the partnership debts. Held, that the agreement to pay the debts as consideration for the transfer was a sufficient recognition of the equitable lien of the partnership creditors, tracing the same through the equity of the vendor, to enable them, joining with him, to enforce such equity. In Menagh v. Whitwell, 52 N. Y. 146, 11 Am. Rep. 683, it was held that, as between the firm and its creditors, the title of the former to the joint property is not divested by any separate transfers to outside parties for the individual benefit of the respective vendors, and that, when there has been no transfer by the firm as such, conveying the corpus of the property, and it remains in specie, though transferred by the separate transfers of the individual members, it may yet be followed and reached in the hands of those claiming under such separate transfers, by creditors of the firm. This is upon the theory that neither partner separately has any interest in the corpus of the property; that his interest is limited to his proportionate share of what remains after a settlement of all partnership obligations and an accounting between himself and his copartner. A distinction is drawn in this case between a bona fide sale by one of a partnership to two of his copartners without reservation, which, under the prevailing rule of Ex parte Ruffin, 6 Ves. Jr. 119, operates to liberate the assets from the partnership liability, and a sale made by one member of a firm of more than two, to one of the partners, or to an outside party. In that class of cases the New York courts have uniformly held, since Menagh v. Whitwell, that the partnership effects are not liberated from the partnership liability. In this case, if it is held that the sale was really to J. B. Goss, under the New York rule the corpus of the property never passed by any act of the firm, so as to change the equitable title in respect to creditors existing at the time of the sale. The trend of the New York cases since Menagh v. Whitwell has been to extend the rule which preserves the equity of the creditors in case of the sale by one of the members of an insolvent firm, the purchaser assuming the partnership obligations in place of the outgoing partner, whether such sale is to a copartner or otherwise. This clearly appears by the following from the opinion in Bulger v. Rosa, 119 N. Y. 465: The equity of the firm creditors cannot be defeated by any attempted conversion of the assets of the insolvent firm into the individual assets of one of the partners, through a transfer by one partner of his interest therein to the other. In such a case, till the assets come to the hands of a bona fide purchaser the same can be reached by the partnership creditors. To the same effect are Nordlinger v. Anderson, 123 N. Y. 544, and Peyser v. Myers, 135 N. Y. 599. In the latter case there had been a change in the firm some time prior to the assignment for the benefit of creditors, the new firm not having made any express contract to pay the old firm debts. There were two sets of creditors, and, in discussing the subject of their equitable rights, the court said: "The priority of the lien of firm creditors is not defeated by a transfer by an insolvent firm of the firm assets to one or more of the partners, nor can it be affected, as we conceive, by any mere change in the personnel of the firm, as by the withdrawal of one partner from the firm or the introduction of a new member." See also Phelps v. McNeely, 66 Mo. 554, 37 Am. Rep. 878, where it was held that if a partner sells out his interest in the firm to his copartner, who agrees to pay the debts, the firm being at the time insolvent, the equities of the creditors are preserved. The evidence in that case tended to show that there was no property, other than that formerly belonging to the partnership, out of which the firm debts could be paid; but it does not clearly appear whether the court rested its decision on the ground that there was an implied promise under the circumstances to pay the firm debts out of the partnership assets, or on the ground that the insolvency of the firm impeached the bona fides of the transaction. The court went further, and held that, notwithstanding the vendee of the property had turned the same out to secure his individual creditors, who had received it as security in good faith, it could, nevertheless, be reached by the partnership creditors; but this was subsequently overruled in Re Edwards & Wigginton's Estate, 123 Mo. 426, 29 L. R. A. 681.

We might go on at great length, reviewing decisions on this subject, and cite numerous authorities where outgoing partners have been held to retain their equity to have the firm debts paid, and the rights of the creditors to the assets which have come under the control of equity have been worked out through the equity of such partners. Probably there are few questions upon which there is such a conflict of authority as the one under consideration; but nearly all are in harmony with the principle that if the bona fides of the transaction are impeached, or if the equity is retained by agreement, express or implied, then the creditors can enforce such equity. The conflict chiefly arises in regard to what circumstances or facts are sufficient to impeach the good faith of the transaction, and in respect to what is sufficient to show a contract that the partnership debts shall be paid out of the partnership assets, and impress a trust upon such assets for that purpose.

By the mere fact of the dissolution of a partnership by one member selling out to his copartner or to a stranger, the purchaser or purchasers agreeing, as consideration for the purchase, to pay the partnership debts, the firm being insolvent at the time, no presumption of a bona fide agreement arises which will operate to change the equitable title of the property; and such agreement must clearly appear to exist inconsistent with the continuance of the equitable rights of the partner, and, through him, of the partnership creditors; else it is retained. Lindley, Partn. 699. If the circumstances are such as to show that the property was merely transferred for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the concern, there being no express agreement that the property shall be exclusively that of the vendee, it will, in case of bankruptcy, be distributed as joint estate. Id. 699, 700. This is upon the presumption that such was the intention of the parties. The presumptions to be indulged in, in such cases, rather go to support an implied agreement to do what in equity and good conscience the parties ought to do. In Sedam v. Williams, 4 McLean, 51, Fed. Cas. No. 12,609, and Marsh v. Bennett, 5 McLean, 117, Fed. Cas. No. 9,110, it was held that the equity was retained to have the partnership creditors paid out of the partnership assets, and that such assets were impressed with a trust for that purpose by virtue of an express agreement. In Re Dawson, 59 Hun, 239, which does not appear to have been appealed from or criticised, it was held that where one member of a firm retires, selling out his interest to a third party who continues the business with the remaining partner, with whom he enters into partnership, and the partnership assumes the debts of the previous firm, and such new firm becomes insolvent, and makes an assignment for the benefit of creditors, the property transferred to the new firm becomes charged in equity with a trust for the payment of the debts of the old firm, which the outgoing partner may enforce. Such holding is certainly equitable and just when applied to a state of facts, as in this case, which leaves no room for doubt but that it was the intention of all the parties dealing with the property to preserve and administer the partnership assets in the nature of a trust to liquidate the old debts; and to this extent we expressly approve of and apply it here.

This does not in the least trench upon the rule that if a partner sells out, bona fide, his interest in the partnership assets and business, without in any manner retaining his equity to have the partnership creditors paid out of such assets, he waives his equity in that regard, but is perfectly consistent with it. If the agreement was express that the debts shall be paid out of the assets, then the equity is retained by express contract; if the circumstances of the transaction show that the contemplation of the parties was that the debts should be so paid, then the equity is retained by implied agreement; and the assets are, in the administration of the affairs of the purchaser in insolvency, as effectually impressed with a trust in favor of the vendor, and, through him, the creditors of the old partnership, in the one case as in the other. The circumstances involved in these appeals point unerringly to the conclusion that it was the intention of J. D. Putnam, J. B. Goss, and A. J. Goss that the new concern of J. B. Goss & Co. should continue the old business with the same assets, for the primary purpose of winding up such business and liquidating the debts theretofore contracted in it out of the old assets, so far as practicable. Hence the court below, sitting as a court of equity in the administration of the affairs of A. J. Goss and J. B. Goss, was warranted in concluding that the property of J. B. Goss is impressed with a trust to carry out the intention of all the parties concerned in the dissolution of the old firm and formation of the new concern of J. B. Goss & Co., that the debts of the old firm should be assumed by the new concern, and be paid out of the property turned over to it and the operations of the business, so far as this can be done with due regard to the equities of the creditors who trusted such new concern.

On the subject of whether the two sets of creditors—those of the old firm of J. D. Putnam & Co., and those of the ostensible firm of J. B. Goss & Co.—can all prove in the insolvency proceedings of J. B. Goss, though that subject need not be decided here, we cite Ex parte Chuck (Re Starkey & Whiteside), 8 Bing. 469, an early English case which covers the subject; and, so far as we are able to find, it has never been criticised or overruled. The facts were that S. & S. had been doing business for some time as copartners, and were, as such, indebted to various persons. They took in W., and thereafter the business was conducted by S., S. & W., as copartners. The new firm became bankrupt, and there were creditors of both the old and the new firm as well. The court held substantially as follows: "We are of the opinion that the creditors of S. & S. and those of S., S. & W. should be admitted to prove pari passu upon the joint assets of the new firm." To the same effect is Re Frow, Jacobs, & Co.'s Estate, 78 Pa. 459. Foresman sold out his interest in an existing firm having creditors, to the remaining members, who agreed to pay the debts. The vendees continued business as a firm with the same assets for a time, and finally made an assignment for the benefit of creditors. Held, that the two sets of creditors—those of the old firm and those of the new firm—might prove pari passu against the assets of the new firm; that Frow, Jacobs, & Co. were liable for the debts as partners in the firm of Foresman & Co., which they took upon themselves when Foresman retired from the firm and they continued the business. When Foresman sold out, the purchasers intended to continue the business. They took all the assets, and assumed the debts. The assets became the capital of the new firm, and the old debts became its debts. Under these facts, the court readily reached the conclusion that the creditors of the old and of the new firm should stand on an equal footing in the settlement of the new firm in bankruptcy. To the same effect are, Re Dawson, 59 Hun. 389; Shedd v. Bank of Brattleboro, 82 Vt. 709; Filley v. Phelps, 18 Conn. 294; and Wright v. Carman, 47 N. Y. S. R. 126. Held, in the latter case, and in Re Frow, Jacobs, & Co.'s Estate, supra, and Re Dawson, supra, that the debts of the old became, by reason of the facts, the debts of the new firm. To the same effect is Peyser v. Myers, 185 N. Y. 599, where it is distinctly held that if there is a change in the personnel of an insolvent firm, and it subsequently makes an assignment for the benefit of creditors,—there being an agreement, express or implied, at the time of the change, that the new firm shall assume and pay the old debts,—the equity of the old creditors is equal to that of the new. There was no express agreement in that case, but the court held that there was an implied agreement.

This effectually disposes of all the questions presented, and leads to the conclusion that neither of the appellants can prove pari passu with the individual creditors of A. J. Goss in his assignment, but they can both prove pari passu with all the creditors of the ostensible firm of J. B. Goss & Co. in the assignment of J. B. Goss.

This opinion has been quite lengthy, but it may be well justified from the importance of the questions involved. In reaching the conclusion arrived at by the majority of the court, we resort to cases merely to determine what well-defined principles have been established applicable to the facts of the appeals before us. Having come to a satisfactory conclusion in that regard, we endeavor to broadly apply them so as to satisfy effectually the ends of justice, which are obviously the legitimate ends for which such principles have been worked out in the growth of equity jurisprudence. By so doing, the assets of J. B. Goss, held and used by him as those of the ostensible firm of J. B. Goss & A. J. Goss, will be marshaled and administered along definite lines, without confusion or uncertainty as to the rights of the various sets of creditors and parties interested.

In order, now, that the principles of equity jurisprudence here applied may definitely appear, we recapitulate as follows:

1. In the administration of the affairs of a partnership and of the individual members thereof, the fixed rule must be applied that joint estate goes first to joint creditors, and separate estate to separate creditors, with the exception that where there are no partnership assets, and there is no living solvent partner, partnership creditors may prove with the separate creditors of a partner in the settlement of his estate pari passu.

2. Partnership creditors have no "lien," strictly so called, on partnership assets, but must work out their preference over the creditors of the individual members of the partnership through the equities of such members.

3. If one of a partnership sells out, bona fide, his interest to his copartner or to another, without in any way retaining his equity to have the partnership creditors paid out of the assets, the property is converted into the individual property of the purchaser, free from all the equities of the seller, even if the purchaser, as the consideration for such purchase, agrees to pay the firm debts; otherwise, if the purchaser agrees expressly or impliedly to apply the assets to such purpose.

4. The word "assets," used in No. 1, is not confined to assets at law, but includes all assets applicable to the payment of the partnership debts, under the well-defined principles for the administration of the affairs of insolvent partnerships under the direction of a court of equity.

5. Those who deal with persons representing themselves to creditors generally as partners in a certain business are entitled to have the property used in such business applied to the payment of the debts incurred in such business, in preference to the individual debts of the members of the partnership, and the ostensible member of such partnership is likewise entitled to have the assets of the ostensible firm so applied.

6. If a member of an insolvent firm sells out with the understanding that the business is to be continued with the same assets, and the purchaser or purchasers, as consideration for the sale, are to assume and pay the old debts, and the circumstances are such as to evidence the fact that the purpose of the transaction is to pay the old firm debts, and to wind up the old partnership concern, by the payment of the debts of such concern out of the partnership assets and a continuation of the business, the court is warranted in concluding that the equity of the outgoing partner to have the assets of the firm applied to the payment of the firm debts is not changed, and that the right of the creditor to enforce it continues.

7. If one of the members of an insolvent firm sells out his interest to an outside party or to his associates, and thereby a new firm is formed, which assumes the debts of the old firm, the intention of all the parties being that the new firm shall continue the business in substantially the same way, with substantially the same assets, and that the old debts shall be paid out of such business, and such new firm subsequently makes an assignment for the benefit of creditors, in the administration of the assignment the creditors of the old and the new firm may prove their claims pari passu, and be preferred over individual creditors of the members of such new firm.

The orders appealed from are affirmed, and the causes remanded for further proceedings according to law.

THAYER v. HUMPHREY.

Newman, J., dissenting:

Lottie Thayer was a creditor, for money lent, of the milling copartnership of J. D. Putnam & Co. The firm comprised J. D. Putnam and Alfred J. Goss. It was afterwards dissolved by mutual consent. The business was thenceforward carried on, at the same place, under the name of J. B. Goss & Co., who assumed all the debts of J. D. Putnam & Co. The firm property of J. D. Putnam & Co. was conveyed to James B.

Goss, who alone carried on the business under the name of J. B. Goss & Co. Thayer took the note of J. B. Goss & Co. for her claim against J. D. Putnam & Co., and surrendered the old note. She afterwards recovered a judgment on her new note, against James B. Goss and Alfred J. Goss, in form joint and several. The trial court found that Alfred J. Goss was not a partner with James B. Goss in the firm of J. B. Goss & Co., but that he was liable to Thayer by reason of his being held out to her as a partner. Both Alfred J. Goss and James B. Goss are insolvent, and have made assignments for the benefit of their creditors. Alfred J. Goss assigned to H. L. Humphrey, the respondent; James B. Goss, to one Weld. The assignment of James B. Goss includes all that remains of the property which was received of J. D. Putnam & Co. No mention is made in either assignment of partnership property. J. D. Putnam, also, is insolvent. Thayer filed her claim, based on her judgment, with the respondent. It is stipulated that her original claim has become merged in this judgment. The respondent filed objections to the claim. The court held that she must first go against the partnership assets, and could not go against the individual assets of Alfred J. Goss until his separate creditors were paid. From this order Thayer appeals.

The rule is fully settled, in the administration of the estates of insolvents, that the partnership debts are primarily payable out of the partnership assets, and are entitled to a preference over the individual debts of the insolvent; and so, in the reverse case, the individual debts are primarily payable out of the individual assets of the insolvent, and possess a like preference. The surplus only, after satisfying such priorities, can be reached by the other class of debts. For this purpose the joint estate and the separate estate of the insolvent constitute separate funds, to be administered separately. Story, Partn. 7th ed. § 376; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1202, and cases cited in note 1; T. Parsons, Partn. 4th ed. § 383; note to McDulloh v. Dashiell, 18 Am. Dec. 271; Murphy v. Neill, 49 U. S. 8 How. 414, 12 L. ed. 1185; Curtis v. Woodward, 58 Wis. 499, 46 Am. Rep. 647. There are certain exceptions to this rule, which go to prove and ascertain it. One such exception, which is as well settled as the rule itself, is the case where there are no partnership assets to be administered, and no living solvent partner. Where there are no partnership assets to be administered, and no living solvent partner, then the joint creditor is entitled to share pari passu with the individual creditors of the separate estate. Story, Partn. 7th ed. § 378; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1205, and cases cited in note 4; Curtis v. Woodward, supra; T. Parsons, Partn. 4th ed. § 384, note 1.

In the instant case there was, in fact, no partnership. There are no partnership assets. There is no living solvent partner. The case seems to come clearly within the exceptions to the rule as above stated. There was no partnership. The trial court so decided, and that is conclusive here. The fact that there was no partnership is absolute proof that there are no partnership assets. It is undisputed that J. D. Putnam, Alfred J. Goss, and James B. Goss, all the debtors involved in the controversy, are all and each insolvent. J. D. Putnam conveyed all his interest in the partnership property of J. D. Putnam & Co., in November, 1891, to Alfred J. Goss. Alfred J. Goss conveyed the entire property to James B. Goss. James B. Goss assigned the entire property for the benefit of his creditors. Alfred J. Goss has assigned all his property for the benefit of his creditors. There is absolutely no property in existence which any one claims to be partnership assets of James B. Goss and Alfred J. Goss. To require the petitioner to pursue for her remedy any such supposititious partnership assets is to mock her with the delusive promise of a remedy which must inevitably disappoint the expectation which it fosters.

The circumstances that the property which James B. Goss assigned for the benefit of his creditors is in part, the same property which was once the firm property of J. D. Putnam & Co., is of no significance. No equity of the creditors of J. D. Putnam & Co. followed this property into the hands of James B. Goss. There is no hint of bad faith in the transfer, or that it was made in contemplation of insolvency. The rights of creditors in the assets of a partnership must be worked out through the equities of the partners. If the partner has no right, the creditor has none. The right of the partners is, in effect, a right to share in the surplus left after discharging all the firm debts. Each partner has the right to require all the firm assets to be applied to the payment of the firm debts; for so, only, can his liability in solido for them be diminished. But this right of a partner is property which can be sold and transferred. It is effectually sold and transferred by a sale and transfer, in good faith, of all his interest in the firm property, whether to his partner or to a stranger. Such a sale and transfer dissolves the partnership, and extinguishes every right which the retiring partner had in the firm property, including the right to require it to be applied to the payment of firm debts, unless such right is preserved by the terms of the sale. is a personal contract only, and leaves the retiring partner in the condition of an unsecured creditor. Bates, Partn. § 528; Story, Partn. 7th ed. 559; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 975; Robb v. Mudge, supra. Such sales of a partner's interest in firm property are presumed to be valid. Kimball v. Thompson, 18 Met. 283. The authorities are nearly uniform. Only a few cases are out of line.

These considerations seem to show sufficiently that there are no joint assets of Alfred J. Goss and James B. Goss, and so that the petitioner has the right to go against the individual assets of either in the hands of their respective assignees. The case properly ends here. This covers all the issues tried and on which there was evidence. Whatever else is decided is in the absence of necessary parties, and is based upon inference and conjecture, instead of evidence. The property which the court says is subject to the petitioner's claim, as the joint property of the two Gosses, is now actually in the possession of the assignee of James B. Goss for the benefit of his individual creditors. It is held for them, and is claimed by them. But they have not been represented in this proceeding, nor their rights investigated. No opinion of their rights, volunteered in their absence, is binding on them. When the petitioner presents her claim for proof against these assets, she meets a fresh contest with these new creditors. And it may not be so easy to put them down, being present, as when they are absent. It is easy to put the absent in the wrong. Les absents ont toujours tort. Whether she has a remedy against those assets can only be known at the end of that contest.

It may be true—it is not necessary to question it—that Alfred J. Goss is estopped, as against this petitioner, to deny that he was a partner with James B. Goss, and that there were, in fact, partnership assets. But this does not aid the petitioner, nor bring her nearer to a remedy against these assets, until it is also established that James B. Goss and his individual creditors are bound by a like estoppel. That cannot be established in this proceeding, because neither the necessary parties are before the court, nor the evidence by which it is to be established. And there is great danger of doing the petitioner an irreparable wrong if, with so little knowledge of the actual situation, her remedy is limited by the court to those assets; for, at the best, it is but a desperate chance. It is said that James B. Goss is also estopped to deny the alleged partnership and the joint ownership of the property used in it. But the court has not listened yet to James B. Goss's side of that question. It is assumed, without proof, that he permitted Alfred J. Goss to hold himself out as a partner, and the property and business as partnership property and business. Certainly, the other side of this question should have an opportunity to be heard before any person's rights should be limited or destroyed by a decision of it. In truth, it is neither alleged nor shown—as, indeed, it could not well be, in the absence of proper parties—that James B. Goss did in fact hold out Alfred J. Goss as a partner, or as having an interest in the property or business; while it does appear that he conducted the business alone, and had the sole ostensible possession of the property and business, while Alfred J. Goss lived in another city, miles away, and had no apparent connection with the business. Apparently the principal part, if not all, of the ostensible property used by James B. Goss in conduct of the business, was the mill itself. It may be a question of some difficulty whether the bare occupation of the mill for the purpose of carrying on the business, without a positive representation of ownership, could estop any person to claim ownership of it according to the true recorded title. Mere occupation of real estate, by carrying on a business in it, must create a very slight, if any, presumption that the occupant is the owner; for, perhaps, a majority of the business of the country is carried on in rented premises. It has not been claimed before, so far as known, that the mere occupancy of real estate by a business created any presumption against its owner that he was a partner to the business being carried on in his property; and no case has been found which holds that the mere occupancy of real estate by a business creates any estoppel against the owner to claim his own.

But it is not very important whether James B. Goss shall, when the question is presented, be held to be estopped or not. A much more important question will be whether his individual creditors are estopped from claiming that these assets, which are in the hands of his assignee for their benefit, were really his individual assets. No one questions that they were his individual assets in law, and they are his individual assets in equity, unless these individual creditors are estopped to claim them as such. Now, there really is no evidence in the case which shows the nature of these debts to the individual creditors of James B. Goss. It seems to be assumed by the majority that they were all debts contracted to persons who gave credit to an ostensible partnership; while, in truth, there is no evidence on the subject. There is nothing to show that these debts are not all due to persons who dealt with him, in good faith, relying upon his apparent sole responsibility, from the possession of this property, and his sole conduct of the business. Nor does it appear whether these debts were contracted in the milling business, or whether they were the misfortunes of independent enterprises. In this condition of the case, it certainly cannot be prudent to decide this question of which set of creditors have the superior equity to these assets. It is sufficient to decide such questions as have been tried before the trial court, between the parties who were before the court, and which are before this court upon the appeal. If there are bona fide individual creditors, they may not be estopped to claim according to the true legal title of the assets, although their debtor be so estopped. Bates, Partn. § 105, and cases cited in note 1, p. 123.

The case really made shows that there are no joint assets, practically available to the petitioner. If there are any, they are desperate and nominal only. It is not equity to relegate the petitioner to them for her only remedy, for it is not expected that there will be a surplus in either separate estate after the individual creditors are paid. It is a forlorn hope. She should be permitted to share pari passu with the individual creditors of Alfred J. Goss.

DAVIES v. HUMPHREY.

Newman, J., dissenting :

This case arises out of the same failures and assignments as Thayer v. Humphrey, but in some of its circumstances differs from that case. The appellant was also a creditor of J. D. Putnam & Co., but he did not accept of J. B. Goss & Co. as a substitute for his original debtor. So he is not a creditor of either James B. Goss or J. B. Goss & Co.; and neither are in any way liable for his claim. The appellant seeks to prove his claim against the estate of Alfred J. Goss, in the hands of his assignee for the benefit of his creditors. It is answered to his application: "Your remedy is against the assets of James B. Goss, which are in the hands of his assignee for the benefit of his creditors." And so he is turned away. It is not claimed that there are any firm assets of J. D. Putnam & Co. in existence, nor that either partner is solvent, nor that the transfer to J. B. Goss & Co. did not pass the legal title to all the assets of J. D. Putnam & Co. to J. B. Goss & Co. But it is held that the right of the partners to have these assets applied first to the payment of the debts of the firm was reserved by the terms and conditions of the transfer. This is believed to be without a shadow of foundation in fact. It is put upon the ground that the transaction was for the purpose of applying the assets of the firm to the payment of its debts; and this in the teeth of all the evidence. The firm of J. D. Putnam & Co. was composed of J. D. Putnam and Alfred J. Goss. Both partners signed and published a notice of the dissolution of the firm, in which the public was notified that the same business would be continued by J. B. Goss & Co., who assumed all the debts of the firm; and the same business was, in fact, carried on at the same place, by J. B. Goss & Co., for two years and upward. It does not seem necessary to say that the intent to have the business carried on with the same property is incompatible with the purpose to have the property applied to the payment of the debts. The greater part of the property received by J. B. Goss & Co. was the gristmill itself. J. B. Goss & Co. got nothing of value for the promise to pay the debts of the old firm, unless they got the right to carry on the business with the property received from the old firm. The real intention of the transaction is obvious. It was to make a novation of the debts of the old firm,—to substitute a new debtor in place of the old one. This was not altogether effected, because some of the old creditors did not consent to the substitution. If the purpose was to apply the firm property to the payment of firm debts, the obvious way to make the purpose effectual was to make an assignment of it for the benefit of the firm's creditors. It seems that this clearly was the ordinary case of a transfer of the firm's assets for the purpose of a novation. In such a case all are agreed that the partners of the old firm lose their equity to have the assets transferred applied to the payment of the firm debts.

This case, too, is decided in the absence of parties and evidence necessary to its final disposition. The other side is not heard, as it must be before it can be bound by the decision. Non constat that, when these parties and their evidence are heard, J. D. Putnam & Co. will be found estopped, as against the creditors of J. B. Goss & Co., from claiming any right in this property of which they have held out J. B. Goss & Co. to be the owners.

The appellant, on the case as it now appears, should be admitted to share pari passu with the individual creditors of Alfred J. Goss, on the authorities cited in the dissenting opinion in Thayer v. Humphrey.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

LITTLE ROCK & FORT SMITH RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Thomas H. WELLS.

(.....Ark.....)

1. An injunction against enforcing a judgment at law will be granted where the death of the trial judge soon after the trial prevented the perfection of an appeal and the record shows that the judgment is without evidence to support it.

2. Persons are incompetent as jurors in a suit against a railroad company to recover the penalty for an overcharge for passenger carriage who only a short time before had brought similar actions against the same defend-

NOTE.—Injunctions against judgments for matters arising subsequently to their rendition.

I. Lack of remedy by appeal or new trial.

- a. By mistake.
- b. By act of court or officer.
- c. Other cases of defective record.
- d. By negligence.

II. Lost or destroyed record.

III. For fraud.

IV. For alteration of record.

V. Judgments set aside, reversed, or superseded.

VI. For payment or satisfaction.

VII. In behalf of surety.

VIII. For set-off.

IX. For newly discovered evidence.

The case of LITTLE ROCK & Ft. S. R. Co. v. WELLS, which holds that where an appeal is prevented by the death of the trial judge, preventing the bill of exceptions from being completed, and the defendant is not guilty of negligence, and the judgment is unjust, and there is no remedy at law, an injunction will be granted,—is in accord with the well-established principles of equity, and is fully sustained by the authorities.

I. Lack of remedy by appeal or new trial.

a. By mistake.

Where an appeal is prevented by reason of mistake of the officer in preparing a wrong bond, or by reason of the appeal having been taken to the wrong court, owing to the practice at that time, and the defendant is not negligent, and the claim is unjust, an injunction will be granted, although this appears to be on the ground of mistake of law, but is placed on the ground of also being against conscience, or that equity will interpose where no other relief can be had.

Where an appeal was taken, according to the practice at that time, from the marine court to the court of common pleas, and the case reversed, but judgment was not entered because the appellee paid the costs, and it was afterwards decided by the 80 L. R. A.

court of appeals that in such case the appeal should be to the general term of the marine court and therefore the common pleas court had no jurisdiction, acquiescence for nine years will not prevent enjoining the enforcement of the judgment below; and the same will be enjoined where it is erroneous and the complainant was without fault or negligence. Jacobs v. Morange, 1 Day, 623.

Mistake of law as to the remedy of certiorari will authorize an injunction against the judgment where, after its rendition, the supreme court has decided that the act in regard to certiorari is unconstitutional. Cobbs v. Coleman, 14 Tex. 594.

Or where by mistake of law the court refused to entertain jurisdiction by certiorari. Connell v. Stetson, 33 Iowa, 147.

Irregularities of a justice in certifying an appeal, or in the clerk in taking the appeal bond, will authorize an injunction against the judgment, although defense is made at law, where equity and law have concurrent jurisdiction. The defense of usury was made in the justice's court, and usually where a defense is made an injunction will not be granted, but by the statute the defense of usury may be made either at law or in equity, and there being other equitable grounds in this case, the right of the complainant to an injunction on the ground of usury, and that he has been deprived of his defense, entitles to relief. Case v. Davis, 5 T. B. Mon. 393.

And mistake in dating a bill of exceptions, preventing a review, will be relieved against in equity where there is merit, and to prevent injustice. Kohn v. Lovett, 48 Ga. 179.

Or where the clerk incorrectly inserted parts of two cases in the record. Collier v. Easton, 2 Mo. 145.

Where an appeal is prevented by mistake of the clerk in taking an improper bond, and the party prejudiced has a good defense to the action, the judgment will be enjoined, since although the mistake was one of law, yet it would be also against conscience to enforce the judgment. Saunders v. Jennings, 2 J. J. Marsh. 513; Oliver v. Pray, 4 Ohio, 177, 19 Am. Dec. 600.

ant for overcharges on the same section of track, so that the two cases involve the same issues.

(November 30, 1893.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Crawford County in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment because of defendant's inability to appeal therefrom by reason of the death of the trial judge before the perfection of the appeal. Reversed.

Statement by Riddick, J.:

In this case we have another application to a court of equity to grant relief against a judg-

And where an appeal was entered in the wrong place on the docket, and the defendant's attorney, unable to find the case, left an appearance to be filed if the case should be docketed, an injunction was granted. The case does not show that a valid defense to the action was shown or required. Seymour v. Miller, 33 Conn. 402.

But errors of the supreme court in overlooking or mistaking material facts in the record will not authorize an injunction against a writ of possession in ejectment, the remedy being by a petition for a rehearing. Russell v. Slaton, 38 Ga. 195.

And a mistake in a bill of exceptions will not be ground for enjoining prosecution of a writ of error where there is no charge of fraud. Ford v. Weir, 24 Miss. 563.

For appeal prevented by fraud, see infra, III.

b. By act of court or officer.

If the appeal is prevented by the action of the court in rendering judgment in such a manner or time that the complainant cannot perfect his appeal, and he has a meritorious defense against the judgment, and is not negligent, and there is no other remedy, an injunction will be granted. And injunctions have sometimes been granted although there were other remedies.

Where defense and appeal were prevented by the magistrate stating in writing that the suit was dismissed, an injunction was granted. Austin v. Carpenter, 2 G. Greene, 131; Wagner v. Shank, 59 Md. 312.

So, where the judgments were fraudulent and iniquitous, showing 1,296 judgments and $2,848 costs, and were void, and the complainant was not in fault. Wagner v. Shank, supra.

Where a court erroneously excluded a defense of set-off, and refused to sign a bill of exceptions, so that there was no remedy by appeal, an injunction was granted on the ground that the judgment was against conscience. Picket v. Morris, 3 Wash. (Va.) 225.

So, where the justice wrote that the case was transferred to another township, and the justice set aside the judgment, and then without notice vacated this order of setting aside, and time for appeal expired before complainant had knowledge, an injunction was granted on the ground of fraud, even though there was a remedy by certiorari. Merriman v. Walton, 105 Cal. 403.

And an appeal prevented by delay in entering judgment, dating it as entered within the statutory time, but it being in fact subsequently entered without notice to the defendant, will authorize enjoining the execution, there being no remedy at law. Patterson v. Naehr, 6 N. Y. Supp. 512.

Where a motion for a new trial was continued by consent, to an adjourned term, which was never held on account of an accident, an injunction was granted to restrain the execution of the judgment on the ground of accident or mistake. Harkey v. Tillman, 40 Ark. 551.

So, where a motion for new trial was continued by the court to the next term and then overruled, and the appeal was dismissed because the circuit court had no power over the motion after the lapse of the term, an injunction was granted where the defense was meritorious, and the continuance was without complainant's application by which he lost the appeal. Valentine v. Holland, 40 Ark. 333.

And the sudden dispersion of the justices composing the court, preventing a motion for a new trial which should have been granted for excessive damages, is ground for enjoining the judgment. Knifong v. Hendricks, 3 Gratt. 212, 44 Am. Dec. 385.

And where a motion for new trial was prevented by the sudden sickness of the judge, and the defendant was not negligent and had a meritorious cause of action, an injunction was granted holding that Gantt's (Ark.) Dig. §§ 3596-4002, providing for granting new trials after the term, do not apply. Leigh v. Armor, 35 Ark. 123.

So, where a motion for a new trial was prevented by failure of the court to be present. Foushee v. Lea, 4 Call. (Va.) 279.

But adjournment of the court before a motion for a new trial could be disposed of will not authorize an injunction, unless the judgment is against conscience. Whitehill v. Butler, 51 Ark. 342; Johnson v. Branch, 48 Ark. 535.

And an injunction will not be granted on the ground that a motion for new trial based on technical errors has been prevented by an accident, where the judgment is not shown to be unjust. Whitehill v. Butler, 51 Ark. 341.

And it cannot be granted by a co-ordinate court in such a case. Chipman v. Hibbard, 8 Cal. 238.

So, an injunction will not be granted against a judgment, where proceedings on appeal were prevented by premature adjournment of the court, where it is not shown that the trial should have resulted differently. Ratto v. Levy Bros. 63 Tex. 273.

And an appeal barred by the resignation of the justice before the time for perfecting an appeal had expired will not authorize an injunction against the judgment on the ground of accident, where no merit or equitable showing is made. Galbraith v. Barnard, 21 Or. 67.

And an injunction will not be granted on the ground that the justice of the peace left the country after judgment, thereby preventing an appeal, where it is not shown that the complainant did not know of his intended departure in time to utilize two days before he left, and a valid defense to the action was not shown. Smith v. D'Lashmunt, 4 Mo. 103. See also Galbraith v. Barnard, infra.

So, the failure of the judge to make out and file a statement of facts upon which proceedings in error are to be taken, thereby preventing a review of the case, will not be ground for injunction where a meritorious defense to the action is not shown. Overton v. Blum, 50 Tex. 417.

And the failure of the justice to enter a formal judgment on a verdict from which an appeal was taken will not authorize an injunction against the judgment on appeal, where no defense to the action is shown, as under Wagner's (Mo.) Stat. 1080, § 10, the injunction releases the technical errors in the proceedings. Hazeltine v. Reusch, 51 Mo. 50.

And in Wiley v. Southerland, 41 Ill. 25, an injunction was refused against a judgment of a justice who had entered the same after the time required by statute, thereby preventing an appeal, where that did not appear of record, as the record of the justice could not be impeached by parol evidence that he had made oral statements contradicting his record.

And the failure or refusal of a justice to approve an appeal bond will not authorize an injunction against the levy of the execution, where there is ment at law. The action at law was brought by Thomas H. Wells against the appellant railway company for the purpose of collecting a penalty for overcharges alleged to have been made by the railway company for the carriage of said Wells as a passenger on its trains, between the stations of Van Buren and Dyer, and Alma and Dyer. He alleged that on four different trips an overcharge of about 5 cents was made on each trip. The verdict was in favor of plaintiff, and the penalties assessed for the four overcharges amounted to $700, of which amount $300 was remitted by the plaintiff. A motion for new trial was filed and a remedy by mandamus, and the complainant does not show that he has a valid defense to the original action. Boyd v. Weaver, 134 Ind. 266. See also supra, I. a, and infra, I. c, d.

c. Other cases of defective record.

An injunction will not be granted against a judgment, on the ground that the answer filed was lost, and that there was no remedy by appeal, where a good and valid defense is not disclosed. Chinn v. First Municipality, 1 Rob. (La.) 523.

And where the original papers have been lost by fire, and appeal has been prevented, the execution of a judgment may be enjoined, but not where complainant has been negligent and could have perfected his appeal long prior to the fire, and material error in the judgment is not shown. Bailey v. Stevens (Utah) 39 Pac. Rep. 823.

So, negligence in failing to supply a lost record and perfect an appeal will prevent an injunction against proceedings on the judgment and execution. Palmer v. Gardiner, 77 Ill. 143.

And in State v. Judge of Dist. Ct. 13 La. 542, it was held that the loss of the petition and bond for appeal duly filed will not authorize an injunction against proceedings on the judgment as the party injured should have prepared a new bond.

For lost record, see also infra, II.

For bill of exceptions, see also supra, I. b, and infra, I. d.

d. By negligence.

The negligence of complainant in perfecting his appeal will prevent obtaining relief by injunction.

As, where one of the defendants was sent to enter an appeal within the time, but the clerk supposed that it was an injunction bond which was desired to be executed, and, not being familiar with the form, requested the defendant to return home and send it afterwards, stating that that would be all sufficient, and the defendant, being ignorant of the necessity of entering an appeal at that time, failed to do so, which was unknown to the other complainants until the time for entering an appeal had elapsed, an injunction was refused. Robbins v. Mount, 3 Ga. 74.

So, not taking an appeal during the first eighteen days will bar relief in equity against the judgment rendered by a justice of the peace, where he resigned at that time, and the thirty days given by statute were thus cut off, where no special equity is shown, and no showing is made that the judgment is unfair. Galbraith v. Barnard, 21 Or. 67. See also Smith v. D'Lashmutt, 4 Mo. 103.

Or, delay in procuring the signature to a bill of exceptions until it is too late. Ruppertsberger v. Clark, 53 Md. 402.

Or failure to have a mistake in the date of the bill of exceptions corrected so as to prosecute proceedings in error. Smith v. Fouché, 55 Ga. 120.

And that judgment was entered after court had adjourned, and defendant was prevented from making out a bill of exceptions or appealing, will not entitle complainant to an injunction, where a showing is not made that a defense which is good was made at that trial, or no excuse for not making it was given. Buntain v. Blackburn, 27 Ill. 403.

So, the failure of complainant or his counsel to see that the record was correct for the supreme court prevented an injunction against proceedings on a judgment that was affirmed in the supreme court. Augusta Mut. L. Asso. v. Andrew, 68 Ga. 490.

And negligence in not taking proper steps to secure an appeal or proceedings in error or bill of exceptions will prevent an injunction against a judgment. Bowman v. Field, 11 Mo. App. 564; Balance v. Loomis, 22 Ill. 82; Watt v. Cobb, 38 Ala. 530; Miller v. Bernecker, 46 Mo. 194.

And the same was held where the judgment was not shown to be unjust or erroneous. Dobbs v. St. Joseph F. & M. Ins. Co. 72 Mo. 189.

And in Morgan's Appeal, 110 Pa. 271, the same was said to be the rule. See also supra, I. a, b, and infra, II.

II. Lost or destroyed record.

See also supra, I. c, Other cases of defective record.

When the record of a judgment was destroyed by fire, and was restored by order of court without notice to the defendant, an injunction will not be granted, on the ground that such order and the execution issued thereon was void, in the absence of proof showing that such record was not the true one. Fulmer v. Little, 69 Ill. 229.

The destruction or loss by accident or casualty of a decree of a probate court ordering a sale will not entitle a party to an injunction against the judgment for purchase money, as he may have his title perfected in chancery. Garrett v. Lynch, 45 Ala. 204.

The discovery, after the trial, of the record of a justice's court that was lost, will not entitle an injunction against the judgment in a case where such record was desired, if it would not have availed. Beadle v. Graham, 65 Ala. 102.

But in Cyrus v. Hicks, 20 Tex. 453, it was held that an injunction will be granted against an execution where the record of the judgment has been lost or destroyed, but the defendant in the equity suit may have the record renewed.

III. For fraud.

While fraud in preventing an appeal or the use of the judgment will generally be regarded as peculiarly within the province of a court of equity to grant relief, it will not be granted unless there is no adequate remedy at law.

So, an appeal prevented by agreement for settlement will not authorize an injunction against the judgment attempted to be enforced in violation of the agreement where there is adequate remedy in the supreme court to obtain relief at law by motion to set aside the affirmation. Roebeling Sons Co. v. Stevens Electric Co. 63 Ala. 39.

And the fraudulent retention of papers by opposing attorneys preventing a bill of exception will not authorize an injunction against proceedings on the judgment, where the remedy of rule to file them in court is adequate. Smith v. Brownson, 19 La. 313.

And for withholding the record to prevent review the remedy is not by injunction against the judgment, but by petition in error, and the court will take jurisdiction as if the record had been filed in time. Muse v. Wafer, 29 Kan. 279.

A sale under execution will not be enjoined on the ground that plaintiff therein in violation of an agreement to stay the execution for one year, and in fraud of plaintiff's rights, issued an execution before that time, where the plaintiff in this case made no showing in the trial court, or motion to overruled, and sixty days allowed to file bill of exceptions. The death of the presiding judge, which happened shortly afterwards, and before the bill of exceptions was signed, prevented the appeal from being taken. The appellant then brought his suit in equity. The cause was submitted to the chancellor upon the pleadings, exhibits, and agreed statement of facts. The evidence at the trial at law had been taken down by a stenographer; and a bill of exceptions prepared by counsel, containing that evidence, was by consent read as evidence in the equity suit; it being agreed by counsel for the respective parties that it was "correct in set aside the execution, or stay of process. Moulton v. Kuapp, 85 Cal. 385, 88 Cal. 446.

And the promise by a sheriff to delay a sale under execution, but not for any definite time, while the sale was in progress, and an injunction bond is being prepared, will not authorize setting aside the sale where the sheriff had other executions in his hands, and delayed the sale of this piece until the last, and then sold the equity of redemption under execution, and the property was insufficient to satisfy the mortgage. Pell v. Lander, 8 B. Mon. 554.

The issue of an execution before the expiration of a certain agreed time during which it could be paid in town orders will not authorize an injunction against the same, where no tender of town orders was made within that time. Anamosa v. Wurzbacher, 37 Iowa, 25.

The fraudulent withdrawing of a deposit after judgment, on which deposit a judgment for specific performance was obtained, will entitle an injunction against the judgment. Hutchins v. Lockett, 30 Tex. 165.

But where a decree was vacated, and the order was not recorded because the minutes on the docket were erased by some one without authority, the decree may be enjoined as procured by fraud, where the complainant has not been guilty of negligence. Gillett v. Booth, 6 Ill. App. 423. See also infra, IV.

IV. For alteration of record.

The fraudulent alteration of the record of a judgment entitles an injunction against the same. Smith v. Chandler, 13 Ind. 513; Byars v. Justin, 2 Tex. Civ. App. Cas. (Wilson) 686.

And in Cromelin v. McCauley, 67 Ala. 542, it was said that in order to enjoin a judgment or decree on the ground of fraud, it must have been procured by fraud either in its original rendition, or by a subsequent fraudulent alteration, and this must be shown to be actual and positive.

A third party may enjoin the levy and sale of his personal and real property on a judgment, which has been altered by the clerk, and enlarged so as to render it void, and this on the ground of fraud. Hardy v. Broadus, 35 Tex. 668.

So, where levy was made sufficient to satisfy the debt, and the execution was returned, and then the record fraudulently altered, and the amount of the judgment increased, without consent of the debtor, and a second execution issued thereon,—an injunction will be granted on the ground of fraud. Babcock v. McCamant, 53 Ill. 214.

V. Judgments set aside, reversed, or superseded.

An injunction will be granted where the judgment has been set aside, reversed, or superseded, if there is no adequate remedy at law, and the complainant has not been guilty of negligence.

Where the sheriff is proceeding to enforce a levy and sale, in defiance of the judgment of the court of law dismissing the levy and case, an injunction will be granted against the sale. Scogin v. Beall, 50 Ga. 88.

And an injunction will be granted to restrain proceedings upon a judgment recovered upon a judgment in another state, where such judgment of the foreign court has been reversed and complainant has not been negligent. McJilton v. Love, 13 Ill. 486.

So, negligence of the clerk of court in failing to set aside a judgment as directed will authorize an injunction against the same. Mayo v. Bentley, 4 Cal. (Va.) 523.

And vacating a joint judgment at the instance of one of the defendants will entitle the others to an injunction against enforcing the first judgment against them, where it was understood that the defense made by the party setting such judgment aside was for the benefit of all. Miller v. Longacre, 26 Ohio St. 291.

And an injunction will be granted against proceedings on a judgment that has been vacated. Rickets v. Hitchens, 34 Ind. 348; Olson v. Nunnally, 47 Kan. 391; Marsh v. Prosser, 64 Ind. 236.

Or superseded. Burge v. Burns, Morris (Iowa) 287. Or enjoined. Patterson v. Gordon, 3 Tenn. Ch. 18. But an injunction will not be granted where there is ample remedy at law. Faba v. Roberts, 54 Ill. 192; Scanland v. Mixer, 34 Ark. 354.

And a purchaser of a title in a judgment for possession, after another judgment had been reversed, which affected the title of the successful party in the judgment for possession, cannot have the latter enjoined, as the remedy at law by bill of review given by statute to his grantor does not enure to him, since he is a stranger to the same, but he takes the title subject to all the equities. Ross v. Banta (Ind.) 84 N. E. 865, 89 N. E. 732.

Sureties on an injunction bond cannot have the judgment thereon enjoined, although the judgment in the original action dissolving the injunction was reversed. The pendency of the appeal might, perhaps, in the discretion of the court, have been interposed for stay of proceedings in the second case, but even then, if the court rendered judgment in disregard of the application, that would not make the judgment void and subject to collateral attack. Boos v. Morgan (Ind.) 89 N. E. 919.

And an injunction will not be granted against a sheriff making a sale on an execution which was issued before petition in error, and before the execution of a supersedeas bond, where it is not alleged that the sheriff had any notice of the proceedings in error. Jaedicke v. Patrie, 15 Kan. 237.

VI. For payment or satisfaction.

Generally an injunction will be granted to prevent the enforcement of a judgment or an execution where the debt has been satisfied subsequent to the judgment, or a tender made of the same, and this relief may be obtained by a purchaser of land subject to the judgment. Worden v. Jones (Kan.) 40 Pac. 1071; Greenfield v. Hutton, 1 Baxt. 216; Johnson v. Kitch, 100 Ind. 80; Meyer v. Tully, 46 Cal. 70.

Or where a payment has been made on the judgment and not credited. Newman v. Meek, Smedes & M. Ch. 361; Williams v. Bradbury, 9 Tex. 437.

An injunction against the enforcement of a judgment which has been partly paid will be granted, but only against so much as has been satisfied. Jewell v. Thorn, 6 La. Ann. 95; Perry v. Kearney, 14 La. Ann. 401; Cobb v. Hynes, 4 La. Ann. 150; Woodburn v. Friend, 19 La. 496; Gurley v. Hiteshue, 5 Gill 217.

And a court of chancery may enjoin the enforcement of a decree of the supreme court on the ground of satisfaction since the decree. McClellan v. Crook, 4 Md. Ch. 398.

every particular." The complaint was dismissed for want of equity and an appeal was taken.

And an injunction may be granted, although perhaps relief might have been had in the courts at law. Marsh v. Haywood, 6 Humph. 210.

Under S. C. act March 16, 1783, providing for adjustment of contracts according to a depreciation table of value of currency at the time the contract was made, an injunction was granted against a judgment, on payment according to the act. Hunter v. Boykin, 1 Desauss. Eq. 108.

And a sale of land under a judgment that is paid will be enjoined at the instance of a vendor of the land under covenant of warranty, and which sale would create a cloud on the title of his grantee. Huggins v. White (Tex.) 27 S. W. 1068.

And an assignment by the mortgagee of the mortgage security and bond to a party who purchased the equity of redemption on a personal judgment, on one of the bonds, will be a satisfaction of the mortgage, and any further judgment on the bonds will be enjoined. Tice v. Annin, 2 Johns. Ch. 126.

So, a judgment enforcing a covenant to pay on the mortgage will be enjoined, where the defendants in the injunction suit prevented redemption on repayment by a power of sale which was not bona fide, while still enforcing payment of the debt. Crotty v. Taylor, 8 Manitoba Rep. 188.

And where plaintiff is attempting to enforce the collection of a judgment already satisfied, and the defendant cannot obtain relief by judge's order to stay proceedings, as the judgment is in the justice's court, and the county court had not obtained jurisdiction by the filing of the transcript, and the plaintiff was insolvent, and there is no remedy against the justice or constable because the execution is fair on its face and a judgment regularly obtained, an injunction would be granted to restrain proceedings thereon. Mallory v. Norton, 21 Barb. 424.

And an injunction to restrain execution sale was granted where the decree directing payment had been satisfied, some of the moneys being advanced before the decree in the surrogate's court and some afterwards, and the matters could not be tried in the surrogate's court to secure the moneys to be set off against the defendant's claim. Laney v. Laney, 33 N. Y. S. R. 678.

And where an appeal was abandoned on a judgment being released in consideration of a settlement and payment, the defendant was entitled to an injunction against an execution issued upon such judgment. Wray v. Chandler, 64 Ind. 146.

And a compromise made by a trustee with the owner of a judgment against the cestui que trust will authorize an injunction against proceedings on the judgment in fraud of the compromise. Thomas v. Brashers, 4 T. B. Mon. 66.

And a surety of a debt for which judgment is rendered may have the judgment enjoined where the same was paid by check, and the holder of the check, instead of cashing the same, presented a prior check which had been dishonored on another matter, and obtained the cash on the same. Kallander v. Weidhold, 98 Mich. 517.

Or where the principal defendant in a judgment had turned property over to the plaintiff to be sold and applied upon such judgment, and the plaintiff converted the same to his own use without crediting the judgment. Harrison Mach. Works v. Templeton, 62 Tex. 443.

Where the mortgaged land was sold under execution for the mortgage debt, and the sale was not made subject to the mortgage, the mortgagee was entitled to an injunction against an execution sale for the same debt of other land than that mortgaged, until the debt was credited with the amount realized by prior sale. Lydecker v. Bogert, 38 N. J. Eq. 140.

And where a judgment was obtained against a maker and an indorser, and levied on the property of the maker, and his attorney paid off the judgment, and the levy was released, the indorser is entitled to an injunction against the judgment nominally assigned to the maker's attorney, as the payment released the indorser, and the withdrawal of the levy on the maker's property by his authority also released the indorser. Flagler v. Newcombe, 36 N. Y. S. R. 739.

And an alias execution will be enjoined where a prior one has been satisfied. Beardsley v. Hall, 9 Tex. 112.

And proceedings on a judgment were enjoined where a prior judgment, on which this was obtained, had been paid and satisfied, and a release should have been entered, and the second judgment was obtained without right and without the knowledge of complainant, who settled the first judgment after the second action was begun. Devoll v. Scales, 49 Me. 320.

And an injunction was granted in a similar case against the prosecution of an action for the same claim in another state, which complainant was led to believe would be abandoned on the settlement of the judgment in the state where the injunction was sought. Engel v. Scheuerman, 40 Ga. 208.

And where a judgment on a collateral note was purchased after maturity, and after payment on the note was fraudulently obtained by the payee from the maker, where the equities of the maker against the purchaser are such as to extinguish the debt, its collection will be enjoined. Barhorst v. Armstrong, 43 Fed. Rep. 2.

And a purchaser for value may have a sale and execution enjoined as a cloud upon the title where the judgment was satisfied, and by collusion between the judgment creditor and debtor the entry of satisfaction was vacated. Wheeler v. Alderman, 34 S. C. 533.

And the same was held where the record showed that the execution had been returned satisfied in full at the time of the purchase, although it was subsequently claimed that there was a mistake in the description of the land in the advertisement of sale and execution. Whitehill v. Fauber, 97 Ind. 169.

And the payment of a judgment authorizes a court of equity to remove a cloud on the title, where the defendant had purchased the property on execution sale, although there is a statutory remedy by a motion to supersede an execution on a judgment. Brewer v. Branch Bank, 24 Ala. 439.

And a judgment for a vendor's lien that has been satisfied, but not released, will be enjoined, as it can only be impeached by proof of facts outside the record, and is a cloud on the title. Texas Land & Mortg. Co. v. Worsham, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 245.

An unauthorized assignment, by the attorney for plaintiff, of a judgment to some of the defendants paying the same, who were indorsers, will not authorize them to enforce the same by execution, and the same will be enjoined at the instance of the other defendants. Maxwell v. Owen, 7 Coldw. 680.

And proceedings on a judgment in favor of an assignee will be enjoined where the assignment was by the attorney without authority, although the assignee had paid the judgment at the instance and request of complainant, a defendant in that case who claimed to have prepaid him in full; but complainants will be required to pay their share. Head v. Gervais, Walk. (Miss.) 481, 12 Am. Dec. 577.

And an execution in favor of one who claims to be the assignee of a judgment will be enjoined where he paid the judgment on an agreement to take certain land of which he has possession. But in this case, as the equity of the bill was sworn off in the answer, the temporary injunction was dissolved. Love v. Powell, 67 Tex. 15.

A release to a third person of the right to the land in controversy in an ejectment suit after judgment is not an extinguishment of the right to maintain a bill for an injunction and relief, where the equity transferred is a mere possibility or constructive equitable trust. Dunlap v. Stetson, 4 Mason, 349.

The remission of liability against a collector of militia fines, made after the judgment, authorizes an injunction to that extent against the judgment for the same. Hahn v. Hart, 12 B. Mon. 423.

So, an execution for an attorney's commission on a judgment for a fine will be enjoined where such fine has been remitted by the governor, for a commission is not due if the money is not collected, and injunction is a proper remedy to prevent proceedings on a satisfied judgment. Smith v. State, 26 Tex. App. 49.

The holder of a junior lien is entitled to an injunction against the sale of the property under a senior lien, the judgment for which has been paid, although his lien has not been reduced to a judgment, where the debtor and the holder of the senior lien are fraudulently conspiring to defeat his lien. The remedy would be refused a general creditor. Brigham v. White, 44 Iowa, 877.

Where part of the judgment is paid after the injunction is obtained, it should be made perpetual as to so much as has been paid on the judgment. Tapp v. Beverley, 1 Leigh, 80.

An injunction will be granted more than a year and a day after the judgment, where the attorney had collected the same, and the creditors were absent from the country, and impliedly ratified the collection, and the circumstances exhibited in equity were not set up as a defense at law. Branch v. Burnley, 1 Call. (Va.) 147.

And the payment of a judgment authorizes an injunction against the execution, sued out and indorsed partly for the benefit of another party, as the indorsement for such third party gave him only an equity, and adequate relief could not be had at law. Crawford v. Thurmond, 3 Leigh, 86.

Although a motion to quash the execution might also have secured relief, as adequate relief could not be had at law, where the execution was issued for the benefit of plaintiff's agent. Ibid.

And under a statute allowing debtor stockholders of a bank to pay the debt due the bank with their stock, an injunction should be granted against so much of the judgment as is thus paid. Hodges v. Planters' Bank, 7 Gill & J. 303.

And a surety on a forthcoming bond given for goods levied upon is entitled to an injunction against a judgment on the same where the sheriff accepted the same goods from the defendant in discharge of his body on another execution, under 1 Va. Rev. Code, 298, providing that on the execution of such a bond the goods shall be left with the owner until the day of sale. Lusk v. Ramsay, 8 Munf. 417.

Where the sheriff refused to pay over to a plaintiff in an execution money that he had collected, on the ground that he had an execution against the plaintiff in favor of another party, who obtained an order for the payment of such collection to him, an injunction should be granted against the enforcement of his judgment to that extent, although he afterwards refused to take the money from the sheriff on the ground that it was depreciated currency, but did not restrain the defendants in his rights. Skinner v. Jayne, 24 Miss. 567.

So, an injunction should be granted to restrain proceedings on a judgment or execution where the amount due has been tendered and refused. Bowen v. Clark, 43 Ind. 406; Collier v. Sapp, 49 Ga. 98; Fisher v. Moore, 19 Iowa, 84. See Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Kamman, 119 Ill. 382.

And where plaintiffs and defendants in a foreclosure have a joint interest an injunction will be granted against the sale where a tender of the money has been made with demand to assign the mortgage so as to protect the interest of other parties. Fisher v. Hartman, 165 Pa. 16.

And an execution should be enjoined where consent judgment was rendered for less than the amount of the execution, on the proviso that it be paid within a certain time, when plaintiff by the exercise of diligence was unable to make a tender until shortly after the day for payment of the judgment, because the party controlling the judgment was a nonresident. Cooper v. Whaley, 60 Ga. 285.

And on a tender of the property in replevin in a reasonable time after a judgment for the property, and in default thereof a money judgment, an injunction should be granted against an execution on the alternative judgment for the money. McClellan v. Marshall, 19 Iowa, 551, 87 Am. Dec. 454.

And where the plaintiff after dissolution of an injunction proceeds to take the body of the defendant in execution, and he dies in gaol, the remedy on the injunction bond is gone, as the plaintiff waives his right against the bail on the injunction bond. Porteous v. Snipes, 1 Bay, 219.

Some cases refuse an injunction against proceedings under a judgment on the ground of payments made thereon, where there is an adequate remedy at law, or the claim of satisfaction is not sustained, or the payment is made to the wrong party, or where it has been credited, or where complainant is guilty of fraud, or the bill is not specific or conditions precedent to obtaining an injunction are not followed.

So, an injunction will not be granted where there is an adequate remedy at law to have payments made after judgment, applied to the satisfaction of the same. United States v. McLeamore, 45 U. S. 4 How. 238, 11 L. ed. 977.

Or where an adequate remedy at law exists by a judge's order. Lansing v. Eddy, 1 Johns. Ch. 49.

Or where there is a remedy to tender or pay the balance due, and apply to the court by motion to compel cancelation, or to stay execution. Roach v. Duckworth, 95 N. Y. 391, affirming 65 How. Pr. 303, 61 How. Pr. 128.

And an injunction will not be granted where there is an adequate remedy at law under W. Va. Code, chap. 140, § 17, providing for quashing the same. Howell v. Thomason, 84 W. Va. 794.

And an injunction will not be granted at the instance of a replevin bail against an execution sale, where a prior execution had been levied upon property of the principal for the same debt and partially satisfied, as there is a remedy at law by motion to set aside the execution. Cline v. Lowe, 8 Ind. 527.

Or where the court at law can afford the same remedy on a rule to show cause. Gorsuch v. Thomas, 57 Md. 334.

And an injunction was refused where it was claimed that a credit for costs had not been allowed on a pluries execution issued after an injunction was obtained, where such prior injunction was improperly granted against the whole debt, and the question of costs could be adjusted after the sale. Salter v. McHenry, 17 La. 507.

And the remedy by affidavit of illegality prevents an injunction where the debtor has settled the same by conveying to the holder of the judgment the land. Flournoy v. Silman, 59 Ga. 185.

And a remedy by motion in the nature of audita querela prevents an injunction. McRae v. Davis, 5 Jones Eq. 140.

In Parker v. Jones, 75 Am. Dec. 411, it was said that if an execution has been satisfied by a levy on property of the defendant, the remedy by a writ of audita querela to order the writ called in and satisfaction entered of record, would prevent an injunction.

And where the plaintiff in execution purchased the equity of redemption in mortgaged property under his execution sale, he thereby satisfied his judgment, and after a reversal of the judgment, and another judgment was obtained, the defendant could plead satisfaction at law, and is not entitled to an injunction against further proceedings on the judgment or execution, as he did not defend at law. Finley v. Thayer, 42 Ill. 350.

And in Hall v. Taylor, 18 W. Va. 544, it was held that where the sheriff fails to return the execution promptly, and pays the same off to the plaintiff without the request of the complainant or the plaintiff at law, the judgment will not be enjoined, as the defendant on motion can have the execution issued thereafter quashed, but such motion would ratify the action of the sheriff, and the sheriff could then recover an action of assumpsit for money paid for complainant's use and benefit; but in this case there appears to have been an agreement that the sheriff should have the benefit of this judgment, and an injunction was refused.

And the remedy by an action of damages for failure to comply with contract prevents an injunction for the refusal of the plaintiff in judgment to accept a conveyance in satisfaction thereof, which he has agreed to take. Gurley v. Hiteshue, 5 Gill, 217.

And an injunction sought on these grounds will be refused where the judgment has not been satisfied. Neal v. Henderson, 72 Ga. 203; Fuqua v. Robinson, 10 Ill. 129.

So, the collection of an execution on a justice's

Judgment will not be enjoined on the ground that such justice had applied on the judgment a deposit left with him as a tender, where this was insufficient as a tender to cover costs and judgment, and it was not accepted in full satisfaction of the claim, and this appropriation will not prevent enforcing judgment for the balance. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Kamman, 119 Ill. 332.

And the death of one of the slaves for which a forthcoming bond has been given will not authorize an injunction in favor of a surety where the other one has not been surrendered. Laughlin v. Ferguson, 6 Dana, 111.

Under Tenn. act 1831, chap. 25, providing that the sheriff having an execution and delivery bond, shall proceed to execute the same, and if unsatisfied pluries execution shall issue against the defendants in the judgment, the levy on personal property of one or several joint defendants and taking a delivery bond will not operate as a satisfaction of the judgment, and one of the defendants who has not joined in the delivery bond cannot enjoin the judgment. Williams v. Wright, 9 Humph. 493.

And an injunction will not be granted to restrain a levy of an execution on property which was re-delivered to the defendant on the execution on his giving a forthcoming bond, as such is not a satisfaction of the same. Parker v. Jones, 5 Jones Eq. 276, 75 Am. Dec. 411.

And under Iowa Code, § 3241, providing for a judgment in replevin for the property or its value at the election of plaintiff, an execution for the value cannot be enjoined by showing that the defendant had offered to deliver the goods to the sheriff. Davis v. Bayliss, 51 Iowa, 435.

When a debtor paid the plaintiff a part of his debt and proposed to pay the balance by a conveyance in which he had no interest, in consideration of a release, and then sought a specific execution of the contract, an injunction will not be granted to the debtor, as it would be compelling the creditor to exonerate him without consideration. Gurley v. Hiteshue, 5 Gill, 217.

So, where a trustee without authority compromised a judgment in consideration of land, but a deed had not been delivered, and the compromise had not been approved by the court, an injunction was refused against a sale of land under the execution to satisfy the judgment. Morris v. Thomas, 17 Ill. 112.

And on a bill to enjoin proceedings on an execution because the same was paid off by suffering a sale to another creditor under an agreement that the latter would sell the land and pay off this f. fa., where the answer denied such satisfaction and collusion, the complainant must overcome the same by proof. White v. Crew, 18 Ga. 418.

And in order to enjoin a judgment that has been compromised or released it must be alleged and shown that the agreement to release is founded on a valuable consideration. Plunkett v. Black, 117 Ind. 14.

So, an injunction against the enforcement of an execution, and to have the judgment satisfied in pursuance of an alleged agreement, will be denied where the agreement is not shown to be certain and entitling the plaintiff to a decree for specific performance. Spears v. Long, 32 S. C. 523.

A vendi. exp. on a judgment in favor of a wife against her husband will not be enjoined where she had sluce the judgment united in a deed with the

There are two questions in this case: First, Has a court of equity the power to grant the relief prayed for? And, second, if the power be conceded, is this such a case as calls for its exercise?

husband conveying the land sought to be sold, in the absence of a showing of fraud, or the covenants of the deed. Trullinger v. Charles, 120 Pa. 239.

An injunction should not be granted against a sheriff's sale on the ground that the defendant had tendered to the sheriff payment in notes and bonds of the plaintiff in the execution, where the sheriff was not authorized to receive such in payment. Osburn v. Curtis, 2 La. Ann. 764.

And an injunction against the collection of a judgment will not be granted on the ground that a draft had been given the plaintiff's attorney as collateral, but which was not to affect the lien of the judgment and which was not proved to be paid. Compton v. Blair, 46 Mich. 1.

And a receipt against an execution in the hands of a sheriff, given by a deputy sheriff, who never had the execution in his hands, and had no authority to receive the money, and the receipt was not procured by money, but by trading in notes, is not ground for injunction against the execution. Turner v. Belew, 3 J. J. Marsh. 50.

So, the purchaser under a fl. fa. cannot enjoin the execution on the same against him on the ground of payment to a person who had not the authority to receive it. Brummel v. Hurt, 3 J. J. Marsh. 709.

And an execution will not be enjoined where defendant paid plaintiff after notice of a bona fide assignment of the judgment. Holland v. Dale, Minor (Ala.) 285.

That a judgment debtor placed claims in the hands of the plaintiff's attorney for collection, to be applied on the claim, and that a sufficient amount has been collected to pay the judgment, will not entitle to an injunction, as this does not show payment. Williams v. Bradbury, 9 Tex. 487.

And an injunction will not be granted against an execution on the ground that a credit was not entered on the execution, when such credit was entered before process in the injunction suit was served. Calderwood v. Trent, 9 Rob. (La.) 237.

Where an unfair advantage is sought to be obtained through a receipt and a release of a judgment, and relief had been denied in a proceeding by audita querela, an injunction was denied against the judgment. Williams v. Roberts, 8 Hare, 315.

An injunction will not be granted for failing to enter credits paid on executions where there is a remedy at law. Morrison v. Speer, 10 Gratt. 238.

Under N. Y. Rev. Stat. 189, § 147, requiring a deposit and a bond for costs and damages, an injunction will not be granted on the ground that part of the judgment has been paid, where there is no deposit or bond, or specific statement of the amount paid. Christie v. Bogardus, 1 Barb. Ch. 167.

Where a second judgment was obtained on a bond by an executor without knowledge that a judgment had been obtained on the same bond twenty-three years prior thereto, the last judgment will not be enjoined on the presumption of payment from lapse of time, where at the date of the prior judgment the debtor conveyed his property in trust for his creditors, and the complainant does not show that the debt was satisfied, as the delay may be explained by settlement of the insolvent estate, and the assignment did not discharge the debt. Payne v. Dudley, 1 Wash. (Va.) 196.

In Brown v. Wilson, 56 Ga. 584, it was held that "it is no cause for enjoining a judgment that the 30 L. R. A.

The first question has been considered and answered in the affirmative by our ruling in the case of Kansas & A. V. R. Co. v. Fitzhugh, and we need only consider the second question.

It is said that the trial court committed error in impaneling, and also in charging, the jury. But errors alone are not sufficient to warrant plaintiff's attorney has failed to enter a credit on the execution according to agreement."

So, in Wray v. Chandler, 64 Ind. 146, it was said that if complainant had practiced a fraud in procuring a release, it would have been a bar to the action for injunction.

Merely fact that a payment has not been credited on an execution will not authorize an injunction where there is no allegation of an attempt to collect the money again, or refusal to allow credit on an application for that purpose. Abercrombie v. Knox, 8 Ala. 728, 37 Am. Dec. 721.

VII. In behalf of surety.

As to the right of a surety to an injunction restraining proceedings on a judgment, where such surety is released or discharged by reason of extension, agreement, conduct of the parties, or satisfaction, he is generally entitled to an injunction, this being regarded as peculiarly within the province of equitable interference.

So, an injunction will be granted where the surety is released.

As where the plaintiff had stayed an execution levied on the property of the principal, which operated as a release of the surety. Jones v. Bullock, 3 Bibb, 467. See also Cox v. Mobile & G. R. Co. infra, IX.

Or released the levy on the principal's property. Baird v. Rice, 1 Call (Va.) 18, 1 Am. Dec. 467.

Or where the creditor takes out execution against the principal, and has it returned unsatisfied, where there was property of the principal. Jenkins v. McNeese, 34 Tex. 189.

Or where the creditor assists the principal debtor to defeat the collection of the debt from the principal's property. Smith v. Hays, 1 Jones, Eq. 221.

So, where a creditor causes a return of his execution where a replevin bail was taken which was void, thereby discharging a lien of the execution on personal property of the principal debtor, sufficient to satisfy the judgment, the surety is discharged, and will be entitled to an injunction. Sterne v. McKinney, 79 Ind. 578.

Or where the plaintiff, after a levy on the property of the principal, discharged the same without the knowledge or consent of the surety, as it operates as a fraud on the surety. Dixon v. Ewing, 3 Ohio, 281, 17 Am. Dec. 590. (But see next case.)

But in Findlay v. Bank of United States, 2 Mo-Lean, 44, it was held that Dixon v. Ewing, supra, holding that a surety was entitled to an injunction against proceedings on a judgment after levy on the property of the principal, and the discharge of such levy, is not recognized as authority as the rights of a surety are merged in a judgment, and the application of the Ohio statute in such a case for the benefit of a surety is not applicable, and such decision rests on general principles, and not on the construction of the statute.

Where the judgment creditor assigned a judgment against principal and surety to another creditor under an agreement to make the debt out of the principal defendant, but instead he had the execution returned "no property," and exhausted the property by attachments of his own, the surety was entitled to an injunction. Biggerstaff v. Hoyt, 62 Mo. 481.

Or where the sheriff returned on the original ex-the interposition of a court of equity. "It must clearly appear that it would be contrary to equity and good conscience to allow the judgment to be enforced, else equity declines to impose terms upon the prevailing party." Whitehill v. Butler, 51 Ark. 343; Kansas & A. V. R. Co. v. Fitzhugh, supra. But a consideration of the evidence introduced in the action at law leads us to the conclusion that the verdict and judgment against the appellant were without evidence to support them. To warrant a judgment for the penalty imposed against appellant in the action at law, it was essential that there should be some evidence of execution "No money made," when it was partly satisfied by a levy and sale on principal's property, and the sheriff had absconded, there being no remedy at law. Fryer v. Austill, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 119.

And where a judgment was obtained against the makers of a note, and one of them appealed and gave security, and a judgment was obtained in an action against an indorser, and then the maker dismissed his appeal, the judgment against the indorser was enjoined, where the lien of the first judgment was lost by dismissing the appeal. Lewis v. Armstrong, 47 Ga. 298.

And a surety is entitled to have an execution sale of his property restrained until the property of the principal, seized under the execution, shall have been sold. Irick v. Black, 17 N. J. Eq. 189.

A surety compelled to pay a judgment of an insolvent principal is entitled to an injunction against a judgment against him in favor of his principal, which his principal had assigned after insolvency. Williams v. Helme, 1 Dev. Eq. 151, 18 Am. Dec. 580.

And a surety obtaining an equitable assignment of the judgment against his principal and co-surety will be enjoined from enforcing it against his co-surety, where he paid the debt out of collaterals placed in his hands by the principal. Kerns v. Chambers, 8 Ired. Eq. 576.

Under La. Rev. Stat. 1856, p. 67, providing that no sales should be made of the property of a surety until that of the principal shall have been discussed, a surety is entitled to an injunction against a levy of an execution on his property by showing a failure to levy on property of the principal sufficient to satisfy the execution. Stinson v. Hill, 21 La. Ann. 509.

And under Pasc. (Tex.) Dig. art. 4789, providing that indorsers are only sureties even after judgment, an indorser is entitled to an injunction against the judgment, where after levy on the principal's property the sale was postponed until he became insolvent. Parker v. Nations, 83 Tex. 210.

And where the county board released one of the sureties on a criminal bail bond on the payment of a certain sum, the other surety was entitled to an injunction to prevent the collection of the judgment for a greater amount than his co-surety was compelled to pay. Trabing v. Albany County Commission, 1 Wyo. Terr. 301.

For injunction by surety on account of payment by principal, see McGehee v. Gold, infra, IX.

But where he is not released or there is an adequate remedy at law, an injunction will not be granted.

So, a surety cannot obtain an injunction against a judgment or execution on the ground that there had been a levy on the principal's property and a forthcoming bond taken, where such bond is not a satisfaction or release of the surety, who did not unite on the bond. Williams v. Wright, 9 Humph. 433.

Where an execution on a judgment against a principal and surety is levied on property of the principal which cannot be sold for want of bidders it may still be levied on the property of the surety, and, although the constable is liable for failure to sell the property, the surety is not discharged, and is not entitled to an injunction. Moss v. Craft, 10 Mo. 720.

And under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 627, authorizing relief by bill of review, an injunction in favor of a surety against a judgment, where the principal has been released after such judgment, will not be granted. Michener v. Springfield Engine & T. Co. (Ind.) 40 N. E. 679.

And a judgment will not be enjoined on the ground of release of surety by extension granted to the principal on the debt after a levy on his land, where it is not shown that the plaintiff in the judgment knew that one of the defendants complaining was a surety. Patterson v. Brook, 14 Mo. 473.

In Woodburn v. Friend, 19 La. 490, it is held that sureties taken in judicial proceedings are bound in solido for the whole sum, and it is the duty of the surety to pay, and if the creditor does not suspend his execution so as to put it out of the power of the surety to pay, the surety is not entitled to an injunction for a return of the execution without service, but for so much of the debt as has been paid, he is entitled to an injunction.

In Williams v. Wright, 9 Humph. 493, it was said that admitting the principle that a valid agreement between the creditor and the principal debtor for delay without the consent of the surety discharges him, it is questionable whether this applies after judgment. If it does it will be indispensable that the surety should allege in his bill some reasonable ground for failure to pursue a legal remedy afforded him by statute.

For injunctions for set-offs in favor of sureties, see infra, VIII.

For satisfaction of judgment in favor of surety, see also Kallander v. Neidhold, 98 Mich. 517, and Harrison Mach. Works v. Templeton, 82 Tex. 443, supra, VI.; as to payment or satisfaction, supra, VI.; also McGehee v. Gold, 68 Ill. 215, infra, IX. as to newly discovered evidence.

And on a judgment against a principal and surety, where money was paid by the principal, and the execution was returned without service, but it was not shown that the payment was for an extension, the surety was not entitled to an injunction against proceedings on the judgment. Woodburn v. Friend, 19 La. 490.

The mere fact that the judgment creditors abstained from seizing the interest of the principal in a partnership stock of goods will not release a surety, as a surety cannot claim that the creditor should forbear as to him, until the value of the partnership interest is ascertained. Cunningham v. Buchanan, 10 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 523.

Where an indorser on a note has due notice of a default, and the holder of a note countermands an execution against the maker, such indorser is not released, and cannot enjoin the judgment, as Md. Laws 1768, chap. 23, § 8, provides that an indorser can pay the bill, and be subrogated to the rights of the holder, and the promise that the fi. fa. would be made out of the maker is not proved in this case. Lenox v. Prout, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 520, 4 L. ed. 449.

So, the refusal of a judgment creditor to issue executions to certain counties that would have secured the debt, before the principal defendant was adjudicated a bankrupt, will not entitle a surety in the judgment to an injunction against an execution against such surety, as the sureties could have paid the debt and taken an assignment of the judgment, and that the creditor procured the adjudication in bankruptcy will not entitle to an injunction. Thornton v. Thornton, 63 N. C. 211.

And an execution sale will not be enjoined at the tending to show that the amount charged the appellee was greater than three cents per mile for the distance he was carried as a passenger. Sand. & H. Dig. §§ 6211, 6217.

Now, an examination of the evidence shows that there was no competent evidence introduced to show the distance between the stations of Van Buren and Dyer, and Alma and Dyer. The only witnesses that testified were the appellee and his attorney. Neither of them told or pretended to know what the distances between these stations were. They gave the number of the nearest milepost to each station, and stated that the milepost instance of the replevin bail, on account of an agreement of the judgment creditor to make one half of the judgment out of the property of the judgment debtor, as the terms of the recognizance cannot be varied by a contemporaneous parol agreement. Smith v. Tyler, 51 Ind. 512.

And a surety consenting to an indulgence granted to his principal cannot obtain an injunction against the judgment for the debt. Furber v. Bassett, 2 Duv. 433.

And that a surety on a bail bond had no notice or copy of the judgment nisi, served on him, will not authorize an injunction, as he has a remedy by action of nullity or appeal. Cook v. State, 16 La. 288.

An execution will not be enjoined on the ground that an entry was not made upon the execution showing who was principal and surety, where the judgment was against several joint makers of a note, where such entry was not required by law, although one of the parties was a surety. Work v. Harper, 81 Miss. 107, 66 Am. Dec. 549.

In Gatewood v. Burns, 99 N. C. 837, it was held that an injunction will not be granted in favor of the party claiming to be a surety on the ground that the homestead assigned to the principal was excessive, and is still undetermined, as he cannot delay the sale when it is his duty to pay the debt. But in this case the complainant does not appear to have been adjudged a surety, and it was said that a surety might, under N. C. Code, § 2140, show on the trial that he was a surety, and then the judgment would have stated such fact, and the execution would have been indorsed to that effect, and the debt would then have to be made out of the principal's property first.

VIII. For set-off.

Insolvency of plaintiff at law has often been held to be sufficient ground for equitable interference by injunction in aid of set-off, and it may be said that this, in connection with other equities, is sufficient to entitle an injunction in order to enable the defendant to obtain the benefit of a set-off that could not have been used at law, or that was acquired after judgment, unless there is an adequate remedy at law. Some courts hold that the existence of mutual judgments is in itself ground for equitable interference, and this set-off is allowed by statute in some states.

So, a set-off of judgments and injunctions should be allowed, if the plaintiff in such action at law is insolvent, and the refusal of the court at law to permit such set-off on summary motion, where such insolvency was not alleged, is not res judicata, as decisions on summary motions are not regarded as final. Simpson v. Hart, 14 Johns. 63, reversing 1 Johns. Ch. 91.

And equity will grant an injunction in order to allow a set-off of a subsequent judgment obtained against the complainant on the ground of insolvency, although there is a remedy to appeal to the equity power of the court at law to set off one judgment against another. This concurrent remedy will not defeat the jurisdiction of equity, but the right of set-off will not affect the lien of the attorney for costs in the judgment. Gridley v. Garrison, 4 Paige. 647.

So, an injunction will be granted against proceedings on a judgment in order to maintain a set-off of a subsequent judgment against the plaintiff at law where he is insolvent, although he has appealed from the judgment. Guttendag v. Lehigh Valley Iron Co. 14 Phila. 639.

So, an assignee of a dormant judgment may bring a suit to revive, and at the same time have the judgment set off against a later judgment held by the defendant against him, and for an injunction where such defendant is insolvent. Simpson v. Huston, 14 Tex. 476.

And an injunction will be granted against a judgment held by fraudulent assignment, in order to maintain a set-off of a judgment against the assignor after a return on d. fa. of "nulla bona." Mitchell v. Stewart, 4 J. J. Marsh. 551.

And an injunction will be granted against a judgment, in order to maintain a set-off of a subsequent judgment, on the ground of insolvency. Although the court of king's bench would not allow the plaintiff's judgment to be set off against the defendants, yet it was right that it should be done in chancery. Williams v. Davies, 2 Sim. 461.

In Chicago, D. & V. R. Co. v. Field, 86 Ill. 270, it is said that only insolvency occurring subsequent to the judgment will form ground for equitable jurisdiction for set-off. But in Galena & S. W. R. Co. v. Ennor, 118 Ill. 55, that case was referred to as a case of insolvency arising after judgment, and its language is misleading; and it is held that a set-off should be allowed irrespective of the time of the occurrence of the insolvency, whether before or after judgment, and an injunction was allowed.

Under Ill. Stat. chapter on "Judgments and executions," §§ 58, 59, providing for setting off executions in the sheriff's hands, but not providing the forum where the relief is denied, a court of equity may compel a set-off of judgments against each other in case of insolvency, as insolvency, with other grounds of equitable relief, justifies an injunction. Matson v. Oberne, 25 Ill. App. 213.

So, where a judgment debtor was not entitled to plead a set-off because a claim was not due, but matured before judgment was finally rendered on appeal in the supreme court, an injunction was allowed where the plaintiff at law had become insolvent, as the defense could not have been made at law, and insolvency is sufficient ground of equitable relief for set-off. Ellis v. Kerr (Tex.) 23 S. W. 1050.

And where a defendant had paid money for the plaintiff as an indorser, and sought to have the judgment enjoined in order to maintain a set-off against the plaintiff, who was insolvent, the burden is upon the plaintiff at law to show that the set-off existed at the commencement of the suit, in order to prevent an injunction. Brazelton v. Brooks, 2 Head, 194.

So, set-off of a claim for rent against defendant will authorize an injunction against enforcing his judgment for costs in an action by plaintiff, where the defendant had assigned such judgment for costs, and was largely indebted to plaintiff, and was insolvent. Hayes v. Carr, 44 Hun. 372.

And a set-off acquired by an assignment of fees which accrued in the same suit to the defendant after the judgment entitled him to an injunction against so much of the judgment, as equity will require judgments to be mutually set off against each other. Keifer v. Summers, 137 Ind. 106, 113.

So, an injunction will be granted to restrain proceedings on a judgment or execution in order to maintain a set-off of judgments that are unsatisfied; but where the bill does not allege that the showed the distances between the stations to be a certain number of miles, but there is nothing to show that the appellant had any connection with these mileposts. We cannot tell from the evidence whether the mileposts referred to are located on the railway right of way or along the public road, nor whether they were erected by the county or the appellant or some other railway company. The attention of the court and counsel was called to this defect in the proof on the trial of the case, and the court was asked to direct a verdict for appellant for want of evidence showing the distances between the stations named. The court refused to do so, judgment attempted to be used as a set-off is unsatisfied, an injunction will not be allowed. Walker v. Ayres, 1 Iowa, 449.

As a general rule, that which could have been pleaded to an original suit cannot be a ground for an injunction, but where two suits are pending between the same parties, each against the other, and are contested, compensation does not take place until after judgment, and then the execution in either case may be enjoined. Ellis v. Fisher, 10 La. Ann. 479; Muse v. Rogers, 12 Mart. (La.) 370; Dabbs v. Hemken, 3 Rob. (La.) 123, and 129.

Where a creditor obtained a judgment which was replevied, and then in a court which had no jurisdiction collected money due the surety, which judgment was reversed, an injunction in the creditor's behalf was allowed in order to maintain in his favor the set-off of his judgment on the replevin bond, in the other court, against the order to refund the money. Smith v. Bohon, 12 Bush, 448.

And where the fraudulent grantee of a chattel recovers a judgment in trespass for a levy of an execution on the same, and assigns it to his fraudulent grantor, the plaintiff in the execution is entitled to an injunction and set-off of his execution to the extent of the same, on the ground of fraud where his execution had been returned unsatisfied. Bishop v. Duncan, 3 Dana, 15.

And an injunction will be granted in order to prevent multiplicity of actions, where an attorney recovered a judgment and the money from the constable, and paid the money to his clients, to whom the constable owed the same, and a judgment against the constable was reversed, and he obtained a judgment against the attorney. Colt v. Cornwell, 2 Root, 108.

A judgment of trespass in favor of executors for a levy upon property of a legatee in his possession, where the executors had not given their consent to the legacy, will be enjoined where there are no debts against the estate, and the executor had no beneficial interest, and it would be against conscience to permit the debtor to pay his debt and at the same time recover damages from his creditors on the ground that he held a beneficial interest only, and not the legal title. Lewis v. Wyatt, 2 Rand. (Va.) 114.

And an equitable set-off will authorize enjoining a judgment where there is no remedy at law. French v. Garner, 7 Port. (Ala.) 549.

If such set-off was obtained before notice of an assignment for creditors including the judgment, it may be used, but if acquired afterwards an injunction will not be allowed. Brashear v. West, 33 U. S. 7 Pet. 608, 8 L. ed. 801.

And while an equitable right to set off judgments may be proper, defendant cannot obtain an injunction unless he tenders all that is due thereon, but the set-off will be allowed so far as it reaches. Keifer v. Summers, 187 Ind. 106, 118.

Where the defendant in a fi. fa. purchases a note of the plaintiff, an injunction will be granted until his claim to set off the amount of his note is determined, as, under La. Civ. Code, § 298, the debts are reciprocal, and extinguished as soon as they are opposed simultaneously, to the amount of their respective sum. Caldwell v. Davis, 2 Mart. N. S. 135.

But a court of chancery has no right to review the verdict, and alter the judgment, where an injunction is granted against a judgment in order to maintain a set-off or a counter judgment. Sumner v. Whitley, 1 Mo. 708.

And an injunction will not be granted unless the complainant is the equitable owner of the set-off, or where he has not reduced the claim to judgment, and he does not allege insolvency of the defendant in the equity suit.

So, a party cannot set off a judgment subsequently obtained unless he is the beneficial, as well as the nominal, owner of the same. Satterlee v. Ten Eyck, 7 Cow. 480.

In Aiken v. Satterlee, 1 Paige, 289, which was the same case on another application, it was held that where the defendants are willing to deduct the amount actually paid by complainant for the judgment endeavored to be set up, an injunction will not be granted.

So, where a judgment is obtained in an action by A for the benefit of B against C, an injunction will not be granted at the suit of C against A alone, of notes held by assignment in order to maintain a set-off against A, who is insolvent, as B is the interested party, as appears of record. Turner v. Cox, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 175.

And an injunction will not be allowed on the ground of set-off of claims against a judgment where complainant does not allege the insolvency of plaintiff, and that complainant had paid value for the claims, and that they were obtained before the judgment was assigned. Townsend v. Quinan, 36 Tex. 548.

An injunction will not be granted to restrain the collection of an execution where the evidence is conflicting as to the insolvency of defendant, in order to maintain a set-off subsequently acquired. Eady v. Blanton (Ga.) 22 S. E. 323.

And a judgment at law will not be enjoined, in order to enable the defendant to obtain a judgment which may be used as a set-off, unless the plaintiff is insolvent. Smith v. Ross, 3 Humph. 220; Boone v. Small, 3 Cranch, C. C. 623.

And in Whyte v. O'Brien, 1 Sim. & Stu. 551, an injunction was refused against a judgment in order to maintain a set-off where the demand was acquired by complainant after verdict, on the ground that the demand was purely legal and there was no equitable ground for set-off.

In order to maintain an injunction against a fi. fa. on the ground of pleading in compensation a note made by the plaintiff in execution, it must be shown that the note was acquired subsequently to the date of the judgment. Kennard v. Henderson, 9 Rob. (La.) 165; Morgan v. Driggs, 3 La. Ann. 124; Hart v. Cannon, 10 La. Ann. 721; Todd v. Fisk, 14 La. Ann. 18.

In Palfrey v. Shuff, 2 Mart. N. S. 51, an injunction was refused against setting off one judgment against another, on the ground that the petition did not state that the judgments were in the same court, and the parish court could not impede the execution of the defendant's judgment when it could not protect him against the judgment the plaintiff alleged he had in his favor, and an injunction should not be granted against the whole of a judgment while the set-off left a considerable part in force.

And an injunction against a judgment in order to establish a set-off will not be granted where the set-off is a judgment that was rendered without jurisdiction. Hanna v. Morrow, 43 Ark. 107.

A judgment against a public administrator of a and assumed in his instructions that the mileposts had been put up by appellant. He commences the second paragraph of his instructions as follows: "In regard to those mileposts, the company has put up mileposts along the road, as the proof shows here, and put consecutive numbers on them. I suppose when they began, they commenced one mile from the starting point, then two, and then three, the same as a proclamation as to the distance," etc. The circuit judge in giving this instruction, no doubt labored under the impression that there was no dispute concerning the question as to whether or not the appellant had put up the trustee will not be enjoined on the ground that the beneficiary has died since the judgment, and the trustee paid to one of her brothers more than his share, and that the bondsman of the trustee seeking the injunction has obtained by assignment the interest of the other brother where the settlement is still pending in the county court, as a distributee cannot offset his share against a judgment against him. Green v. Tittman, 124 Mo. 572.

So, an execution in favor of a wife who had died will not be enjoined to maintain a set-off by defendant against her husband alleging that as distributee he owns the judgment, and that he is insolvent, as this is repugnant,—especially where defendant waited five years without attempt to revive, and has a remedy by supplementary proceedings. Boley v. Griswold, 2 Mont. 447.

And in Hobenthal v. Watson, 84 Mo. 183, it was held that an injunction will not be granted against an officer from collecting the full amount of the judgment in his favor on an execution against a claimant for the full value of the property in a replevin suit, although after judgment the defendant procures from the defendant in the execution an assignment of his right to the surplus after paying the execution, as the complainant acquired his claim from a stranger to the judgment and suit, and when a case has proceeded to final judgment the losing party should not be permitted to continue the litigation by voluntarily acquiring new claims against the gaining party and setting them up in bar of the judgment.

A surety is entitled to an injunction against proceedings on a judgment where his principal is insolvent and such surety has subsequently acquired a judgment against the creditor having a judgment against the principal and surety. Scholz v. Steiner, 100 Ala. 148; Steiner v. Scholz (Ala.) 18 So. 79.

And a surety may have an injunction against a judgment against him, where the principal in a replevin action recovered a judgment against the plaintiff, annulling the original contract. Dickason v. Bell, 13 La. Ann. 249.

And he may have a judgment on the forthcoming bond enjoined on the ground that he has an action pending against the plaintiff for a larger amount, and that he is insolvent. McClennan v. Kinnaird, 6 Gratt. 352.

But where the principal prevents the completion of an execution sale in favor of his surety, by an injunction for nearly two years, and obtains a judgment against the surety, he cannot enjoin the completion of the execution sale in order to maintain a set-off. McDonald v. Cook, 11 Mo. 632.

IX. For newly discovered evidence.

Newly discovered evidence will authorize an injunction against a judgment at law, where it is shown that the evidence is material and would change the result, and could not by the exercise of diligence have been discovered in time to have been used at law, and was discovered since the judgment at law, and too late to enable the complainant to use the same for a motion for a new trial, and that the judgment at law is unjust. The showing of new evidence should be specific as to the evidence establishing its materiality, and should be supported by affidavits.

So, an injunction will be granted against a judgment at law on the ground of newly discovered evidence which is material, and which could not have been had on a trial at law by use of diligence. Billups v. Sears, 5 Gratt. 31, 50 Am. Dec. 105; Rust v. Ware, 6 Gratt. 50, 52 Am. Dec. 100; Winthrop v. Lane, 8 Desaus. Eq. 310; Vennum v. Davis, 35 Ill. 568.

So, an injunction will be granted, on the discovery after judgment that the note sued upon was not one for which the defendant was liable as it was not given by the firm during the time of partnership, and complainant had used due diligence in making his defense, and obtained evidence since the trial that he was in no way responsible for its payment. Vennum v. Davis, supra.

Or where a corporation was in ignorance of its equitable title to lands recovered from it in ejectment, and had used diligence to ascertain the fact, and failed to discover the same until after the expiration of the time for a new trial. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hay, 119 Ill. 493, 507.

And will be granted on discovery after judgment of defects of title where the judgment was obtained on purchase-money notes, and complainant had been deceived by false representations of the vendor. Fitch v. Polke, 7 Blackf. 564.

Or on a discovery that the plaintiff had obtained a decree for a greater sum than he was entitled to, of which he had knowledge, and of which complainant was ignorant. Baye v. Beard, 12 B. Mon. 581.

So, a judgment in covenant obtained on a tender of "M. and N.'s" notes was enjoined where the notes were signed by N. and indorsed by M., and therefore not the notes of "M. and N." and M. had become bankrupt, which was not known at the time of the judgment. Armstrong v. Hickman, 6 Munf. 287.

So, an injunction will be granted on the ground of fraud, where a note indorsed for accommodation to be used in a particular manner was given to another party subject to equities, and the note was used in a different manner, and the fraud was not known at the time of judgment, as the complainant believed the note to have been properly used. Hickerson v. Raiguel, 2 Heisk. 329.

And will be granted for new material evidence consisting of the confessions of a party deliberately and voluntarily made, repeated at different times and to different persons, and where the evidence at the trial on which the judgment was obtained was of the same character, consisting principally of declarations. Colyer v. Langford, 1 A. K. Marsh. 237.

And in Bultzell v. Randolph, 9 Fla. 366, where a judgment was taken against complainant, on a note made in the firm name, long after he had left the firm, and he was unable to make the defense for the reason that the party who had executed the note was sick, and no information could be had because the clerk of the firm had left for parts unknown, and a continuance was prevented for the same reason, because it was not known what could be proved, an injunction against an execution and proceedings on the judgment was allowed. There appears to be much of negligence of complainant in this case as he acted under a delusion, until a short time before court, that his former partner would attend to it, but having withdrawn his pleas and suffered judgment by default, he never having mileposts. To make such mistakes in the hurry of a trial is easy, and it is less difficult to criticize than to avoid making them; but we are bound by the record, and it shows that the question as to the distances between the stations was the principal point in issue, and that no admissions were made, the attorney for appellant contending that the proof on this very point was insufficient.

In addition to this instruction, which was calculated to mislead the jury on a material point, two of the jurors admitted on their examination that each of them had brought suit against appellant to collect a penalty for an overcharge for passenger carriage between the same stations of Alma and Dyer; that these suits had been tried the term before; and that each of them held an opinion as to the distance between these stations. For this cause they were challenged by defendant, but the court held that they were competent, and the defendant having exhausted its peremptory challenges, they sat in the trial of the case. These jurors having only a short time before been plaintiffs in an action against appellant in which the same issues were involved, the challenge of defendant should have been sustained. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Smith, 60 Ark. 222.

owed any part of the debt, an injunction was granted.

And new evidence discovered after judgment will entitle to relief against the same where it could not have been discovered by due diligence,—as that a surety was released by an extension. Cox v. Mobile & G. R. Co. 44 Ala. 611.

So, an affidavit of a witness that he had given testimony erroneously by mistake, will authorize an injunction on the ground of accident, against proceedings on a judgment, where a sudden and unlooked-for adjournment of the court prevented a motion for a new trial. Tarver v. McKay, 15 Ga. 550.

So, a judgment will be enjoined on the discovery of evidence showing payment, where such evidence could not have been discovered by the use of diligence. Winchester v. Jackson, 3 Hayw. (Tenn.) 806; Hubbard v. Hobson, 1 Ill. 147; Harvey v. Seashol, 4 W. Va. 115; Wales v. Bank of Michigan, Harr. Ch. 808; Pearce v. Chastain, 3 Ga. 223, 45 Am. Dec. 423; McGehee v. Gold, 68 Ill. 215.

Where complainant was only surety. McGehee v. Gold, supra.

Or an administrator. Terrill v. Southall, 3 Bibb, 458.

Or where the evidence of payment through an agent was destroyed by fire, and could not be discovered with reasonable diligence until after the judgment at law, an injunction against proceedings on the judgment should be enjoined. Brown v. Luehrs, 79 Ill. 575.

And in Price v. Fuqua, 4 Munf. 68, where an executor found evidence of a receipt against the debt after the judgment, and had failed to make a defense of the statute of limitations under the mistake of counsel, and there was misconduct of the jury, an injunction was granted.

In Gainsborough v. Gifford, 2 P. Wms. 424, it was said that if after a judgment a receipt was found under the plaintiff's own hand for the debt, equity will grant relief. This case is generally quoted as an authority on this question, but that was not the decision of the court.

So, where the judgment is fraudulent. Davis v. Tilston, 47 U. S. 6 How. 114, 12 L. ed. 366.

The discovery after judgment that the plaintiff knew that a blank note was filled in with too large an amount, and that the bank suing as ussee had only a nominal interest, but the suit was in pursuance of a conspiracy to cut off defenses, will authorize an injunction against proceedings on the judgment, where the same could not have been discovered by the use of diligence. Goad v. Hart, 8 Smedes & M. 737.

And a judgment in favor of bank B on a note payable to bank A will be enjoined where it is discovered after judgment that bank B did not own the note or authorize the suit, and that the same was a fraudulent transaction to prevent a set-off against bank A in favor of the defendant. Stovall v. Northern Bank, 5 Smedes & M. 17.

at law by which the defendant can establish fraud in the consideration where defense was not made at law, entitles to an injunction against the judgment, where complainant has not been negligent, and alleges that the indorsee of a note in whose favor the judgment was rendered took it with notice of fraud. Vathir v. Zane, 6 Gratt. 246.

And newly discovered evidence of the existence of a contract in the possession of adverse parties which was concealed by them during the trial, and which would have changed the result, will authorize an injunction against the judgment where the complainant has not been guilty of negligence, although such facts might possibly have been elicited on cross-examination. Cairo & F. R. Co. v. Titus, 28 N. J. Eq. 260, Reversing 27 N. J. Eq. 102.

So, where defense was not made at law because it was believed that the bill upon which suit was brought was a genuine one, and after time for new trial had passed it was discovered that it was a forged one, relief was granted by injunction against the judgment. Ferrell v. Allen, 5 W. Va. 43.

Discovery of new material evidence after a sentence in admiralty court will authorize an injunction against the judgment, when, at the time of trial, such evidence could not have been received according to the practice in that court, and the judgment was unjust. Jarvis v. Chandler, 1 Turn. & R. 319.

But an injunction will not be granted for newly discovered evidence unless it is shown that the judgment is wrong, that the evidence has been discovered since the trial, that diligence had been used, and that such new evidence would make a different result. Holmes v. Steteler, 67 Ill. 209.

So, newly discovered evidence that would not have changed the result is not ground for enjoining the judgment. Graham v. Roberts, 1 Head, 56; Turley v. Taylor, 6 Baxt. 376.

Notes and policies against plaintiff found among the papers of a debtor after a judgment rendered against his administrator will not authorize an injunction against the judgment where such debts were paid by dependent out of money in his hands belonging to plaintiff, and not with his own money. Segond v. Remy, 8 La. Ann. 128.

And the discovery of proposals for marriage settlement after a decree will not authorize enjoining the decree on the ground of reformation of settlement on account of mistake, where complainant is not entitled to such relief on the evidence. Marquis of Breadalbane v. Marquis of Chandos, 2 Myl. & C. 711, 7 L. J. (Ch.) N. S. 23.

A bill of complaint for an injunction against a judgment on the ground of newly discovered evidence must set forth the evidence in the bill, so that its materiality may be seen. Miller v. McGuire, Morris (Iowa) 150.

And must be supported by the affidavits of the witnesses, and the complainant must have used diligence. Fuller v. Little, 69 Ill. 229.

And an injunction will not be granted if the newly discovered evidence is not material, or com-

When we consider these rulings of the court in connection with the fact that the verdict and judgment are not supported by the evidence, we must conclude that the appellant was entitled to a new trial, and that it would have obtained it but for the fact that its appeal was cut off by an inevitable accident, which left it without remedy at law. It seems unjust and inequitable that the appellee should be allowed to retain the advantage given him by the sudden death of the presiding judge. As the appellant is remediless at law, we believe that this is a proper case for a court of equity to exercise its restraining power, to the end that justice may be done. Kansas & A. V.

It is therefore ordered that the decree of the chancellor be reversed, and that unless the appellee, Thomas H. Or that the consideration was contrary to public policy. Green v. Robinson, 5 How. (Miss.) 80.

New evidence will not authorize an injunction against proceedings on a judgment where the defendant failed to use due diligence, where the note sued upon was executed by complainant's partner after a settlement and dissolution, and fraudulently antedated. Leggett v. Morris, 6 Smedes & M. 723.

An injunction will not be allowed against a judgment in trespass obtained by a fraudulent grantee, for levying upon his property, where the fraud in his obtaining title had been tried at law, and there is no showing but what the newly discovered evidence could have been obtained by due diligence. Bishop v. Duncan, 3 Dana, 15.

Where a party has reason to expect that evidence on behalf of the issue will be offered, he cannot obtain an injunction on the ground of surprise, and if he was not ready for a trial, or was surprised, he should have moved for a new trial; and the fact that he took an appeal, and was disappointed that evidence was not permitted on the appeal, will not justify an injunction, as ignorance or mistake of law will not excuse a party in a case like this, nor tend to show either fraud or surprise on the testimony which had already been heard. Turley v. Taylor, 6 Baxt. 376.

In order to enjoin a judgment on the ground of new evidence the evidence should be stated, must be material, must be such as would change the result, and complainant must have been diligent.

Smith v. McLain, 11 W. Va. 654; Burnley v. Rice, 21 Tex. 171; Cadwaleder v. Atchison, 1 Mo. 669.

An injunction will not be granted against a judgment on the ground of newly discovered evidence, or of a defense of which he was ignorant until the judgment was rendered, unless complainant shows that by the exercise of ordinary diligence he could not discover such evidence or defense or that he was prevented from obtaining the same by fraud, accident, or the act of the opposite party, unmixed with laches or negligence on his part. Bloss v. Hull, 27 W. Va. 508.

In order to obtain an injunction against a judgment on the ground of newly discovered evidence the complainant must show that he has not been guilty of laches in making the discovery that the evidence was material to the issue, that it is not merely cumulative, or in addition to other evidence of like import heard at the trial. Harnsberger v. Kinney, 13 Gratt. 511; Akers v. Akers, 38 Va. 633; Forsythe v. McCreight, 10 Rich. Eq. 303.

Newly discovered evidence is not of itself sufficient to enjoin a judgment and execution sale, where such matters were in issue and determined by the trial court, and have become res judicata. Gusman v. DePoret, 33 La. Ann. 333.

In Bloss v. Hull, 27 W. Va. 508, it was said that an injunction will not be granted for newly discovered evidence, when it goes merely to impeach the testimony of a witness to let in cumulative evidence as to matter which was principally controverted at the former trial; but if the newly discovered evidence is sufficient to utterly destroy the former testimony by showing it was false, or founded on perjury, then a new trial will be granted.

When additional evidence was discovered and could not be used in a court at law by obtaining a new trial, an injunction was refused, where it was not shown that such evidence was material, relevant, and not cumulative. Hannon v. Maxwell, 31 N. J. Eq. 318.

So, failure to show that relief could not have been obtained at law will prevent an injunction. Hintrager v. Sumbargo, 64 Iowa, 604; Hamel v. Grimm, 10 Abb. Pr. 150.

And an injunction will not be granted on newly discovered evidence where the facts on which the complaint is founded, although discovered since the trial, might have been established at the trial upon cross-examination. Taylor v. Sheppard, 1 Younge & C. Exch. 271.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Frank E. PARSHLEY, Appt.,

v.

THIRD METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH in the City of Brooklyn, Resp't.

(147 N. Y. 583.)

1. A church corporation does not ratify the employment of an attorney by individual trustees to conduct the prosecution of a preacher before a church tribunal, by passing a resolution to pay a certain sum to another attorney for services in respect to the sale of property, although the trustees acting individually, and not in their corporate character, had an understanding with him that a part of the money should be applied by him to discharge the claim of the other attorney.
2. No liability is admitted by a resolution by church trustees appointing a committee to "confer with and act under the advice of" the attorney of the board in examining a certain claim and agreeing upon the sum, if any, to be paid, and another resolution authorizing the president and treasurer to pay the sum, if any, found due by such committee, where the board refused to accept the report of the committee, which found in favor of the claim in disregard of the condition as to acting under the advice of counsel.
3. The official board of a Methodist Episcopal Church, consisting of the trustees, the stewards, the class leaders, the Sunday-school teachers, and the local preachers, does not represent and cannot legally bind the church corporation in respect to the payment of a claim against it.
4. A church does not take the benefit of an attorney's services in prosecuting a preacher, so as to make it liable to pay for them, by a resolution for the removal of the preacher from the parsonage, which recites his suspension from the ministry upon the charges presented against him.

(November 26, 1886.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the General Term of the City Court of Brooklyn reversing a judgment entered upon the report of a referee in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of services rendered by plaintiff to defendant as counsel in prosecuting the pastor of the church upon charges which had been preferred against him. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Isaac H. Maynard, with Mr. Charles M. Stafford, for appellant:

The services and expenditures of the plaintiff for which this action is brought were rendered and incurred for the benefit of the defendant, and it was competent for the board of trustees of the defendant to bind the corporation to make compensation therefor.

Ch. 666; First Baptist Church v. Witherell, 3 Paige, 296, 24 Am. Dec. 228.

If the services rendered and the expenditures made were for the benefit of the defendant, and the board of trustees knew that they were rendered and made in its behalf, and they afterwards ratified and adopted the action of a less number of their members than was necessary to constitute a quorum, it wrought the same effect upon the legal rights of the plaintiff as if he had been originally employed by a resolution duly adopted at a legally constituted meeting of the board.

No caucus of any number of trustees, or any number of members of any kind, with or without their attorney, could bind the corporation in any degree.

Landers v. Frank Street M. E. Church, 114 N. Y. 626.

The claim made by the plaintiff is of such a nature that even the board of trustees of the defendant would have no right to pay or do any act that would bind the defendant or make it liable for such claim.

NOTE.—For an attempt to raise an obligation to pay by acceptance of benefits from acts done without any contract to pay therefor, see also Cincinnati, S. & C. R. Co. v. Bensley (C. C. App. 6th C.) 19 L. R. A. 796.

By the discipline neither the trustees nor any other officers have anything to do with the selection of a minister, or with determining whether any particular minister shall preach in that church.

The trustees can exclude the appointee from neither the parsonage nor the pulpit.

If the trustees had voted to pay plaintiff his claim out of the funds of the church they might have been restrained by injunction as for threatening to commit waste of trust property.

Bowden v. M'Leod, 1 Edw. Ch. 588.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not at all certain that the trustees of the church, having charge of its temporalities and representing it in its corporate character, have a legal right to contract a debt for the purpose of prosecuting before a church tribunal a preacher charged with immorality. But, waiving any consideration of that question, and assuming for the sake of the argument that such power exists, it still seems to me quite certain that the general term were right in holding that the corporate body never became bound or liable for the debt.

There is no room for dispute about the fact that the trustees acting officially never employed the plaintiff or authorized his expenditure. A minority of the board, acting only as individuals and promising merely individual and voluntary aid, alone set the plaintiff in motion. The trial court so found and planted its award of judgment wholly upon the ground of ratification, and it is upon that question that the courts below differed and to which our attention is required.

Two main and principal facts are relied on by the appellant, both of which have some peculiar features. There came a time when the plaintiff was pressing for his pay, and the church corporation was about to sell its property to the bridge company. Counsel was, of course, employed to conduct the negotiations and manage the proper transfer of title. That counsel was Judge Groo, who promised to act without compensation, or, at least, without charge for his time and services. Nevertheless, the trustees passed a resolution to pay him, first $5,000 and later $8,000, for his services and expenses as counsel. That was the corporate action on its face, and there was no other. But behind it stood the motive for it and the explanation of it. Between the trustees, acting individually, and not in their corporate character, and their counsel there was an understanding that the money voted to Groo should be by him applied to the discharge of plaintiff's claim, and $3,500 of it was in fact so applied. Obviously, there was here an attempt to do indirectly what it was supposed could not be done directly, and the indirect action was not at all and not intended to be of a corporate character. That was carefully avoided and meant to be avoided, and as the result of what was done the plaintiff acquired, not a legal right against the corporation, but a moral right against Judge Groo, founded on the latter's good faith. The caucus action of the individual trustees was clearly personal and 80 L. R. A. nonofficial. Landers v. Frank Street Methodist Church, 114 N. Y. 626. As such it did not, and was not intended to, bind the church. It recognized, not a legal obligation of the church corporation, but a moral duty of its members which they sought to perform through the agency and operation of an entirely different legal obligation. The very form and manner of the transaction assumed that the plaintiff had no legal claim against the corporation; that it had no right to pay him, and that it was only by an artifice, and through the liberality of Judge Groo, that the moral duty of reimbursing the plaintiff could be performed. The trustees had sought to obtain funds for him through voluntary subscriptions. They had recognized that no corporate moneys were available for that purpose, and failing to secure a voluntary contribution resorted to the questionable measure of paying the corporate funds to Judge Groo as a counsel fee, leaving him, out of what had become his own money, to do justice to the moral claim of the plaintiff. Whatever else may be said about the transaction it is very certain that it did not amount to a ratification of the acts of individuals and a corporate assumption of their obligations.

But a further step was taken. The plaintiff continued to press for reimbursement out of the corporate treasury, evidently insisting that he had a legal claim against the church, and in 1892 the board of trustees passed two resolutions. One of them appointed a committee to examine the claim and agree upon the sum, if any, to be paid, but providing that the committee should "confer with and act under the advice of" the attorney of the board. The second resolution authorized the president and treasurer of the board to pay plaintiff the sum, if any, found due by such committee. These resolutions admitted nothing, acknowledged nothing. They left the question of the corporate liability open to the decision of the committee, acting under the advice of counsel. There was a legal question to be determined arising upon and out of the facts, the answer to which would settle the doubt about liability and indicate what was the corporate duty. To meet that emergency the committee was authorized to act only after a conference with and under the advice of the counsel of the board. This was a vital and essential condition of the committee's authority, without obedience to which they had no power to act at all. They disregarded that condition, completely ignored the counsel, neither sought nor took his advice, and made a report in favor of allowing plaintiff's claim. The board, however, refused to accept the report, as not made in accordance with the condition imposed. Here, again, I am unable to see proof of a ratification. The act of the committee never became the act of the board. There was no original authority conferred upon them to act independently of the advice of counsel, and their unauthorized action was rejected and not confirmed by the board. It is suggested that the resolutions admit the liability, but question only the amount. I cannot so read them. They call for an investigation, guided by counsel, as to whether any sum is due at all, and do not admit an obligation for some amount.

There were some minor facts pressed upon our attention as involving a ratification. One of them was the resolution of the official board in 1888. That board consisted of the trustees, the stewards, the class leaders, the Sunday-school teachers, and the local preachers. It had its place and its duties in the Methodist order and discipline, but did not represent and could not legally bind the corporation. What it did was to say that the plaintiff acted "in the interest of the church," and to recommend a voluntary contribution to defray the expenses. The word "church" was here used in its broad and moral sense, as covering the Methodist church generally in its religious character and aggregation, and not as meaning the particular corporation. It is "the" church, and "the M. E. church," and not the specific corporate defendant; and the recommendation is to contribute to the expenses, and not to the defendant to enable it to pay.

Our attention is drawn also to the resolution for the removal of Millen from the parsonage, which recites his suspension from the ministry upon the charges presented against him, and the argument is that the defendant took the benefit of plaintiff's services, and so must pay for them. Very little need be said about that. The rule only applies where the party is free to take them or not. Here the defendant did not take them at all, and simply sought to remove a tenant holding over without right.

The order of the General Term should be affirmed, and judgment absolute be rendered for the defendant, with costs.

All concur, except Peckham and Gray, JJ., dissenting.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Oliver O. FORSYTH et al., Appts.,

v.

City of HAMMOND.

(.....Ind.....)

1. If the parties declining to join in an appeal go voluntarily before the supreme court and file their written declination, all is accomplished that was intended by Rev. Stat. 1894, § 647, providing for an appeal by some of several coparties upon service of notice upon all, and striking out the names of those refusing to join on motion, so that the appeal cannot be dismissed for failure to make them parties, after the time for them to appeal has passed.

2. Failure of the owner to consent need not be alleged in a proceeding for the annexation of unplatted land to a city, since the very existence of the controversy implies, not only a desire for annexation on the part of the city, but also want of consent thereto on the part of the property owner.

3. The jurisdiction of the county board to order annexation of territory to a city is not defeated under Rev. Stat. 1894, § 8659, by the fact that a part of the lands are platted, if the platted section is not contiguous to the city.

4. Lands subdivided into lots and blocks, if not contiguous to the limits of a city, are not "platted" within the meaning of the statutes relating to the annexation of territory to municipalities.

5. For the court to assume in its charge to the jury the existence of undisputed facts is not reversible error.

6. An instruction that land is contiguous to a certain city is not erroneous because of the fact that the land had been previously annexed to another municipality.

NOTE.—For a case denying that annexation by a municipal corporation can be attacked collaterally, see Kuhn v. Port Townsend (Wash.) 29 L. R. A. 445.

For legislative power to annex territory to municipal corporations, see note to State v. Cincinnati (O.). 27 L. R. A. 787.

7. The annexation by a city council of territory to the city by proceedings in which it acquires no jurisdiction may, except in case of estoppel, be collaterally attacked.

On rehearing.

8. The legislative character of the function of annexation of territory to a city does not preclude judicial examination and decision on questions as to the preliminary steps and the truth and sufficiency of the petition for annexation.

9. A statute giving a city council jurisdiction to annex adjacent lands on the written consent of the owners gives the council no jurisdiction to annex lands on the petition of owners whose lands are not adjacent.

(April 11, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Porter County reversing the decision of the board of county commissioners in defendant's favor in a proceeding to annex territory to the City of Hammond. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. W. H. H. Miller, F. Winter, John B. Elam, A. L. Jones, and S. D. Miller, for appellants:

A part only of the remonstrants appeal to this court, but all their co-remonstrants have filed a refusal to appeal in this court. This meets the requirements of the law.

Truman v. Scott, 72 Ind. 258.

In order that the board of county commissioners might acquire jurisdiction of the subject matter involved, the petition should set out:

1. That the territory sought to be annexed was contiguous;

2. That said territory is not laid off in lots;

3. That the owner or owners of the property will not consent to the annexation;

4. The reasons for the annexation, and so on, complying throughout with the letter of the statute,—for, as the court below rightly charged the jury, this is a purely statutory proceeding, and the statute must be strictly construed, and the annexation can be had only in strict conformity with such statute.

Perr v. Bearss, 55 Ind. 576.

The board of commissioners could not annex territory when the written consent of the owners had been had.

Strosser v. Fort Wayne, 100 Ind. 446; Huff v. Lafayette, 108 Ind. 14; Swinney v. Fort Wayne, M. & C. R. Co. 59 Ind. 205; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Scott, 74 Ind. 29; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. Co. 116 Ind. 578.

The board has no more power to annex the platted lands than it had to annex lands in the next county.

Chandler v. Kokomo, 187 Ind. 295.

Where an inferior tribunal has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and exercises that jurisdiction, such exercise cannot be questioned in a collateral attack.

Muncey v. Joest, 74 Ind. 409; Argo v. Barthand, 80 Ind. 63; Mullikin v. Bloomington, 73 Ind. 161; Cicero v. Williamson, 91 Ind. 541.

Proceedings to annex contiguous territory to incorporated towns or cities cannot be set aside upon the ground that the proceedings of the board of commissioners were erroneous, except in cases where there is a direct appeal from the judgment of the board.

Grusenmeyer v. Logansport, 76 Ind. 549; Bryan v. Moore, 81 Ind. 9; Marion County Comrs. v. Pressley, Id. 861; Caskrey v. Greensburg, 78 Ind. 333; Ricketts v. Spraker, 77 Ind. 371; Houck v. Barthold, 73 Ind. 21; Huffman v. Canble, 86 Ind. 595; Scott v. State, 64 Ind. 400.

The county board had no jurisdiction of the territory sought, for annexation by the city of East Chicago of the 80-rod strip robbed the territory sought by the city of Hammond of its contiguity.

Taylor v. Ft. Wayne, 47 Ind. 274.

Mr. Thomas J. Merrifield, also for appellants:

There is a fundamental principle of right and justice inherent in the nature and spirit of all constitutional governments at least, which the legislature cannot go beyond without exceeding its rightful authority. This principle the courts will recognize and enforce in order to protect the life, liberty, or property of the citizen from violation in the unjust exercise of legislative power.

The legitimate deduction from the facts as they appear in the record is that the imposition of corporation taxes upon the owners of land embraced within the new limits would be an actual taking of private property for the use of a corporation,—not only for its future use, but to help to pay its indebtedness already created.

The limits of a city or town may be properly extended so as to take in contiguous lands: (1) 30 L. R. A.

when they are platted and held for sale as town or city lots; (2) whether platted or not, when they furnish the residence of a numerous population or represent the natural growth of the city or town beyond its legal boundaries; (3) when they are needed for any proper city or town purpose, such as for the extension of its streets or sewer, gas or water systems, or to supply places for business or residence for its population; (4) when they are valuable on account of their adaptability for prospective city or town uses.

City or town limits should not be so extended as to take in contiguous lands: (1) when they are used only for purposes of agriculture or horticulture and are valuable on account of such use; (2) when they are vacant and do not derive special value from their adaptability for city or town use.

The court erred in holding that the record of the common council of the city of East Chicago could be attacked collaterally, and that the deed to the Chicago & Calumet Terminal Railway Company was admissible in evidence for that purpose.

The records of inferior tribunals, such as justices of the peace, common councils of cities, and boards of county commissioners, showing jurisdiction on their face, are just as invulnerable to collateral attack as those of courts of general jurisdiction.

Howard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding before the board of commissioners of Lake county to annex certain unplatted territory to the city of Hammond. The board decided against the petition for annexation, and the city appealed to the circuit court of Lake county, from which a change of venue was taken to Porter county, where a special judge was appointed to try the cause. The case was heard by the Honorable W. B. Biddle, special judge, and a jury, and the trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the city and her petition for annexation.

The appellee contends that this appeal should be dismissed for the reason that all the persons against whom the judgment was rendered have not been made party appellants. To this contention appellants answer that all such defendants not made appellants, save one, did, within one year after the judgment was rendered, file in this court their written declination to join in the appeal; and that, by proof also filed, it is further shown that said defendant not made a party appellant, and not joining in the written refusal to appeal was also, within the year after judgment, notified of this appeal; asking also that said defendant be now made a party appellant. In this condition of the record, we are of opinion that, while the appeal has been brought with some irregularity of procedure, yet the spirit of the statute regarding the taking of appeals, and also the requirements of our rules and decisions in relation to the same matter, have been practically observed. The purpose of the statute (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 647; Rev. Stat. 1891, § 635) *was to provide that a part of those against whom a joint judgment was rendered might appeal without compelling the remaining judgment defendants to appeal, and yet give all an opportunity to join in the appeal, so that but one appeal might be taken in one case. Notice is consequently provided to be given to those not joining in the appeal. If, however, such parties come voluntarily before this court and decline to join in the appeal, it would seem that as to them all is accomplished that was intended by the statute. As to the party served with notice of the appeal, we think the conclusion must be the same, for it is shown that he might have joined in the appeal had he so chosen.

So far as the interests of the appellee are concerned, the year allowed for an appeal having passed, there can be no appeal but this one. Consequently the decision of this court, when made, will leave the appellee's rights fully and finally determined. The appellee therefore has no interest personal to herself in asking for the dismissal of the appeal. It thus appears that no one, on either side, who was a party to the judgment, has suffered the loss of any right or interest to which he was entitled, and hence no reason remains for the dismissal of the appeal. The case of Gregory v. Smith, 189 Ind. 48, and other cases cited by counsel, are not in conflict with this conclusion. There all the parties were not before the court; here they are before the court, or have refused to come. The reason for the rule there insisted upon does not exist in this case, and hence the rule itself does not apply.

*Several coparties may appeal, but must serve notice on all other coparties, and, if any coparties decline to join, their names shall be stricken out on motion, and they shall thereafter be barred from taking an appeal, and unless they decline to join, they shall be taken as having joined, and shall be liable for their share of the costs.

The appellants' first contention is that the complaint or petition is insufficient, in that it does not show that the owners of the property sought to be annexed to the city had not given their consent to such annexation previous to the bringing of the proceedings before the commissioners. This objection is brought here for the first time. There was no demurrer or motion to make more specific urged to the complaint in the trial court. The statute providing for the annexation of unplatted lands to a city by proceedings before the county board (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 8659; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 8196) does not require that it shall be stated in the petition that the owners will not consent to annexation. The want of such consent is implied in the very nature of the proceeding. If there were consent, such a proceeding would be quite unnecessary, for the city might then annex the land by a simple resolution, as provided in the same section of the statute. In the case of Huff v. Lafayette, 108 Ind. 14, although the question was not directly before the court, the opinion was expressed that it is not essential that the petition should contain a statement that the land owners had not consented to annexation. Virtually a like conclusion as to what should be stated in the petition was reached in the recent case of Chandler v. Kokomo, 187 Ind. 295. Nor, as we think, are the cases cited by counsel for appellants in conflict with this conclusion. In truth, there are but two methods provided for the annexation of lands to cities; one being with the consent of the owners, and one without such consent. If the land is platted, and the plat is recorded by the owner, the law implies a consent and agreement on his part that the land may be taken into the city. If the land is not platted, or the plat not recorded, the owner may file his written consent with the city council, agreeing that the land may be annexed. But in either of these cases the city is also a party to the transaction, and may accept or refuse to accept the land as a part of the corporate territory. But in case the property owner does not consent to annexation,—that is does not make and put on record a plat of his land, or does not file with the city his written agreement that the land may be annexed, while at the same time the city desires such annexation,—then the law provides a method by which the controversy may be tried and settled; and the board of county commissioners is set up as the tribunal before which, subject to appeal, the dispute between the parties may be determined. If, however, the property owner had consented to annexation, there would be no dispute, no controversy, and hence no action before the county board. The law will not presume so vain a thing as that it might be supposed that, though there was consent on the part of the property owners, and though, consequently, the city might have annexed the land by a simple resolution, yet the corporation proceeded to ask the county board, by an adverse proceeding, to do for her what, without delay and without opposition, she might do for herself. The very existence of the controversy, therefore, shows, not only desire for annexation on the part of the city, but also want of consent thereto on the part of the property owner.

It is next contended that, because certain parts of the territory to be annexed are platted, therefore the commissioners had no jurisdiction to act on the petition. In order that any land, platted or unplatted, should be annexed to a city, it is necessary that the land to be annexed should be contiguous to the city limits—that is, that it should actually touch the existing territory of the city. In an action before the board for annexation, this contiguous territory must be unplatted, or, at least, if platted, the plat must, as yet, be unrecorded. However, should there be, within the limits of the territory to be annexed, certain tracts, called "platted lots," not contiguous to the city limits, and hence not recorded, certainly neither the statute nor any good reason would render such circumstance a cause for defeating annexation by the county board. The mere fact of platting, taken by itself, is rather a circumstance looking to annexation. It is an attempt to impress upon the territory an urban character, and is, in so far, an expression of consent to annexation. It would need only in addition, as we have seen, that the lots should be contiguous to the city, and that the plat should be recorded, to enable the city to make the annexation without the action of the board. In other words, the reasons in favor of annexing such attempted plats of lots are greater than those in favor of annexing unplatted lands themselves. But are such subdivisions of land as are here referred to legal plats, or plats such as are contemplated in the statutes? We do not think so. A plat of a town or city, or a plat of land adjoining a town or city, may be acknowledged and recorded in the same manner as a deed. Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 4411, 4418; Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 3874, 3876. It is such "lots laid off and platted adjoining such city" that are contemplated in annexation proceedings and referred to in Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 8658, 8659; Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 8195, 8196. There is no provision for placing any other plats on record, and the recording of any other lots or plats of lots would be a nullity. Taylor v. Fort Wayne, 47 Ind. 374.

The fact, therefore, that certain parts of the territory proposed to be annexed to the appellee city in this proceeding are said to be platted lots, not contiguous to the city, can have no bearing on the result. Such lots are included in the unplatted lands, and can be annexed to the city only as a part of such unplatted lands. Indeed, we may go further. Even if the whole tract sought to be annexed were platted, but the plat not recorded, the common council would have no authority to annex the land without the consent of the owners, and the county board alone could take jurisdiction. It may be observed, in addition, that the petition for annexation in this case, and also the published notice, describe the territory to be annexed by metes and bounds only, and no mention is made of lots; but a description of lands by metes and bounds is a description of the lands as unplatted. The evidence also shows that the lands were in fact unplatted. It is only on the map filed that we notice on a part of the territory, not contiguous to the city, the outlines of platted lands, but there is no evidence of any attempt at placing such plats on record. These tracts are entitled on the map as subdivisions of parts of certain named sections of land, according to the United States surveys. The principal of these divisions is styled: "Robey & Shedd's Addition to Chicago, in Indiana." It is hardly necessary to say that there cannot be a legal addition to Chicago in Indiana, and that none of these subdivisions are platted lots, as contemplated in our statutes. Taylor v. Fort Wayne, supra.

The whole territory to be annexed, then, is clearly to be regarded as unplatted land. The attempts at platting parts of the territory not contiguous to the city as shown on the map filed for inspection by the county commissioners, could be considered only for the purpose of enabling the board to discover the probable fitness or unfitness of the lands for city uses and purposes. The case of Chandler v. Kokomo, supra, cited by appellants in this connection had reference to lands contiguous to the city, and not to attempted plats not contiguous, and hence is not here in point. Contiguous recorded plats may be annexed directly by the city. All other lands are to be regarded as unplatted, and will be treated accordingly in annexation proceedings. In Logansport v. La Rose, 99 Ind. 117, in considering Rev. Stat. 1894, § 3660; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 3197, this court said: "Provision is made for the annexation to the city of contiguous territory, whether platted into lots or otherwise, without the consent of the owners thereof, upon petition of the common council to the board of commissioners of the county." In commenting on this decision, counsel says that the clause, "whether platted into lots or otherwise," is wholly misleading, and contend that it is not warranted by the statute; that the statute provides that only unplatted land may be annexed by action of the county board. We are of opinion, however, that the learned judge who spoke for the court in that case intended by the words "platted into lots," to speak of an unrecorded plat of lots. The common council, without the consent of the owners, has no authority to annex contiguous unrecorded platted lots, but only those the plats of which are placed on record; and if there should be plats made of lands contiguous to a city, but the plats were kept off the record, it would be only by petition to the commissioners that the city could procure the annexation of such lots. In other words, for the purposes of annexation, such lots must, as we have already said, be treated as unplatted lands. And if this is true of a contiguous unrecorded plat, as is the force of what Judge Howk said in Logansport v. La Rose, supra, still more it must be true of noncontiguous plats, which, as we have seen, not only are not recorded, but for whose record the statute makes no provision. They must be treated as a part of the unplatted contiguous territory, and hence fall solely within the jurisdiction of the county board.

It is next contended that the third instruction given by the court to the jury is erroneous. The material part of the instruction complained of is as follows: "It is required that the proceedings should conform strictly to the statutory requirements, and the petition and other documentary evidence have been introduced to prove the regularity of the proceedings; but as no question is raised before you of any want of compliance with the statutory requirements, or that of the contiguity of the territory sought to be annexed, you may find that the proceedings were regular, and that the territory is contiguous to the corporate limits of the city of Hammond." As the record does show that all the proceedings taken by the city were in conformity with the statute, and that this fact was in no way questioned, and as both parties, and all the evidence, documentary and oral, including the plats filed, showed that the territory sought to be annexed was contiguous to the city of Hammond, there could be no error on the part of the court in assuming the existence of such undisputed facts. Carter v. Carter, 97 Ind. 497; Howard County Commrs. v. Legg, 110 Ind. 479. But it is not the contiguity of the territory to be annexed that is disputed by counsel, but whether a part of that territory lying next to the city of Hammond had not already been annexed to the city of East Chicago before the petition for annexation had been presented by the city of Hammond to the county board. This is not a question as to whether the territory sought to be annexed was contiguous to the city of Hammond, or whether the proceedings for that purpose were regular, but rather whether the annexation could take place for another reason, namely, that the part next to Hammond had been already annexed to East Chicago. However the latter question might be determined, it would not affect the correctness of the instruction, which related only to the regularity of the proceedings and to the contiguity of the lands sought to be annexed. These last questions being undisputed, the instruction was correct.

As to whether a part of the territory sought to be annexed to Hammond had already been annexed to East Chicago, and could not therefore be annexed to Hammond, which is the real question here made, the facts presented, and which were all shown by documentary evidence, were as follows: After the common council of the city of Hammond had resolved to present their petition for annexation to the board of county commissioners, and after they had given the statutory notice of their intention to present such petition, describing in the notice the lands sought to be annexed, but before the petition was presented to the board, the city of East Chicago, on the written consent of the owners, annexed by resolution to that city a strip of land 80 rods wide on that part of the lands next to Hammond, which the latter city sought to annex. The effect of this annexation to East Chicago, if valid, would be to defeat the Hammond petition, for if the strip was annexed to East Chicago it could not also be annexed to Hammond; and, as the strip covered all the land in the territory sought to be annexed, which was contiguous to the city limits of Hammond, there would be nothing left to annex to that city, for the contiguity of the remaining territory sought to be annexed would be cut off by the East Chicago strip. The evidence as to the East Chicago annexation proceedings is all documentary, and it is without conflict. The legal sufficiency of this evidence was therefore a question of law for the court; and, if such evidence shows that the action before the East Chicago common council was ineffectual for the annexation of the strip in question, the court might so inform the jury and the instruction would not be erroneous for that reason. American Ins. Co. v. Butler, 70 Ind. 1. The strip of land proposed to be annexed by East Chicago was unplatted. It was therefore necessary, as we have already seen, that a written consent should be filed for its annexation by the owners of the land. Such a written consent was filed by the Calumet Canal & Improvement Company, one of the appellants and owner of the greater part of the land to be so annexed to East Chicago, including the whole of the 80-rod strip contiguous to Hammond. If this strip reached the limits of East Chicago, so that its east end should be contiguous to the limits of that city, there would be no doubt that the written consent of the improvement company and the resolution of the common council of East Chicago would have effected the desired annexation. But prior to this time the improvement company had, by deeds in fee simple, conveyed to the Chicago & Calumet Terminal Railway Company strips of land which taken together, entirely cut off the 80-rod strip from the corporate limits of East Chicago. The railway company did not file any written consent to the annexation of its strips of land to East Chicago. It follows, therefore, that, the owners of all the land sought to be annexed to East Chicago not having filed their written consent to its annexation, the common council never acquired jurisdiction, and such annexation has not taken place. The proceedings before the common council being a nullity, they may be attacked even collaterally, except, perhaps, in case of estoppel, of which there is no question here. Indianapolis v. McAvoy, 86 Ind. 587; Stroesser v. Fort Wayne, 100 Ind. 448; Delphi v. Starteman, 104 Ind. 848; Indianapolis v. Patterson, 112 Ind. 844. While all presumptions will be indulged in favor of the regularity of proceedings before an inferior tribunal when once jurisdiction is shown, yet if it appears that facts essential to jurisdiction are wholly wanting, the presumptions in favor of the action of the tribunal must cease. Olay County Comrs. v. Markle, 46 Ind. 96; Willinson v. Moore, 79 Ind. 897; Smith v. Clausmeier, 138 Ind. 105; Clayborn v. Thompkins (decided at this term) (Ind.) 40 N. E. Rep. 121. Some other questions are discussed by counsel, but we think that in what we have said we have passed upon all questions affecting the merits of the case.

Finding no available error, the judgment is affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, on November 7, 1895, Howard, Ch. J., delivered the following opinion in response thereto:

One of the positions taken by counsel in support of their petition for a rehearing of this case is that the circuit court had no jurisdiction of the appeal from the board of county commissioners, for the reason that the annexation of territory to a city is a legislative, and not a judicial, function, and, as such, in case of unplatted lands, the board of county commissioners is given sole and final jurisdiction in the premises. The proposition so advanced was not urged in the original argument, nor on the trial of the cause, and is now brought to our attention for the first time; but, as it is a question that affects the jurisdiction of the trial court, and also of this court, it is one that will be entertained at any time.

It may be conceded that annexation of territory to a city is a legislative function. This function is exercised by the common council when it resolves to annex certain described lands to the city, and to present a petition therefor to the county board. It must be admitted, however, as we think, that the after proceedings had upon the petition are of a judicial nature. The petition must give the reasons why, in the opinion of the council, the annexation should take place. The sufficiency of such reasons, and whether they in fact exist, calls for the decision of the tribunal appointed to hear the petition. Notice of the presentation of the petition is also provided for, and adverse parties are thus brought in. Whether the proper preliminary steps have been taken, whether the reasons given in the petition are true and are sufficient, seem to be questions calling for a judicial examination and decision. In a similar case (Grusnmeyer v. Logansport, 76 Ind. 549) it was said by Woods, J., speaking for this court, that "the decision of the board in such a case is judicial, and not merely administrative or legislative." But if the board, in considering and deciding upon the petition, acts in a judicial capacity, certainly the legislature may, as it has done in this case, provide for an appeal to the courts to determine whether the city council and the county board have complied with the statutory requirements in the action taken. It is the law itself, as has been said, that fixes the conditions of annexation; and the office of the board and of the court is to determine whether the conditions so prescribed by the law have been complied with. The legislature has expressly provided for such judicial determination by the board and for an appeal therefrom to the courts, and this court has frequently recognized the right to such appeal. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 4224; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 8248; Catterlin v. Frankfort, 87 Ind. 45; Chandler v. Kokomo, 187 Ind. 295; Wilcox v. Tipton (at this term) 43 N. E. Rep. 614. See also Windfall Mfg. Co. v. Emery (at this term), (Ind.) 41 N. E. Rep. 814. See also Wahoo v. Dickinson, 23 Neb. 426.

In Forrythe v. Hammond, 68 Fed. Rep. 774, Baker, J., in passing upon an application made to the United States circuit court for the district of Indiana by one of the appellants in the case at bar, to enjoin the appellee from collecting taxes upon the lands annexed in this proceeding, speaking of the question now under consideration said: "The power to hear and determine whether the conditions prescribed by law for the creation, enlargement, or contraction of a municipal body, exist is judicial in its nature, and may be appropriately conferred upon the courts. The creation, enlargement, or contraction of a municipal body is not the act of the court, but is the act and result of the law. The court simply determines whether the conditions are present which authorize the creation of a municipal body, or the enlargement or contraction of its limits; and, when these conditions are judicially ascertained, the law ex proprio vigore creates the municipal body or enlarges or contracts its boundaries."

Counsel next repeat the contention that the action of the common council of East Chicago, in attempting to annex to that city certain of the lands here in controversy, without first having secured the assent of the owners of that part thereof adjacent to the city, cannot be attacked collaterally in this case. We cited in the original opinion numerous authorities to the proposition that the jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal, as a common council, may be attacked collaterally, and evidence offered to show that the tribunal did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter or of the parties. We have attentively read the acute analysis made of those authorities by counsel, and are still satisfied that the authorities so cited do establish the truth of the proposition stated. We are inclined to think that counsel have not carefully distinguished between facts as to the jurisdiction of a body and facts as to the proceedings and acts of that body after jurisdiction is shown. If there is jurisdiction, then the decision that follows is conclusive, except on direct attack. But jurisdiction itself may always be inquired into, and it is only after jurisdiction is established, both of the subject-matter and of the person, that the decision of the tribunal will be invulnerable to collateral attack. As said by this court in Olay County Comrs. v. Markle, 46 Ind. 96, cited in the original opinion: "The facts which it is said must be shown to exist before the matter can be within the jurisdiction of an inferior court, and which can be inquired into collaterally, are such as in the absence of which the court cannot rightfully hear and determine any question touching the matter in controversy. Hence a recital in the record of such facts may be shown to be false." See also State v. Hudson, 37 Ind. 193. As bearing upon the question, see, further, Rape v. Heaton, 9 Wis. 228, 76 Am. Dec. 269; Thompson v. Whitman, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. ed. 897; Withers v. Patterson, 27 Tex. 491, 86 Am. Dec. 648; Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 84, 88 L. ed. 896; Works, Courts, §§ 20, 23, 25, 26.

In the case at bar it is not doubted that the owners of the lands adjacent to the city of East Chicago, and which it was attempted to annex to the city, had never assented to such annexation, but that the only petition for annexation presented to the common council was by owners of lands not adjacent to the city; yet the claim is made that the question of the right of the council to annex such adjacent lands, and also the nonadjacent lands, is foreclosed by the record. The city council assumed that the petitioners for annexation were the owners of the lands adjacent to the city, and it is said that this assumption is conclusive, although in fact the owners of the adjacent lands did not assent to such annexation. If that contention were good, why could not any person go before a city council, claim falsely to be the owner of adjacent lands, and petition for their annexation to the city, and, if the record of the common council should show that upon such petition the lands were annexed, how could the decision be collaterally called in question? The law, however, gives the council jurisdiction to annex adjacent lands only on the written assent of the owners. It is clear that the common council had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

In cases cited in the original opinion we think it is shown that this court has more than once decided practically the same question here raised, namely, that attempts at annexation of lands to cities made by common councils not having jurisdiction are void, and may be attacked collaterally as well as directly. Indianapolis v. McCahey, 86 Ind. 587; Delphi v. Starteman, 104 Ind. 843; Indianapolis v. Paterson, 112 Ind. 344.

Counsel devote much argument and research to show that where the jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal depends upon a fact which such tribunal is required to ascertain and settle by its decision, such decision in general is conclusive. It needed but a statement of that proposition to establish its truth. But it does not follow that such tribunal, by claiming jurisdiction, can establish it. If the law fixes what is necessary to acquire jurisdiction, the tribunal cannot take jurisdiction not so authorized by law. The law requires notice to parties who are to be subjected to the decisions of the tribunal. Jurisdiction, therefore, cannot be taken without such notice. But as the tribunal must itself decide whether the notice is sufficient, its decision on such sufficiency is conclusive. So, when a petition is to be filed, such petition is necessary to give jurisdiction, and the tribunal, by finding that a petition was filed, when in fact it was not, could not take jurisdiction. But as the tribunal is the only body to pass upon the sufficiency of the petition, whether it is in proper form, has the requisite number of signers, and whether the persons signing have the proper qualifications, etc., its decision on such questions is final.

Stoddard v. Johnson, 75 Ind. 20, one of the leading cases on this subject, and relied upon by counsel, is in harmony with this holding. That case decides that the presentation of a petition for the improvement of a highway gave the county commissioners jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the petition, and that whether the petition were in all respects sufficient was a jurisdictional question which the board had a right to decide for itself. The court, however, is careful to say that it is not to be understood as holding that "any petition, however defective or irrelevant, will be deemed sufficient to invoke the jurisdiction of the commissioners to decide upon its sufficiency, and to impart validity to that decision as against collateral attack." The correct rule is stated in the same case, "that once the jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal is established over the subject-matter and the parties to a proceeding which may be had before it, the same presumptions are indulged in favor of the regularity of its action as prevail in favor of the action of the courts of general powers." Had the common council in the case before us acquired jurisdiction over the lands to be annexed and lying adjacent to the city, and had it also acquired jurisdiction over the owners of such lands, then the subsequent proceedings, however defective, would not be void; but not having acquired jurisdiction over the lands or over its owners, the annexation proceedings were a nullity.

Whether the right of way of the Chicago & Calumet Terminal Railway Company was a fee simple or an easement is not material here. If the strips of land belonging to that company, by whatever name the title may be called, are not within the corporate limits of the city of East Chicago, it is very certain that the land of the petitioner company, and which is separated by those strips from the city limits, is not adjacent to the city. But it cannot rightfully be claimed that these strips are within the limits of the city of East Chicago. They were never annexed, either on petition of their owners or by act of the county board. The city could not levy taxes or street and sewer assessments upon these strips of land, could not make streets or alleys across them, or in fact exercise any jurisdiction whatever over them. The strips are outside the limits of the city, and completely separate the lands of the improvement company from the city limits. How, then, could the city annex those nonadjacent lands of the improvement company? The statute expressly provides that the lands to be annexed to a city shall be adjacent. Had the city jurisdiction of the subject matter? Could the city, by declaring the lands of the improvement company to be adjacent, make them adjacent? If the common council could annex lands separated from the corporate limits by a right of way 100 feet across, why might it not annex lands a mile distant from the city? The conclusion is irresistible that the city had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter; the lands of the petitioner company were not adjacent to the city, and could not therefore be annexed.

The petition for a rehearing is overruled.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

Charles ASHTON et al.

v.

H. W. STOY, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A motion in a district court to require plaintiffs to state more particularly the manner in which they were aggrieved by the action of the board of supervisors in the selection of a county newspaper under Code, § 807, is properly overruled.
2. A person to whom a paper is sent without his knowledge or consent, either expressed or implied, although it is done under a valid contract with a third person, is not a "subscriber" within the meaning of Code, § 807, requiring supervisors to select as the official newspapers of the county those having the largest number of bona fide yearly subscribers within the county.
3. An amendment of the list of subscribers by adding the name of one omitted should be refused by the district court on review of the action of the board of supervisors in the selection of a county newspaper.

(October 24, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Guthrie County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to obtain a designation of the official paper for the county. Affirmed.

Statement by Robinson, J.

The plaintiffs are publishers of the Guthrie, a weekly newspaper published in Guthrie county. In January, 1898, they applied to the board of supervisors of that county to have their newspaper selected as one of the official newspapers of the county under the provision of section 807 of the Code. The board denied the application, and selected the Guthrie Times, a weekly newspaper published in the county by the defendant. From the decision the plaintiffs appealed to the district court. That tribunal found in favor of the plaintiffs and adjudged the Guthrie to be one of the official papers of the county for the year named. From that judgment the defendant appeals.

NOTE.—What constitutes one a subscriber to a newspaper is a question on which we think the above case has no direct precedent. On the question, What constitutes a newspaper?—see Lynch v. Durfee (Mich.) 24 L. R. A. 708.

Mr. E. W. Weeks for appellant.

Mr. E. R. Sayles, for appellee:

Even though the court may have erred in overruling a motion for more specific statement, the error is waived by answering or going to trial.

Cookley v. McCarty, 34 Iowa, 105; Kline v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 50 Iowa, 656; Randolph v. Bloomfield, 77 Iowa, 50; Mann v. Taylor, 78 Iowa, 355.

The law provides that the board of supervisors shall select two newspapers published within the county, having the largest number of bona fide yearly subscribers within the county. One of the questions in this case is as to what constitutes one a "yearly subscriber." In the interpretation of statutes, language used should be given its plain and ordinary meaning, unless a different meaning was evidently intended by the legislature.

Equitable L. Ins. Co. v. Gleason, 56 Iowa, 47; Blackman v. Wadsworth, 65 Iowa, 80; Williams v. Poor, Id. 410.

Bona fide subscribers should not be limited to those only who have subscribed by signing the subscription list of the publisher, but should and does include all those who in good faith have directly or indirectly authorized the publisher of the paper to enter their names upon the subscription list of said paper and whose relations are not by the terms of the contract to be terminated in less than one year.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The list of subscribers within the county filed by the plaintiffs contained 986 names, of which 91 were stricken out by the court, leaving 895 which were counted as those of bona fide yearly subscribers to the Guthrie Times. The list filed by the defendant contained 1,012 names, of which 119 were stricken out, leaving 893 to be counted for the Times, or 2 less than the number counted for the other paper.

1. In the district court the defendant filed a motion to require the plaintiffs to state more particularly the manner in which they were aggrieved by the action of the board of supervisors, which was overruled, and of that ruling the defendant complains. It is said that, if the ruling was erroneous, the defendant waived the error by proceeding to trial. There was nothing in what he did inconsistent with his right to insist upon his exception to the ruling. He did not file any subsequent pleading, and therefore does not come within the rule of Mann v. Taylor, 78 Iowa, 857, and other cases cited by the appellees. But we do not find that the ruling was erroneous. A contest of this kind is triable in the first instance by the board of supervisors of the county in which it is instituted, and formal pleadings are not in all cases required. Runtion v. Haislet (Iowa) 57 N. W. Rep. 902. The issue should be presented to the board for determination, and, when fraud is charged, it should be alleged before the hearing is had and the selection of papers is made. Cory v. Hamilton, 84 Iowa, 597. The jurisdiction of the district court is appellate; and it should try and decide the case made before the board of supervisors. Without deciding that pleadings may not be required by the district court in any case, we reach the conclusion that there was no error in not requiring them in this one.

2. The chief contention on this appeal is based upon the action of the district court in striking from the Times list 86 names which were furnished to the defendant under an agreement made with one W. H. Stiles, but which the court found were not names of bona fide yearly subscribers. The facts in regard to them are substantially as follows: In December, 1892, the defendant and Stiles entered into an agreement in writing, a copy of which is as follows: "This article of agreement, made and entered into by and between H. W. Stok of the first part and W. H. Stiles of the second part, all of Guthrie county, Iowa, witnesseth: That, for and in consideration of the sum of $35 and other valuable consideration, the party of the first part hereby agrees to furnish party of the second part 50 copies of the Guthrie Times for one year, from and including Vol. 10, No. 20, to be sent to such persons in Guthrie county, Iowa, as party of the second part shall direct; also to furnish party of the second part one column of advertising in said paper for same time as above stated, party of the second part to have the privilege of changing the said column at such time and in such manner as he may direct. Said advertisement shall occupy the first column or the upper half of the first two columns of the first page of the said Guthrie Times. Dated this 27th day of December, 1892. H. W. Stok L. R. A.

W. Stok. W. H. Stiles." After that agreement was made, Stiles handed to the defendant a list which contained the names of 44 persons, who appear to have been residents of Guthrie county. The names were placed on the Times subscription list, and a copy of the paper was sent to each of the persons thus designated, before the meeting of the board in January. Stiles then sent to each of them a communication of which the following is a copy, omitting the name of the person addressed: "Guthrie Center, Iowa, Dec. 27, 1892. Dear Sir: Upon retiring from the office of county attorney, I have established a real-estate office in connection with my other business. Knowing the value of a kind word from personal friends when occasion offers, I have taken the liberty to address you as such friend, hoping you may be able to throw some business in my way. As I do not feel like asking something for nothing, I have made arrangements with the publisher of the Guthrie Times to furnish a paid-up subscription to the Times for one year as a partial consideration for any aid you may extend in my behalf among your neighbors. You will find inclosed a receipt in full for one year to the Times. You will find my column advertised in the paper. Respectfully, etc., Wm. H. Stiles." With each communication was sent a receipt which, omitting name of beneficiary, was in the following form: "Guthrie Center, Iowa, Dec. 27, 1892. Received from W. H. Stiles, for —, one and no-100 dollars for subscription to the Times from Vol. 10, No. 20, to Vol. 11, No. 20, year ending January 1, 1894. H. W. Stok." The names of the persons to whom these instruments were sent were duly inserted in them. We do not find that there was anything illegal or unwarranted in the transaction considered by itself. It appears to have been a legitimate effort on the part of Stiles to increase his business, and the defendant had the undoubted right to be a party to it. The question to determine, however, is whether the persons whose names were placed on the Times list by virtue of that transaction, without any ratification on their part of what was done, thereby became bona fide subscribers for the paper. Section 807 of the Code, as amended (McClain's Code, § 438), requires the board of supervisors of each county, at the January session of every year, to select two newspapers published within the county, having the largest number of bona fide yearly subscribers within the county, to be the official papers of the county for that year. The reason for selecting the papers having the largest number of subscribers is to secure as large a general circulation of the official publications of the county among its citizens as practicable in two newspapers. It is therefore provided that the persons to whom the papers are sent shall be subscribers in good faith for a year at least, and not persons to whom the papers are sent temporarily for the purpose of increasing their circulation. The primary meaning of the word "subscriber" is to write underneath, as one's name; but it also means to give consent to something written, to assent, to agree; and a subscriber is defined to be: "(1) One who subscribes; one who contributes to an undertaking by subscribing. (2) One who enters his name for a paper, book, map or the like." Webster, Int. Dict. To become a subscriber to a newspaper includes some voluntary act on the part of the subscriber, or something which is in effect an assent by him to the use of his name as a subscriber. A person to whom a paper is sent without his knowledge or consent, either expressed or implied, is not a "subscriber" within the meaning of the statute. Of the 44 persons whose names were furnished to the defendant by Stiles, but few are shown to have approved the sending of the paper to them, and it is not certain that any had done so when the board of supervisors was required to make a selection of newspapers, while some refused to receive it. We are of the opinion that the district court was fully authorized by the evidence to strike from the list of the Times the names in question.

8. Complaint is made of the action of the court in refusing to permit the defendant to amend his list by adding thereto the name of a subscriber which had been omitted. We think the ruling was correct. The district court was required to try the case on the lists as deposited with the county auditor, and the proposed amendment was not allowable. But, if this were not true, the error would have been without prejudice, as the addition of the name to the Times list would not have changed the result.

We do not find any error in proceedings of the district court, and the judgment is affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY COMPANY, of New York, Appt.,

v.
William EICKHOFF, Respnt.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. A contract of plaintiff with defendant's employer, guaranteeing his fidelity as employee,—construed.
2. This contract of guaranty having been executed at defendant's request, his obligation to indemnify the plaintiff is coextensive with the obligation of the latter to indemnify the employer; and any provisions in the contract between the plaintiff and the employer as to proof of liability, which were binding on the plaintiff in favor of the employer, are equally binding on the defendant in favor of the plaintiff.
3. A stipulation between plaintiff and defendant, that the voucher or other evidence of payment by the plaintiff to the employer should be conclusive evidence against the defendant as to the fact and extent of his liability to the plaintiff,—Held void as against public policy in so far as it made such voucher or other evidence of payment conclusive evidence.
4. Held, also, that the complaint stated a cause of action.

(December 13, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Polk County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover of defendant the amount which plaintiff as surety upon his bond had been compelled to pay because of a shortage in his accounts. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.
Messrs. Van Fossen, Frost, & Brown, for appellant:

The only way to reconcile the seeming confusion arising from the use of the terms "surety" and "guarantor" is to consider suretyship as a generic word embracing all cases in which one person is primarily liable and another person is secondarily liable, and where the person secondarily liable has a remedy over against the person primarily liable.

Guaranty, on the other hand, may be properly embraced within the definition of suretyship as just defined, and is in itself a much narrower expression, being applicable solely to express or special promises to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another.

Wendlandt v. Sohre, 37 Minn. 162; Gallagher v. Nichols, 60 N. Y. 438.

Under the implied promise, as against his principal, the guarantor is limited absolutely to the amount paid under a legal obligation so to do,—the basis of such legal obligation being the contract between the guarantor and the party in whose favor the guaranty was executed.

On the other hand, under an express promise of indemnity, the amount which the guarantor may recover from his principal is governed exclusively by the written contract of indemnity, and may be either greater or less in amount than that which might be recovered in an action on an implied promise.

The legal consideration of the contract of suretyship is to be found in the service rendered to the principal, and if the contract be valid the law looks only to the presumed beneficence of the surety as the cause of his obligation.

Union Bank v. Beatty, 10 La. Ann. 378.

A surety must be under a legal obligation to pay, and have paid, some money, before he can maintain an action at law against his principal.

NOTE.—The above case is believed to decide some questions of guaranty insurance for the first time.

Fay v. Ames, 44 Barb. 387, held that in an action by a sheriff upon a bond given by a deputy sheriff to indemnify the sheriff against his acts or commissions as such deputy, the surety in such bond was held by a judgment against his principal, although no notice of such suit was given to the surety.

If the principal expressly waives failure of consideration, the effect of this is to admit the validity of the contract and to preclude the sureties from availing themselves of any such defense.

Dillingham v. Jenkins, 7 Smedes & M. 479.

Plaintiff's act in becoming guarantor for defendant herein, having been done at the latter's request, gave rise, in the absence of any written agreement, to an implied agreement on the part of the defendant to reimburse plaintiff for all losses incurred by reason of such guaranty.

An elementary principle of all contracts is modus et conventio vincunt legem.

Any one may at his pleasure renounce the benefit of contractual rights when they are introduced entirely in his own favor.

Bonds given to individuals or private corporations are subjects of private contract, by which the parties may bind themselves to any extent or in any manner not violative of public policy or positive statute.

The only ground on which the clause in the contract of indemnity can by any possibility be held invalid is that of public policy.

Public policy has been defined (19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 565) to be that principle of the law which holds that no one can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public or the public good.

Where no principle of public policy is violated, parties are at liberty to forego the protection of the law.

The provision of the contract of indemnity making vouchers showing payment of loss conclusive evidence of the fact and extent of defendant's liability to plaintiff is valid.

First, such a provision is valid as an enlargement of contractual rights under the contract of suretyship existing between plaintiff and defendant.

Second, it is valid as constituting a rule of evidence agreed upon between the parties to govern any and all controversies between themselves arising under the contract of suretyship.

Admitting (as does the demurrer) that all of the allegations of this complaint are true, could a judgment thereon be sustained in favor of plaintiff?

It could, (1) because of the fiduciary relations of the parties; (2) because the subject-matter of the allegations of the complaint relating to a breach of the conditions of the bond are peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant.

Ordinary principals and sureties stand in a fiduciary and confidential relation, and the same principles apply to them as to other parties sustaining fiduciary relations one to the other.

The burden of proof lies with the sureties to show that no loss occurred.

Bank of Washington v. Barrington, 2 Peur. & W. 27.

The subject-matter of the allegations of the complaint relating to a breach of the conditions of the bond are peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant, and therefore, if he wishes to prevent plaintiff's recovery, the burden of proof is on him to give evidence respecting it.

A failure on the part of the defendant to account for, or deliver to his employer, all of the wheat received by him in the course of his employment, throws upon plaintiff (and by virtue of the terms of the contract of indemnity likewise upon defendant in the present action) the burden of proof to show that the failure to account for or to deliver the wheat was due to one of the exceptions named in the bond. Not being able to do this, the employer had a legal right to recover of plaintiff on the bond, and consequently defendant is liable to plaintiff for the amount of the employer's recovery against plaintiff therefor.

If the complaint alleges a state of facts which if proved to be true would establish fraud as a conclusion of law, it is a sufficient allegation of fraud; and the declaration in the pleadings that such acts were fraudulent is in no wise essential and necessary to put the question of fraud in issue.

Mr. Halvor Steenerson for respondent.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, a foreign corporation, is what is termed a "guaranty insurance company," engaged in the business of guaranteeing to employers the fidelity of their employees. This action was brought to recover money alleged to have been paid to the Red River Elevator Company, defendant's employer, upon a bond by which the plaintiff obligated itself to make good and reimburse to the elevator company such pecuniary loss as it might sustain by reason of the infidelity of the defendant as its receiving agent in one of its grain elevators. The appeal is from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts constituting a cause of action.

The material conditions of the bond, which is set out in the complaint, are as follows: "The aforesaid company [the plaintiff] shall, . . . subject to the conditions and provisions herein contained, . . . make good, and reimburse to the said employer such pecuniary loss as may be sustained by the employer by reason of fraud or dishonesty of any of the employees [of which defendant was one] named upon said schedule, as hereinafter provided, in connection with his duties as receiving agent or buyer: . . . Provided that the company shall be liable only for the acts of fraud or dishonesty on the part of the persons mentioned in the schedule, who act as receiving agents, for shortages in their grain accounts, as follows, viz.: There shall be deducted from the total amount of grain and dockage received by the receiving agent at said elevator or elevators screenings and dirt from such grain as has been cleaned at said elevator or elevators, together with the amounts of shipments, based upon weights of grain and dockage at terminals; and if the result shows a deficit, and the shortage is not caused by the various exceptions agreed to, this proof of loss will be accepted as binding on the part of the company. In case where screenings and dirt are burned at an elevator, they shall be weighed before being burned, and the weight reported daily to the employer: Provided that the company shall not be liable for the grading of grain, loss by heating, drying, or leakage of cars, or other damage, shortages caused by defective weighing apparatus or appliances, or for shortages in any elevator or elevators caused by the failure of any of the parties mentioned in said schedule to take dockage enough to make good their weights for grain checks issued, as the employer hereby assumes the risks of its superintendents, traveling men, and officers in giving instructions to its receiving agents as to the amount necessary to take to make good the amount of dockage at terminal points, and the action of receiving agents in taking dockage, the loss by cleaning grain, and the ordinary shrinkage arising from dust in handling of said grain in elevators. And it is further agreed that the company shall not be liable for errors or carelessness in weighing of grain, nor for thefts of grain by persons other than those covered by this bond, nor for robbery or thefts of money from the persons so covered, where proofs of such errors, carelessness, thefts, or robbery are conclusive, as negligence is not covered by this bond."

The complaint alleges that defendant, in consideration of plaintiff's becoming a guarantor for him by executing this bond, agreed to indemnify it against any losses, damages, or expenses it might sustain or become liable for in consequence of executing the bond; also that this bond was in the form requested by the defendant; also that defendant further agreed "to admit the voucher or other proper evidence of such payment by plaintiff as conclusive evidence against himself as to the fact and extent of his liability to the plaintiff." It is further alleged that defendant, within the scope of his employment as receiving agent of plaintiff, issued tickets for, received, and took in, at one of the elevator company's elevators, a certain number of bushels of wheat and dockage, but, of the same, only delivered to the elevator company a certain less number of bushels at the termination of his employment; leaving nearly 1,000 bushels which he never delivered, although requested to do so. The complaint then states specifically the manner in which this shortage was ascertained and made to appear, which was the exact manner provided for in the bond. It then negatives specifically that this shortage was caused by any of the exceptions named in the bond. It is then alleged that the elevator company presented its claim for this shortage to the plaintiff; that the latter was compelled to pay the same, and now holds the elevator's voucher for the same, but that defendant refuses to indemnify the plaintiff for the money thus paid out in his behalf. Counsel for plaintiff asks us to pass upon numerous questions touching the construction of this bond; but as it is a novel contract and its provisions prolix, somewhat obscure, and sometimes apparently contradictory, we deem it unwise, upon a demurrer, to decide much except what is necessary to determine whether a cause of action is stated. Hence we shall confine ourselves mainly to the specific objections made by defendant's counsel to the sufficiency of the complaint.

1. The first objection urged against the complaint is that it does not allege that the plaintiff had a license to do an insurance business in this state, as required by Gen. Stat. 1894, § 8381. Notwithstanding that there would seem to be some decisions holding otherwise, we are of opinion that the case is one where the maxim, "Omnia rite acta presumuntur," is applicable. Noncompliance with the laws of this state will not be presumed, but, if it exists, must be set up in defense. Williams v. Cheney, 8 Gray, 215.

2. The second point urged is that a contract guaranteeing the honesty of employees is void as being against public policy; that it is the duty of all employers dealing with the general public to employ honest agents; that the effect of such a contract as set out in the complaint is to make it a matter of indifference to an elevator company whether it employs honest or dishonest agents to deal with the patrons of the elevator. There is nothing whatever in this objection. The same principle is involved in every bond exacted from a public officer or a private agent as security for the faithful performance of his duties. And it is wholly immaterial whether the guarantor is a private person or an incorporated guaranty insurance company. The advantages of the latter over the former mode of suretyship, if properly conducted, are very apparent. 2 May, Ins. § 541.

3. The third objection is that the stipulation between the plaintiff and defendant that the voucher, or other evidence of payment by plaintiff to the elevator company, should be conclusive evidence against the defendant as to the fact and extent of his liability to the plaintiff, is void as being against public policy. This question is not really involved in this appeal, but, as it is one which will necessarily arise at the very threshold of the trial of the action, it may properly be considered now. The right of a party to waive the protection of the law is subject to the control of public policy, which cannot be set aside or contravened by any arrangement or agreement of the parties, however expressed. Thus, an agreement to waive the defense of usury is void. So, also, according to the weight of authority, is an agreement, made at the time of contracting a debt, to waive the prospective right of exemption. The agreement under consideration is more than a mere enlargement of contractual rights, or the establishment of a rule of evidence. It provides that the plaintiff may, by his own ex parte acts, conclusively establish and determine the existence of his own cause of action. In short, he is made the supreme judge of his own case. The case is not at all analogous to the common provisions in building and construction contracts, by which the determination of some third person, such as the architect or engineer, as to the amount or character of the work, is made conclusive between the parties, in the absence of fraud or mistake. Nor is it at all analogous to a provision in an executory contract for the sale or manufacture of an article to the satisfaction of the buyer, where, if the article is declined, the parties are, in contemplation of law, left in statu quo. In the present case the attempt is to provide that, after the alleged cause of action has accrued, the plaintiff shall be the sole and conclusive judge of both its existence and extent. Such an agreement is clearly against public policy. If the provision had been that the voucher, or other evidence of payment, should be merely prima facie evidence of the fact and extent of defendant's liability,—thus merely shifting the burden of proof, but leaving the defendant at liberty to rebut this prima facie evidence,—although even then a somewhat drastic provision, we do not think that it could be held to contravene public policy. To that extent we think this provision is valid, but, in so far as it assumes to make the voucher of payment by plaintiff conclusive of defendant's liability, it is void.

4. The fourth objection urged against the complaint is that, while the bond only covers acts of fraud and dishonesty, it contains no allegation that this shortage was caused by the fraud or dishonesty of the defendant. Whoever drafted this bond used language very loosely, and employed a great many words to express, or else conceal, very few ideas. But after taking it by the four corners, and considering all its provisions, our construction is that the plaintiff was only bound to make good and reimburse the elevator company for loss sustained by reason of a shortage of grain caused by the actual fraud or dishonesty of the defendant. But the bond also provides how the existence and amount of a shortage shall be ascertained, and that, when thus ascertained, it shall be accepted as evidence that it was caused by the fraud and dishonesty of the defendant, and not by any of the various other causes, enumerated as exceptions, for which the plaintiff was not to be liable; in other words, that a shortage ascertained in the manner prescribed should be prima facie evidence of its existence and that it was caused by defendant's fraud or dishonesty, thus casting the burden upon the plaintiff to rebut this prima facie case by proof. It is not bound to do this by affirmative evidence showing the particular one of the causes enumerated as exceptions, which produced the shortage, but may do it by negative evidence showing that it was not caused by the fraud or dishonesty of the defendant, and hence must have been produced by one or more of the excepted causes. This it may do by a fair preponderance of evidence as to any of the excepted causes, except errors or carelessness in weighing, and thefts by persons other than those covered by the bond, in which cases the proofs must be conclusive. The word "conclusive," in that connection, we think, must be construed as meaning so strong as to require a finding or verdict that the shortage resulted from the cause alleged. This may also be done by negative or circumstantial evidence. So much for the construction of the bond.

The bond having been executed at the request of the defendant and in the form requested by him, it follows that his obligation to indemnify the plaintiff is coextensive with that of the plaintiff to reimburse the elevator company; also, that any provisions in the bond, as to proof of liability, binding on the plaintiff in favor of the elevator company, are equally binding on the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiff against him to recover indemnity for what it has paid in his behalf. Therefore it follows that the complaint alleges facts which, under the provisions of the bond, constitute a cause of action against the defendant; that is, if all the facts alleged are proved on the trial, it would follow, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. That the facts alleged are, in one sense, merely evidentiary and may be rebutted by other evidence, is not material, inasmuch as, by the agreement of the parties, they make out prima facie a cause of action, and if not rebutted they conclusively make it out. Otherwise expressed, under the contract of the parties, the facts alleged prove that the shortage was caused by defendant's fraud or dishonesty. Under these circumstances, an express and direct allegation that it was so caused was unnecessary. The complaint states a cause of action.

Order reversed.

*1. The words "on each side of such roads," as used in Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 34, § 54 (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 2562), relating to fencing railroads, mean the margin or border of the entire grounds or right of way.

2. Where a railroad company has only an easement in its right of way extending through farm lands, and it refuses or neglects to build a fence on the line of its right of way, or inside such line, the adjoining land owner may maintain an action for damages sustained thereby; and it is competent for such land owner to show on the trial of such action, as an element of damages, that he would have the legal right to join his fences with the fence of the railroad company, whether built on or inside of such line, although it is the primary duty of such railroad company to build its fence on the line, margin, or edge of its right of way.

3. Evidence considered, and held sufficient to justify the verdict of the jury.

(November 24, 1896.)

APPPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Stevens County denying a motion for new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's refusal to comply with the statute requiring it to fence its track. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. D. Grover and C. Wallington, for appellant:

In Emmons v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 85 Minn. 508, this court held that the diminution of the rental value of the farm, by reason of defendant's railroad not being fenced, was a proper measure of damages, not to be limited by the cost of constructing and maintaining a fence and new trial was granted.

NOTE.—For duty of railroad company to fence tracks, see also notes to State v. Chicago, M. & N. R. Co. (Wis.) 12 L. R. A. 180; Perkins v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Mo.) 11 L. R. A. 436; Gallagher v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (Conn.) 5 L. R. A. 797.

In Nelson v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 41 Minn. 181, this court defines the term "rental value" to mean the value of the use of the land for any purpose for which it is adapted in the hands of a prudent and discreet occupant, upon a judicious system of husbandry.

In Finch v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 46 Minn. 251, this court confirmed the rule that the difference in rental value might be taken as a basis for estimating damages.

All that is required of defendant is that it should fence its railroad, and not that it should construct its fence as a line fence or on the boundary line between its right of way and the land of plaintiff.

8 Bl. Com. 209; Locks v. First Dis. of St. Paul & P. R. Co. 15 Minn. 850; Gen. Stat. 1874, chap. 84, § 54; Gillam v. Sioux City & St. P. R. Co. 26 Minn. 268; Smith v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 37 Minn. 108.

The land of the plaintiff was not fenced save about 100 acres in one corner of section 2.

The necessity for herding therefore arose, not from the absence of the fence along the line of defendant's road, but from the fact that plaintiff had upon his farm, and there were also upon the farms adjoining, hundreds of acres of unfenced grain, into which the cattle would have strayed had they not been herded.

Mr. William C. Bicknell, for respondent:

The term "road" in general does not mean simply the beaten path. "Road" is used to designate the land over which a way, public or private, is established.

See O'hollar-Potosi Min. Co. v. Kennedy, 3 Nev. 361, 98 Am. Dec. 408.

In Winona & St. P. R. Co. v. Walden, 11 Minn. 515, 88 Am. Dec. 100, it was decided, in ascertaining the compensation to be paid for taking land for railroad purposes, that the cost of constructing fences along the line of the road was not a proper element of damage, where the company is under a statutory obligation to construct such fence.

The language of this statute is broad and general enough to cover damages caused by rendering the abutting land less valuable for the purpose of raising or pasturing animals than it would be if the railroad were fenced as required by the statute.

Emmons v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 35 Minn. 508, 38 Minn. 215.

Buck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought to recover damages arising from the neglect of the defendant to fence its railroad as required by Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 84 § 54 (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 2692). The plaintiff owns two large adjacent stock farms in Stevens county; one containing 640 acres and the other 820 acres. The defendant's road is constructed across each of these farms, for a distance of about 2 miles, without being fenced as required by law. Each farm is used separately, and has its own buildings. The railroad runs nearly through the center of one farm, and divides the other so as to leave a larger portion upon one side than upon the other. About one half of these farms is suitable for raising stock, and the balance is well adapted to the raising of grain. The neglect of the railroad company to erect its fences on each side of its road is a plain violation of a positive law. The omission to erect these fences renders these farms, to some extent, less suitable for stock raising, and deprives the plaintiff from using them with such advantage and profit as he otherwise would. And this result would tend to impair its rental value and make the farm less valuable. Finch v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 46 Minn. 250. If the verdict in this case rests upon sufficient legal evidence as to the damages arising from the impaired rental value and the depreciation in the value of the farm in consequence of the defendant's neglect to fence its road, we cannot properly disturb the verdict. There were only three witnesses, including the plaintiff, in his behalf, and none on behalf of the defendant. The witness Brittondall testified as to the amount of damages to the premises by reason of the railroad's not being fenced, but added that he also based his opinion as to such damages upon the fact that the whole tract was not fenced on all sides. Of course, such evidence could not constitute the proper basis for estimating the legal measure of damages, as against the defendant, by reason of its neglect to fence its road. Whether there were fences or not on all of the other sides of the farm except where the railroad was bound to fence was immaterial, and could not properly be considered in adding to or lessening the damages to which the defendant was liable by reason of its neglect to fence its road as required by law. None of the evidence of this kind, however, was objected to, and therefore no question of error arises upon its admission. If there was no other testimony upon the subject, it would only show that the verdict of the jury is not sustained by the evidence. It is claimed by the defendant that the testimony of the witness Sanders is of the same character. There is considerable doubt about this being a fair construction of his evidence. It can be asserted with much force that his testimony related to the fence which the railroad company was bound to build, and not to fences upon other sides of the premises. But, whichever view of the testimony is correct, it is not necessarily material in the determination of this case. The plaintiff did not so testify, but did testify as to the impaired rental value of the land by reason of there being no railroad fence there. His uncontradicted and unimpeached testimony was sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury in this respect, unless his further explanation of the manner of estimating the rental value of the lands is of such a character as to nullify his previous testimony, and make it, as a whole, incompetent and insufficient as a basis for estimating proper damages. In estimating the difference in the rental value with and without the fences being there, he based it upon the ground that the fences would be on each side of the track, 75 feet from the center of the track, which would make the fence on the division line between the parties. He also testified as follows: "I base my estimate of the rental value upon the proposition that I have a right to join my fence to that of the railroad company, built directly upon the line between my land and the railroad right of way, so I can have the use of the railroad fence on one side."

The statute to which we have above referred, in regard to railroad companies fencing their roads, reads as follows: "All railroad companies in this state shall within six months from and after the passage of this act build or cause to be built good and sufficient cattle-guards at all wagon crossings, and good and substantial fences on each side of such road." Evidently the witness based his opinion upon the assumption that it was the duty of the railroad company to build its fences on the margin or outer line of its right of way; that is, upon the division line between him and the railroad company. Is not this the true construction to be placed upon the language of the statute? In Webster's International Dictionary the word "side" is defined to be the "margin, edge, verge, or border of a surface, the bounding line of a geometrical figure; as, the side of a field, of a square or triangle, of a river, of a road." This word "side" is not here used in a technical sense, but as it is commonly and properly understood. The meaning of the words "on each side of such road" is that the fence must be built on the margin or border of the entire railroad right of way, and therefore on the division line between such right of way and that of the adjoining proprietor. This construction evidently gives full force to the spirit and intent of the language of the statute, as well as to the usual and popular meaning attached to the words. While the authorities are almost if not quite universal that the primary object of the statute requiring railroads to fence their roads is one of a police nature, yet possibly it might have been the legislative intent that such a fence would also serve as a partition or division fence. Probably the railroad company could not, especially when it has only an easement in the right of way, be compelled to build a partition fence as such, yet it may constitute one; and we think that the adjoining land owner should share the right to join fences with the fence of the railroad company, whether such a fence is denominated simply a "railroad fence," or a "partition fence," and which incloses upon one side the land of the adjoining owner, and as a matter of legal right such owner would have the benefit of it, as a partition fence. This was the view taken of the statute of Illinois which required the railroad company to erect and maintain fences on both sides of its road. People v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 21 Ill. App. 38. And it was there held that the words "on each side of the road" meant the margin or border of the entire grounds used as a roadway. To the same effect are Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Zeigler, 108 Ill. 806, and Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 121 Ill. 488. In the latter case the court uses the following language: "The question now is, whether a railroad company, in complying with the statute in question, may build a fence required thereby anywhere on its right of way except on the line between its right of way and the adjoining owner's land, or, what is the same thing, is the fence now constructed, after notice given, 10 feet within and upon its right of way, and that distance from the adjoining owner's land, a compliance with the provisions of the statute in regard to fencing railroads? It is thought it is not. The statute is so plain in this regard, it seems idle to attempt to construe it. It makes it the duty of the company to erect a fence on 'both sides of the road,'—that is, so as to embrace the right of way; and so this court has held in Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Zeigler, 108 Ill. 804. In that case it was decided a fence built 2 feet inside of the right of way was not constructed in conformity with the statute. The suggestion that the 'sides of its road' may mean the mere 'track' upon which trains are moved is too absurd to be seriously considered." See also Thornton, Railroad Fences, § 185. Of course, where there are such natural or physical formations of the ground as to make it difficult or impossible to comply with the statute, the company would not be liable for not fencing on the margin of its right of way. But where no such obstacles intervene the railroad company is bound to build its fences on the margin of its right of way, and the adjoining land owner has a right to connect his fences with its fences whenever he builds up to them. Even if it is not the object of the law to furnish the land owner with a partition fence on one side of his land, yet its provisions and requirements do embrace the protection of the cattle of the owner of a stock farm as well as the safety of travelers upon its railroad, or the lives of its employees.

But there is another ground upon which the order of the trial court should be sustained. There are a long line of cases, commencing with that of Winona & St. P. R. Co. v. Waldron, 11 Minn. 515 (Gil. 392), 88 Am. Dec. 100, holding, as the settled doctrine of this court, that when a railroad company, whether as a condition or limitation of its right to take land for its road, or as a police regulation, is required to fence its road, the damages for the taking of the land should be assessed upon the basis of the construction of such fences by the railroad company. In this case we must assume, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, that the railroad company has merely an easement in its right of way, and that the fee of the land, subject to the easement, remains in the plaintiff. If the railroad company had built a fence on the line of its right of way, the plaintiff would have been entitled to join his fences to it so as to inclose his land, without having to build another and parallel fence on the same side of his land. Even if we should concede that the railway company is not bound to build its fence on the line of its right of way, it is clear that it cannot, by building it inside of the line, upon its right of way, deprive the land owner of the benefit of it as a line fence. If the company builds its fence inside of the margin or edge of its right of way, the land owner may extend his fences so as to connect with it. Having had his damages assessed upon the basis that it, and not the land owner, will build the fence between him and it, the railroad company cannot be heard to say that he cannot join his fences to its fence for the purpose of inclosing his land; and this right to thus connect his fence is an element which may be taken into account in estimating the value of the use of the land. Hence the railroad company should do one of two things,—build its fence on the line of its right of way, or if it build on such right of way, inside the line, allow the adjoining land owner to join his fences to the railroad company's fence. If the railroad company desires an unobstructed use of its entire right of way, it can easily accomplish this purpose by building its fence on the margin thereof, and thus do away with the obligation to permit the adjoining land owner to join fences with its fence. It cannot defeat the right of the adjoining land owner to have his fences connect with its fence, by refusing to build a fence either on its line or inside of it, although, as we have stated, its primary duty is to build its fence on the margin of its right of way. Therefore it seems to us that the plaintiff's testimony in regard to the grounds upon which he based his damages was substantially correct. It was the legal right of joining his fences with the defendant's, either on the exact line, or near to and inside of it, which he considered the primary element in estimating his damages, and the matter of expense in building a few feet of additional fence would be of too little consequence to seriously affect the amount of damages one way or the other, and certainly not to the disadvantage of the defendant's rights. It was therefore properly submitted to the jury, and, there being no evidence to the contrary, we should not disturb the verdict. It is a matter of great importance that railroad companies fence their right of way, because it involves the safety of the lives of the traveling public, as well as the interests of the adjoining land owner; and, if they continually and obstinately persist in defying the plain provisions of a positive law, perhaps obedience to its requirements will be quickened and obtained by being mulcted in damages in favor of an injured land owner, the rental value of whose adjoining farm is thus impaired year after year. There being no prejudicial errors in the case, the order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

Mitchell, J.

I concur in the result, but do not wish to commit myself to the proposition that under the statute a railroad company is required to build its fences on the line of its right of way. The determination of that question is not necessary to the decision of this case, and therefore I place my concurrence upon the second ground suggested in the opinion. A railroad company, at least where it has a mere easement in the land, cannot, by building its fence inside of the line of its right of way, deprive the owner of the fee from joining his fences to theirs. Leaving part of the right of way outside of their fence amounts to implied authority to the owner of the fee to inclose that part left outside with his adjoining land, by connecting his fence with the railroad fence.

the assured after his death, he never having had a wife or child, is to be construed as meaning his next of kin according to the statute of distributions, which in Georgia, when the decedent leaves no widow, is the same as the statute of descent or inheritance. Although the heirs, as beneficiaries of the policy, are to be ascertained by reference to the statute, they become beneficiaries, and take their interest by virtue alone of the contract in their behalf embraced in the policy, and NOTE.—Who are "heirs" within the meaning of life insurance policies.

- II. Other words combined with the word "heirs."
- III. Widow as an heir.
- IV. Insured as heir of beneficiary.

I. In general.

The above decision in the case of HUBBARD, P. & CO. v. TURNER is fully sustained by the prior decisions on the subject.

The person who would take intestate personal property under the statutes will be entitled to the proceeds of insurance payable to the "heirs at law" of the insured, and the proceeds will not go to his estate. Mullen v. Reed, 64 Conn. 240, 24 L. R. A. 664.

The word "heirs," designating those to whom insurance shall be paid in case there is no will, is held, in Northwestern Masonic Aid Assn. v. Jones, 154 Pa. 90, to mean the legal heirs designated by the statute of distributions to the exclusion of the executor and creditors of the estate.

The word "heirs" in a certificate of life insurance, 30 L. R. A.

where there is no context to explain it, means those who would, under the statutes of distribution, be entitled to the personal estate of the insured. Johnson v. Knights of Honor, 38 Ark. 265, 8 L. R. A. 732.

The phrase "legal heirs," as used in the by-laws of a benefit society describing the person to whom payment shall be made if the member has not disposed thereof, means next of kin, or perhaps in a still broader sense includes dependents as well as next of kin. Therefore when a member left neither widow nor child, his mother, who was dependent on him at the time of his death, was held entitled to the fund. Britton v. Supreme Council of R. A. 46 N. J. Eq. 102.

The word "heirs," describing the beneficiaries of a policy of life insurance, is held to mean the persons entitled to the surplus of personal estate under the statute of distributions, who in this case were the widow and children, and that they were entitled to the insurance in the proportion indicated by that statute. Leavitt v. Dunn, 56 N. J. L. 309.

The word "heirs" in the constitution of a benefit not in any respect by virtue of the statute. Wherefore, on the death of the assured intestate without having assigned the policy, they take its proceeds as purchasers, and not as heirs or distributees. This being so, these proceeds are no part of the estate of the assured, and are not subject to the claims of his creditors, unless by reason of some fraud, actual or constructive, committed by the assured upon their rights in taking out or keeping up the policy, the creditors are equitably entitled to follow and reclaim money invested in the policy which ought to have been used or reserved for use in satisfying their demands.

(June 18, 1894.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Chatham County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in a proceeding by the creditors of Charles C. Hardwick, deceased, to subject the proceeds of a policy of insurance upon his life to the payment of their claims. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. Minis, W. W. Osborne, and Pope Barrow for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Cabaniss & Willingham, Saussy & Saussy, and Harrison & Peeples for defendants in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Charles C. Hardwick, in his lifetime, took out a policy of insurance, payable to his "heirs or assigns." The contest in the present case was between his creditors and his heirs at law, who were his sister, two nieces, and a nephew (he never having had a wife or child), over the fund derived from this policy, which had been paid over by the company to Hardwick's administrator. The policy was issued in 1869. The debts due the contesting creditors were made in 1890. Hardwick had never assigned the policy, and died insolvent. There was no evidence that he was insolvent when the policy was taken out, nor that any of the premiums association naming "widows, orphans, and heirs or devisees" as persons to be benefited, is not used in its restricted sense, but includes anyone to whom the estate of the deceased might pass by operation of law. Lamont v. Grand Lodge Iowa L. of H. 31 Fed. Rep. 177.

In holding that a policy of life insurance payable to the heirs of the insured is not assignable by him, it is said in Goeling v. Caldwell, 1 Lea, 454, 27 Am. Rep. 774, that the word "heirs" in the case of personality means next of kin.

A policy payable "to heirs or assigns" does not belong to the estate of the insured, but if no assignment has been made it will inure to the benefit of his heirs. Mullins v. Thompson, 51 Tex. 7.

A description by a foreigner of "legal heirs" as beneficiaries in a certificate means his wife and children if he has any, especially where his will gives to his wife all his personal estate including this benefit. Kaiser v. Kaiser, 13 Daly, 522.

The meaning of the words "heirs at law" in a benefit certificate made in a state in which the parties reside will be construed according to the laws of that state when brought in question before the courts of another state. Mullen v. Reed, 64 Conn. 240, 24 L. R. A. 664.

A policy payable to the wife and children of the insured, or in the event of their prior death to his legal heirs, was held, where one of the children died during the life of the insured, to be all payable to the wife and surviving children. Covenant Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Hoffman, 110 Ill. 608.

A by-law declaring that the funds shall go to the heirs of the member of an insurance association if he has made no other directions was also held operative in Keener v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 38 Mo. App. 648, where the insured had designated as beneficiary a woman with whom he was living unlawfully, but whom he named as his wife, although he had a lawful wife. The fund was held in this case to belong to the heirs, according to the language of the by-laws, and not to his wife alone, to be distributed among them as their interests might be determined by the law.

The words "legal heirs" in the provisions of a benefit association designating those to whom the fund shall be payable in case the member has failed to designate beneficiaries should be construed with reference to the general purpose of the association, and where that is to provide a fund for the families, heirs, or representatives of deceased members should be taken to describe the person or persons who would take such property in cases of intestacy. Walsh v. Walsh, 66 Hun, 297. In this case 80 L. R. A.

the widow is held entitled to share with brothers and sisters.

An only son and heir at law was held entitled to the whole fund where life insurance was payable to persons designated, provided they were heirs or members of the family of the insured, and, in the absence of designated persons or of any widow, to the guardian or trustee of children, or, if there are no children or assignees, to his heirs. Tyler v. Odd Fellows' Mut. Relief Asso. 145 Mass. 134.

A designation of the mother of a member of an insurance organization to receive "the $1,000 my heirs are to receive" is entirely inoperative on the mother's death during his life, and the reference made by him to his "heirs" does not amount to a designation of them as recipients, as it is made merely by way of recital, with the express intent to designate his mother only. Hellenberg v. District No. 1 of I. O. of B. B. 94 N. Y. 580.

It is said in Silvers v. Michigan Mut. Ben. Asso. 94 Mich. 93, that under a statute prohibiting policies in favor of beneficiaries who have no insurable interest, and providing that in such case the insurance shall be payable to the heirs of the deceased member, heirs who had no insurable interest are included; but this statute was not actually involved in the case.

II. Other words combined with the word "heirs."

The cases here are not altogether alike.

The word "heirs" as used in a policy of life insurance must be held to mean distributees or next of kin—especially when it is associated with the words "executors" and "assigns." Tompkins v. Levy, 37 Ala. 263. This was said in defining who were the "heirs" of a wife who died during the life of the insured, and in holding that her children did not succeed to her statutory privileges in respect to the policy.

HUBBARD, P. & CO. v. TURNER holds that life insurance payable to "heirs or assigns," where the insured is unmarried and childless, will go free from debts of the insured to those persons who are his next of kin according to the statute of distributions, which in Georgia is in such a case the same as the statute of descents, but will not be part of the assets of the estate.

This case distinguishes Rawson v. Jones, 33 Ga. 453, which held that a policy payable to the insured, "his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns" will confer upon his legal representatives a right to the money as part of his estate for distribution if there is nothing to show any contrary intent.

But where no certificate was actually issued: a upon it were paid when he was insolvent, nor that any of the present claims against his estate were in existence at any time when any premium was paid. The judge, upon the above state of facts, rightly decreed that the heirs were entitled to the proceeds of the policy in the administrator's hands. What is the meaning of the word "heirs" as used in this policy? Under our statute of distributions, which is the same as the statute of descent or inheritance, when the decedent leaves no widow this word certainly means "the next of kin." Code, §§ 2484, 2570. As the assured was unmarried and childless, he, doubtless, intended to provide for those who would, at the time of his death, be entitled to his estate as his legal distributees, unless during his life, he should choose to divert in another direction the proceeds of the policy by himself assigning it. As he never did assign it, and as he remained unmarried up to the time of his death, we are satisfied the intention remained with him to the last, that his next of kin should take the proceeds of the policy by virtue of the contract he had made in their behalf with the insurance company. Reference is had to the statute simply for the purpose of ascertaining who are the beneficiaries of the policy; but when thus ascertained, their right to the money is not derived from the statute, but solely from the contract embraced in the policy. In other words, they take the proceeds, not as heirs or distributees of the deceased, but as purchasers. This being so, the proceeds of this policy were not, under the facts of this case, any part of the estate of the assured, and therefore not subject to the claims of his creditors. Had any fraud, actual or constructive, been committed by the assured upon their rights, either in taking out or keeping up the policy, they might be equitably entitled to follow and reclaim money which the assured had invested in the policy, and which ought to have been used, or reserved for use, in satisfying their de-member who had paid his dues for several years, and the beneficiary fund was declared in the act of incorporation to be for the "families, heirs, or legal representatives" or persons whom the member might appoint, it was held that this expression included those who would take such property, as in case of intestacy. Bishop v. Grand Lodge, R. O. of Mut. Aid, 112 N. Y. 627, reversing 43 Hun. 472.

Where the word "heirs" was coupled with the words "legal representatives" in naming beneficiaries, they were regarded as equivalent to "next of kin," and did not make the insurance money part of the assets of the estate of the insured. Hodge's Appeal, 8 W. N. C. 200, 9 Ins. L. J. 709.

Where a policy was payable to "heirs or representatives," and appeared to be intended for the benefit of the family of the insured, it was held to be payable to the heirs or next of kin, in this case to an only child. Loos v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 41 Mo. 538.

But those words in an endowment policy payable to the insured himself or in case of his prior death to his "heirs or representatives" were held to make the proceeds a part of his assets under the control of his administrators and subject to the debts of the estate. The decision seemed to turn chiefly on the effect of the word "representatives," which was given its legal meaning of administrators. Wason v. Colburn, 99 Mass. 342.

As to meaning of words "legal representatives" in such policies, see also Rose v. Wortham (Tenn.) post, —, and note.

A benefit certificate payable to devisees, "or in the event of their prior death to the legal heirs or devisees of the holder," is held to make the legal heirs the beneficiaries if there are no devisees in existence. Smith v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn. 24 Fed. Rep. 685.

A certificate payable to "devisees, . . . or in the event of their prior death to the legal heir or devisees of the certificate holder," is construed to be a promise to pay to devisees, if there are devisees to take, and if not then to pay to heirs. Accordingly it was held payable to heirs when there was no will and the nonexistence of devisees, rather than the death of devisees, was held to be the essential thing. Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Sears, 114 Ill. 108.

III. Widow as an heir.

While there is some diversity of decisions, nearly all cases hold that the word "heirs" in describing the person to whom life insurance is payable will include a widow of the insured.

A widow is included among the "heirs at law" within the meaning of an insurance certificate payable to the heirs at law of the member, where, under the laws of the state, she would be entitled to a distributive share. Mullen v. Reed, 64 Conn. 240, 24 L. R. A. 664.

A certificate payable to the "heirs" of the insured is held to include the widow as one of the heirs where the statutes make her an heir as to personal property. Lyons v. Yerex, 100 Mich. 214.

The widow is held to be one of the heirs who are entitled to the benefit of life insurance, in Shultz v. Citizens' Mut. L. Ins. Co. (Minn.) 61 N. W. 331.

To the same effect it is decided in Hanson v. Minnesota Scandinavian Relief Assn. (Minn.) 60 N. W. 1091, where it is said: "The word 'heir' as used in the policies is to be construed not in its technical common-law sense, but as including all those who succeed to personal property under the statute of distribution, including of course the widow."

That a policy payable to "heirs" goes to the widow of the insured when there are no children was decided in Jameson v. Knights Templar & M. Mut. Aid Assn. 13 Ctn. L. Bull. 272, cited in Bates's Ohio Digest, p. 212.

A policy payable to "legal heirs" was held to be payable to the widow of the insured where under the statute she would take the whole of his personal estate because he had no children. Lawwill v. Lawwill, 29 Ill. App. 643.

So, if the insured has no children, his widow is the sole beneficiary under a policy payable to "legal heirs" where he evidently intended it for the benefit of his family. Kaiser v. Kaiser, 18 Daly, 522.

So, a certificate payable to "heirs" of the insured "or as he may direct in his will," where the charter of the organization prescribes that the beneficiaries should be the widow and children, was held to be controlled by the charter, and in the absence of any children the widow was held entitled to the money. Kentucky Masonic Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 13 Bush, 426.

And a designation of "heirs" in an application for insurance, while the beneficiaries are further described as "wife or daughters," while the by-laws make the benefit payable to the widow, or if there is no widow to the guardian or trustee of minor children, is held to give the widow the entire proceeds of the insurance to the exclusion of daughters. This is on the ground that the answers of the member are fairly construed to agree with the by-laws. Addison v. New England Commercial Travelers' Assn. 144 Mass. 591.

A policy payable to the "devisees or to the heirs mands. No reference is here intended to the class of cases falling under section 2820 of the Code. Where the assured directs the money due upon a policy to be paid to any of the persons designated in that section, even though he may be insolvent, and use in paying premiums money to which his creditors are equitably entitled, no person can defeat the policy. This is so because the law so declares in express terms. But granting that in the present case the creditors of Hardwick might, for any equitable reason, have been entitled to follow and reclaim money invested in this policy, no such equitable reason appears in the facts. It was not shown that, by reason of insolvency, or by reason of his using his means in paying premiums upon the policy, they lost or were deprived of any money which they ought or otherwise would have received.

It was strenuously insisted for the creditors that the true construction of the words "heirs or assigns," as used in this policy, would make it mean that the policy was payable to the legal representatives, or to the estate, of the deceased; and that, therefore, its proceeds were assets for the payment of his debts in the due course of administration. We confess that the question is not altogether free from doubt, but we have given the instrument that construction which, in our judgment, best accords with the real intention and purpose of the assured. Men much more rarely take life insurance for the benefit of creditors than for the benefit of those to whom they are related at law" of a member who makes no will, and who leaves a widow, father, mother, sisters, and brothers, but no descendants, is held to be payable to his widow, where the statutes make her the sole heir of his personal property. Alexander v. Northwestern Masonic Aid Assn. 126 Ill. 556, 3 L. R. A. 161.

This case refers to and quotes from a prior decision in Gauch v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 83 Ill. 251, 30 Am. Rep. 554, where it was held that a widow, who by the Illinois statutes is entitled to one third of all the personal estate of an intestate when there are children, is to be regarded as a doweress and not as an heir, and therefore a policy of life insurance payable to "legal heirs" is held to belong to the children exclusively. The cases are distinguishable, and the court in the later case does not express either approval or disapproval of the earlier decisions; but it is out of harmony with nearly all the other cases on the subject.

Yet another very similar decision is found in Iowa where a policy of life insurance payable to "legal heirs" is held not to give the widow any rights therein where the insured left one child and it did not appear whether he had the right to change the beneficiary or not, while the statutes give the widow a certain interest in excess of one third of the estate as an heir only in the contingency of a lack of issue surviving. Phillips v. Carpenter, 79 Iowa, 600. The court said: "No one having children speaks of his wife, in contemplation of her survivorship, as his heir," and held that whether the term "legal heirs" was used in the technical sense, or not, the wife was not intended to be included.

Likewise in Arkansas it is held that a widow is not one of the heirs of her deceased husband within the meaning of an insurance policy on the life of her husband which is payable to his heirs where the statutes give her half of his personal estate as dower absolutely and independently of creditors, and provide for distribution subject to debts and dower. Johnson v. Knights of Honor, 58 Ark. 255, 81 L. R. A. 732.

That a divorced wife is not one of the heirs of a member of a mutual benefit society who can share in the fund payable to heirs, was decided in Schonfield v. Turner, 76 Tex. 324, 7 L. R. A. 139.

A policy payable to "heirs," taken by a widower with one child, who marries again, is upon his death payable to both widow and child, where the statutes of distribution give the widow a certain share of his estate as next of kin. Young Men's Mut. L. Assn. v. Pollard, 3 Ohio C. C. 877.

On the other hand, an Ontario case decides otherwise, holding that a certificate payable to "legal heirs," taken by a widower who had two children and who afterwards married again and died leaving a childless widow, is payable to the children to the exclusion of the widow. Mearns v. Ancient Order of United Workmen, 22 Ont. Rep. 34, 30 L. R. A.

A designation by the member of a mutual life insurance association of his wife or lawful heir, naming her by his own name with the prefix "Mrs.," was held, where his wife subsequently died and he married again without making any new designation, to give the fund to his daughter and lawful heir to the exclusion of his second wife. Day v. Case, 43 Hun, 179.

For interpretation of designation by the member, see also Addison v. New England Commercial Travelers' Assn. 144 Mass. 591.

A widow was conceded to be one of the "legal heirs" of the insured, in the case of Wilburn v. Wilburn, 83 Ind. 55, but that point was not actually decided because it was not contested.

IV. Insured as heir of beneficiary.

The widow was also regarded as one of the heirs, in Walsh v. Walsh, 66 Hun, 297; Keener v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 38 Mo. App. 543; Leavitt v. Dunn, 56 N. J. L. 308; Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Hoffman, 110 Ill. 603.

On the death of the wife during the life of her husband, where his life insurance was payable to her, her heirs, or assigns, he is to be regarded as one of her heirs, under the Pennsylvania statutes, and his share will pass by a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors. U. B. Mut. Aid Soc. v. Miller, 107 Pa. 162.

Substantially the same decision was made in Deginger's Appeal, 83 Pa. 387, where insurance on the husband's life was payable to the wife, her executors, administrators, and assigns, and she died during his life. It was held that his estate upon his death was entitled to share with his children under the statute of distributions.

The right of the estate of the insured to share in the proceeds of a policy of life insurance which was payable to his wife when she died during his lifetime was also sustained in Anderson's Estate, 85 Pa. 202, where the policy was payable to the wife, her executors, administrators, or assigns.

Likewise in Hutson v. Merrifield, 51 Ind. 24, 19 Am. Rep. 722, where it was payable to her "or legal representatives."

A policy payable to the wife and two children named, "share and share alike, or their legal representatives," excludes the theory of survivorship among the beneficiaries, and on the death of one of the children during the father's life his interest in the policies goes to his heirs at law, and the father whose life is insured may as one of his heirs take a share of the interest. Macanley v. Central Nat. Bank, 27 B. C. 215.

Cases as to right to proceeds of insurance payable to wife of insured or to other person who dies during his life are not considered here, except so far as they interpret the meaning of the word "heirs."

by ties of blood or affection. In support of the creditors' contention, the case of Rauzon v. Jones, 53 Ga. 458, was relied upon. There the policy taken out by Jones was payable to "his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns." He had no wife or child, never having been married. This court held that this policy was payable to the legal representative of Jones, and therefore was legal assets in his hands for the payment of debts and for distribution. Judge Trippe stated that the introduction of the word "heirs" did not affect the construction, and added: "The terms 'heirs,' 'executors,' and 'administrators' are not words that are used where those who are next of kin are intended to have a right given them directly by the instrument,—for instance, as purchasers,—but are the terms usually employed to signify that, if they take at all, it is not directly, but through an administration." The use of the words "executors and administrators" manifested a clear intention on the part of the assured to vest the proceeds of the policy in his legal representatives, and the mere fact that the word "heirs" was used in connection with these other words would not authorize a court to give the policy a construction which would defeat the obvious intention of the assured, because, taking altogether the language employed, it was just such language as in other instruments disposing of personal property would vest it in an administrator. We think the present case is different from the one just cited. Here there were no words manifesting a positive intention that the proceeds of the policy should become a part of the estate of the assured. If the word "assigns" had not been used, but only the word "heirs," there could be no doubt the next of kin would be entitled to its proceeds. The effect of inserting the word "assigns" was not to make the assured the owner of the proceeds, but merely amounted to a reservation to him of the power to appoint who should take. With this word in the policy, the assured could have cut off those who were to become his heirs at law by appointing others in their place while he yet lived. As he did not do this, their right under the policy as purchasers remained intact and complete.

We are aware there are decisions contrary to the conclusion we have reached in this case, but we are nevertheless satisfied with the correctness of our judgment, and will mention a few authorities which, to some extent, sustain it. The case of Mullins v. Thompson, 51 Tex. 7, in which it was held that a policy payable to the "heirs or assigns" of the assured was assignable by him, but, not having been assigned, the heirs were entitled to its proceeds on the death of the assured, is very much in point. In Pace v. Pace, 19 Fla. 488, the words "for the benefit of the estate of the insured" were, by the aid of extrinsic evidence, construed to mean that the policy was for the benefit of a minor child, and that its proceeds did not go to the administrator of the assured. The supreme court of Missouri, in Loos v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 41 Mo. 588, held that the words "heirs or representatives," in a policy of life insurance, entitled the heirs or next of kin to the money, as against the executor or administrator of the assured, it appearing from the context that the object of the assured was to make provision for his family. So, in Hodges's Appeal (Pa.) 9 Ins. L. J. 709, it was held that the phrase "heirs and legal representatives," in an insurance policy, meant the next of kin, and that the fund was no part of the decedent's estate which his administrator was entitled to receive. In Griswold v. Sawyer, 125 N. Y. 411, it was held that the words "legal representatives" may be shown to be the dependent family of the assured, and not his administrator, overruling Griswold v. Sawyer, 56 Hun, 12. In Weiser v. Muehl, 81 Ky. 888, it appeared that the assured took out a policy payable "to his heirs;" and it was held that the persons answering that description at the time of his death were entitled to the proceeds of the policy in preference to the widow, to whom the assured had specifically bequeathed the amount due on this policy by will. As to the meaning of the words "heirs" and "legal heirs," as used in policies of life insurance, see Wilburn v. Wilburn, 88 Ind. 55, and Gauch v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 88 Ill. 251, 80 Am. Rep. 554. Many of the above cited cases strongly support the interpretation we have given the word "heirs," as used in the policy before us; and the reasoning of these cases, and the authorities they cite, also, as stated above, sustain our conclusion that the creditors of Hardwick were not entitled to the proceeds of this policy as against the claim of his heirs at law.

The fact that the money was paid by the insurance company to the administrator, while it may tend to show that, in the opinion of the managers of the insurance company, he was the proper person to receive it, will not prevent the heirs from claiming the money, if they are really entitled to it, as we have held.

Judgment affirmed.

(58 Ohio St. 52.)

- *1. Where the boundary lines of a corner lot extend along one of its two abutting streets a materially greater distance than along the other, a presumption arises that it fronts upon the latter street.
2. Where the shape and dimensions of a corner lot raise a presumption that it fronts on a particular street while vacant, such presumption continues after it has been improved, unless rebutted by the style and character of the improvements.
3. Where a single business house is erected on a corner lot, the front of which, according to its plan of construction or style of architecture, accords with the presumed front of the lot while the latter was vacant, such front is not changed, although the building is provided with doors and halls that permit an extensive use of the other, or lengthwise, street, and afterwards such use is freely made by the occupants of the building.
4. Where a dwelling house is erected on a corner lot, the front of which, according to its plan of construction or style of architecture, corresponds with that of the lot when the latter was vacant, the original front is not changed, although the building is provided with entrances opening on the lengthwise street, that are extensively used by its occupants, and appurtenant structures erected that are accessible only from the latter street. Such use of the side street is incidental only to the occupation of the dwelling house.
5. Where both a dwelling house and a business house are erected separately on a corner lot, the former fronting on the breadthwise street, and the latter on the lengthwise street, so much of the lot as the latter building occupies, or as is clearly used as appurtenant to it, should be held to front on the street which it faces.

WRITS of error to the Circuit Court for Lucas County to review judgments affirming judgments of the Court of Common Pleas restraining the city from proceeding to collect certain assessments which had been levied against the property of complainants for street improvements. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to frontage assessments in general, see Raleigh v. Peace (N. C.) 17 L. R. A. 330, and note, 30 L. R. A.

Messrs. Charles F. Watts, Horace A. Merrill, and Julian H. Tyler, for plaintiffs in error:

If the property abutted upon the street, it was subject to the assessment.

Where, however, lots have a double frontage, as corner lots are generally held to have, both fronts may be assessed.

While the foot front assessment may not be as equal in theory as that by a valuation, or as that of an apportionment according to the benefits, in practice it is found to be more equitable than either, because of the difficulty of applying the principle of the other methods so as to obtain equality.

Harland v. Columbus, 50 Ohio St. 474.

If a lot does not, as a matter of fact, front upon the street improved, and therefore cannot, as a matter of law, be assessed, how can the council give that lot a frontage it does not actually have? If the council can declare that to be a fact which is not a fact, it must by virtue of some statutory provision.

Mays v. Cincinnati, 1 Ohio St. 269; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 324; Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 370.

The levy of an assessment by the foot front of the property bounding and abutting upon the street improved, as provided by section 2264 of the Revised Statutes, or by the foot front of the property fronting or abutting thereon, as provided by section 3 of the Taylor law, is a valid exercise of the power of assessment, and has been so declared by the supreme court of this state.

The defendant in error must be presumed to have known that, whatever method of assessment was adopted, the law required it to be uniform and to affect all the owners and all the property abutting upon the improvement alike.

Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Connelly, 10 Ohio St. 165.

Yet he refused to speak. He made no effort to notify the council of its mistake of fact. By his silence he allowed the council to believe that there was no mistake of fact and that his property was legally subject to the levy of an assessment by the mode adopted.

By remaining silent when he could and should have spoken, he acquiesced in that mistake and he cannot speak now that he would.

We admit, our property was liable to be assessed for some amount; that that amount is the sum of the rate set forth in the petition, multiplied by the number of feet front our lot has. That amount the circuit court has found, and it has been paid to the city of Toledo by the defendant in error. This gave us the right to have the collection of the remainder of the amount assessed, restrained.

v. Thomas, 26 Ohio St. 246; Stephan v. Daniels, 27 Ohio St. 544.

Bradbury, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Toledo, in the course of proceedings instituted for the improvements of certain of its streets, sought to assess the "cost and expense" incurred for such improvements upon the abutting property "by the foot front of the property bounding and abutting upon the improvement," pursuant to the provisions of § 2264, Rev. Stat. passed March 5, 1890 (87 Ohio Laws, 48). This court in the case of Haviland v. Columbus, 50 Ohio St. 471, was required to construe this language, and it there held that where a municipal corporation sought to assess the cost and expense of improving a street upon the abutting property by the front foot, regard must be had for the real front, which was a matter of fact depending on the manner in which it had been laid out, built upon, occupied, and used by the owner, and where a lot abuts lengthwise on an improvement, but fronts breadthwise on another street, it should be assessed by such improvement to the extent of such lengthwise frontage only. And in the case of Sandrock v. Columbus, 51 Ohio St. 817, this court held that in the case of an unimproved lot lying on a corner of two streets and extending along one of them 37½ feet and along the other 150 feet, it should be deemed to front on the former street.

The city of Toledo, in the cases under consideration, reargues these questions, especially those in the Haviland Case, and asks their reconsideration. The reasons advanced by counsel for the city are not without force, but do not convince us that either of those two causes was erroneously decided, and we reaffirm the doctrine they announce.

Each of the three cases under consideration, however, has special features that distinguish it from both those cases. While we do not hold that a corner lot upon which a single structure stands, or a single main structure with appropriate or incidental minor ones appurtenant to it, may not have two fronts,—one on each street,—yet that can only occur under special or peculiar circumstances, which we do not attempt to forecast. The question of frontage should be determined according to the ordinary acceptance of that term. There is nothing technical or abstruse connected with the subject. The common knowledge of mankind is usually amply sufficient to determine the fact whenever a controversy arises respecting the front of a lot. Where a lot is unimproved, a glance at the plat is generally enough; if the lot is rectangular, with two of its parallel lines distinctly longer than the other two, the usual form of town and city lots, the mind at once recognizes it as fronting on the street which runs along its shorter line, or end. And although the lot may not be rectangular, yet if its length along one street is clearly and considerably greater than along the other, the same recognition occurs. Doubtless a lot may have such shape that the question of its frontage might be of difficult solution, but such cases are exceptional, and should not affect the general question.

In the case of a corner lot in the usual form, therefore, a natural inference arises that its narrow side, or end, is its front, because that accords with our common knowledge and experience of such matters. This constitutes a presumption of fact. Should the lot be improved, this presumption continues, unless there is something in the nature or character of the improvement to rebut it. Doubtless the plan or style of the structure, in connection with the uses for which it was designed, will in many instances overcome this presumption, and in every instance becomes a material factor in determining the question of frontage. The fact, however, that the structure, whether designed for a dwelling house or a place of business, is so arranged that the side street, so called, can be used for the convenience of the occupants of the building, and is, in fact, extensively used, are not enough to establish a change of front. In the case of dwelling houses, especially, it is within the common knowledge of every one that, in many instances, its occupants habitually use what they call and understand to be a side entrance, without any notion that such use, in contemplation of law, changed the front of the structure, and consequently, the front of the lot on which it stands. There can be no change of the front of a town or city lot in law, unless there is a change in fact made. The actual and the legal frontage must be identical.

Where a single building has been erected on a corner lot, the style of architecture alone, or that together with the purpose for which it was designed, and the arrangement of the grounds and out-houses, may indicate that its real front is towards the side street, so called. In such case if the character of the improvements satisfactorily indicates that the entire lot is to be used with reference to or in connection with such improvements, a fair inference would arise that the entire frontage was changed. But if the character of the building or other improvements, fronting on the side street discloses that only a portion of the entire lot was intended to be used as appurtenant thereto, then the frontage of that part only which was to be so used would be changed; unless where such structure being placed on the original front end, would in changing the front of that part of the lot necessarily change the frontage of all that part of the lot which might lie between the structure and the rear end thereof. And doubtless wherever a structure fronting on the side street appropriated a strip through to the other side of the lot, all the lot lying between the strip so appropriated and its rear end would have its frontage changed.

In applying these principles to the several cases under consideration, it is necessary to ascertain the form of the several lots and the character of the improvements made on each and existing at the time the city began proceedings to improve the respective streets upon which the lots were claimed to abut.

In the case of Toledo v. William Shell the city contended that the defendant's lot abutted on Erie street as well as on Stickney avenue, and attempted to assess the lot for its full length along the former street, to pay the cost and expense of improving that street. It is a rectangular corner lot extending along Erie street 120 feet, and along Stickney avenue 27½ 80 L. R. A.

feet; upon it stands a dwelling house so constructed that its front was consistent with that of the lot when vacant. Another building fronting 16 feet on Erie street and extending back 27 feet then stood on said lot, the front half of which its owner, the defendant, occupied for a shoe shop. This building stands upon the rear end of the lot, where the lot is considered with reference to its front on Stickney avenue. According to the principles which we hold should determine the fact of frontage, the lot in question, if vacant, would front on Stickney avenue, and as the style of the dwelling house is as consistent with the continuance of that frontage, its erection did not effect a change in that respect. The other building however, clearly and distinctly fronted on Erie street, and its front end was designed for and used as a work shop for the owner; a use nowise appurtenant to the dwelling house, but on the contrary, was independent thereof. The style of this building and the chief purpose for which it seems to have been designed indicate a fronting on Erie street. What in relation to this building is unmistakably a front door, opens immediately upon Erie street, and affords the only direct entrance to the shoe shop. This latter building stands on the rear end of the lot when viewed from Stickney avenue, and extends back nearly its entire breadth, so that the building substantially covers the rear 16 feet of the lot. To that extent the lot should be held to front on Erie street, and the assessment made accordingly.

In the case of Toledo v. Eversman the agreed statement of facts shows that the real estate in the petition described, being lot number 610, in Oliver's addition to the city of Toledo, Lucas county, Ohio, as laid out and platted, abuts 50 feet upon Broadway street, and 150 feet upon Logan street, and is situate on the south-westerly corner of said streets.

Broadway street runs northeasterly and southwesterly, and is intersected at right angles by Logan street.

The entire lot is covered by a brick building, 120 feet of which, extending northwesterly from Broadway street, is three stories in height, and the northwesterly 30 feet thereof is two stories in height. This building is used by the plaintiff for the purpose of carrying on the business of dealing in hardware and stoves, and of manufacturing heating furnaces.

The first story of the three-story part is divided into two store rooms, which extend the entire length of said part; the store rooms are connected by two archways in the brick partition extending between the same. In that part of each of the store rooms abutting upon Broadway street there are large double doors which are used for the purpose of ingress and egress from and two said Broadway street, and on each side of said doors are large windows, which are used for the purpose of displaying the goods and wares of the plaintiff, and for the purpose such windows are generally used.

In that part of the three story building abutting upon Logan street there is no door except at the northeasterly end thereof, which is used for the purposes of ingress and egress from and to said Logan street.

Adjacent to this door and in the two-story part, is a doorway 12 feet in width leading into a hallway, and connected with stairs by means of which access is had to the second and third floors. To this hall there is access from the store rooms above mentioned.

The two-story portion of the building is used by the plaintiff as a barn in which are kept his horses and wagons, used by him in carrying on his business and for no other purpose, and from this opens onto Logan street a door wide enough to admit the passage of a horse and wagon. At the northwesterly end of said store rooms there is a large double door about 5 feet in width through which access is obtained to the two-story part. Westerly of this doorway, and at the northwesterly end of said store rooms, there is a window.

The entire two-story building is used by the plaintiff in carrying on his business, and for no other purpose. The third floor of the building is used as a public hall, and access to the hallway above mentioned is had both from the Logan street entrance and from the store rooms above mentioned.

At the corner of Broadway and Logan streets there is a window extending upon Logan street about 2½ feet and upon Broadway street about 2½ feet. On the second floor of both buildings, and upon the third floor of said building, there are windows upon both the Broadway and Logan street sides.

The record contains a photograph of the building, showing that, according to its style of architecture and plan of construction, it fronted on Broadway, but was provided with openings admitting of the free use of Logan street; and the evidence given by the owner himself shows that the Logan street entrances were freely used in connection with his business. One of those entrances was the chief means of ingress and egress to and from a public hall in the third story. Another of them seems to have been the only entrance to that part of the building used for a barn.

The circuit court found that the building and consequently the lot fronted on Broadway alone. This holding was correct. The building was an entirety,—a single structure designed for conducting a particular business—and of such form and style that, according to the common understanding and notion respecting the subject, it fronted on Broadway. One side extended along Logan street, and naturally the use of that street would be both convenient and advantageous to its occupants. In view of this situation the owner in the plan of construction provided facilities for such uses, and afterwards those facilities were used at their pleasure by the owner, his employees and customers; this use, however, neither changed the front of the building, nor gave it a double front; it was a use incidental merely to a structure thus favorably situated whose plan of construction gave it a recognized front in another direction. Where a building has been constructed after a plan that indicates unmistakably or even with reasonable certainty its front, the circumstances that facilities for side entrances have been provided and are afterwards used by its occupants and those who for social or business purposes visit the house can operate only slightly, if at all, to effect a change in this particular.

In the case of Toledo v. Annie Beckler, an agreed statement of the facts discloses that "the real estate in the petition described being lot number 206, in Knowler's addition to the city of Toledo, Lucas county, Ohio, as platted and laid out, abuts 40 feet upon Knowler street, and 106.26 feet upon Maumee avenue. Knowler street extends east and west, intersecting Maumee avenue at right angles, and said lot number 206 is situate upon the northwest corner of said streets. The north end of said lot abuts 40 feet upon an alley.

"May 5, 1890, there was, and continuously ever since said time there has been, upon said lot a two-story frame dwelling, with a one-story addition which was at said time, and continuously ever since has been, used and occupied by said plaintiff as her residence.

"There was not at said time, nor is there now, any other building upon said lot, except a small shed which was and is located upon the line of said alley, and was and is used for storing fuel.

"The narrow part of the two-story, or main part of the house, faces Knowler street, and the long side thereof faces Maumee avenue. In the two-story part facing Knowler street there was and is a door from which extends a walk leading to the street; in the two-story part of the house facing Maumee avenue there is no opening except windows; on the northerly side of the two-story part there was and is a one-story addition, which is not as wide as the main part of the house; in the side of this addition, facing Maumee avenue, there is a door opening onto a porch, which extends along this side of the addition, and there was and is a walk leading from said Maumee avenue to said porch, and on a line with said door there was and is a door opening from the sitting room, in the main part, onto this porch; the first floor of the two-story part is divided into three rooms and a hallway; the door facing Knowler street opens into a hallway; the hallway has therein a stairway and two doors the one leading to the sitting room, and the other into what is used as a parlor; the room next to Knowler street is used as a parlor or front room, and has windows on the Knowler street and Maumee avenue sides; behind the parlor is an ordinary family sitting room, with a bedroom off it; the one-story addition constitutes the dining room and kitchen, from which is a door leading onto the porch above described, and a door in the north end, opening into a small woodshed.

"There was not, at the time aforesaid, and has not been, any fence around this lot. The gables of the two-story part are upon the north and south ends thereof; the gable of the one-story part is on the north end thereof, and the roofs on both parts of the building slope east and west.

"The part of the house facing Knowler street is what is known as the front elevation, and there is no other front elevation thereto.

"It was further admitted by the plaintiff that if she were called upon to testify, she would testify that the entrances to her house from Knowler street and from Maumee avenue were both used for the purposes of ingress and egress to and from said house, but that the family most frequently used the entrance on Maumee avenue for said purpose."

In addition to this agreed statement, a photograph of the premises was introduced in evidence, which plainly shows that the dwelling house, according to the plan of its construction, should be held to front towards Knower street. The circuit court held that the premises fronted on Knower street. We think this holding is correct. According to the principles we hold should be applied to determine the question of frontage, the lot, if vacant, would front on that street. A dwelling house stands on the lot, the front of which, while it is not indicated with entire clearness, may fairly be held to face in the same direction. It has an entrance from Maumee avenue which its occupants and many others having occasion to visit them find more convenient than the entrance from Knower street, and on that account use it more frequently than they use the latter entrance. This use, however, as we have seen, is entitled to very little weight upon the question of frontage in any case, and especially respecting the front of a dwelling house, where the use may vary with the caprice of its occupants, or change entirely with a change of tenants.

Judgment accordingly.

Spear, J., concurring:

I assent to the judgments rendered in these cases, and others of like kind decided at the same time involving the same question, on the principle of stare decisis. The judgment in the Haviland Case, 50 Ohio St. 471, pronounced June 20, 1893, was rendered by a divided court. It received, at the time of its rendition, neither the assent of my judgment nor my vote, although no formal dissent was entered of record. April 24, 1894, the question was again presented to this court in Sandrock v. Columbus, 51 Ohio St. 817, and the same principle announced, resulting in a reversal of the judgment below.

Time and space are not taken here to give a statement of the ground of dissent of the minority, for, as it seems to me, such statement would be regarded, using common parlance, as a "back number," even though it might be possible to demonstrate that some other construction of the statute would have been sounder, more scientific, or more philosophical, or more scholarly. The law was settled long ago; the rule given, admittedly an equitable one, was acquiesced in by the people at large, and by most of the courts of the state, and numerous controversies, in Columbus and other cities, were adjusted and improvements made in consonance with the rule given, on the understanding that the question was settled and ended; and it would seem that it should be so regarded. Stare decisis, et non quiescit movens.

Shauck, J., dissenting:

Attention is due to the terms of the statute conferring upon municipalities the power of assessment which has been exercised in these cases. It provides that "where an improvement is made of an existing street, alley, or other public highway . . . the costs and expenses shall be assessed by the council on 30 L. R. A.

the abutting . . . lots and lands in the corporation . . . by the foot front of the property bounding and abutting on the improvement." Rev. Stat. § 2264. The assessment contemplated is not upon buildings, but upon lots and lands. It extends to all abutting lots and lands. It extends to all abutting lots whether they be used and occupied or vacant. In the case of lots that are built upon, the power is not limited by architectural elevations nor by modes of ingress and egress. To make lots and lands subject to the assessment it is necessary only that they bound and abut on the improvement.

The relation of these words of the statute shows plainly enough that the general assembly used them in their popular sense, regarding "bounding" and "abutting" as synonyms, and "front" as indicating the extent to which a lot is bounded by the highway for whose improvement the assessment is made. And it is equally clear that the general assembly shared in the popular understanding that a corner lot fronts on both the streets by which it is bounded. That this is the sense in which these words are used is indicated, not only by the provision quoted, but by many others relating to the control and improvements of municipal highways, such as the requirements as to the frontage owned by those who sign petitions for the improvements, consents to the granting of franchises in streets, and the provisions relating to the cleaning of streets, and the construction and maintenance of sidewalks and sewers. It is provided (Rev. Stat. § 2333) that no tax shall be imposed for the construction of a sidewalk upon property whose owners "have contracted and maintained sidewalks in front of such property." Will it be said that the owner of a corner lot is exempt from the construction of a walk upon one front of his lot because he has constructed and maintained a walk upon the other? If it be answered that the use of the plural, "sidewalks," prevents the application to that section of the views here expressed by the majority, the reply is that in view of the legislature it requires a plurality of walks to occupy the fronts of corner lots.

The provisions of sections 2379 and 2383, inclusive, are more than suggestive. They authorize municipalities to assess the expense of constructing sewers "upon the feet front of the lots and lands, by or through which" they pass. Certainly a lot cannot front upon a sewer, as the word "front" is defined by the majority in these cases. It is provided in section 2383 that "the council may exempt from assessment such portion of the frontage of any lot having a greater frontage than its average depth, and so much of any frontage of corner lots as to it may seem equitable, and charge the deficiency caused by such exemption on the whole frontage tax pro rata." In view of this provision, the meaning of these words is not a matter of inference, but the subject of express declaration. Section 2269 prescribes rules for making assessments. As amended March 27, 1894, it contained the following provision: "And if, in making a special assessment by the foot front, there is land bounding or abutting upon the improvement not subdivided into lots, or if there be lots numbered and recorded, bounding or abutting on said improvement and lying lengthwise on said improvement, the council shall fix in like manner the front of such land to the usual depth of lot, so that it will be a fair average of the depth of lots in the neighborhood, which shall be subject to such assessment." Before the assessments whose validity is now considered (March 11, 1887) the section was amended by omitting the italicised portion thereof. That provision was inserted in the act of 1884 so that corner lots might not be assessed upon the whole of their long frontage. It was omitted from the act of 1887, so that they should thereafter be assessed upon such entire frontage. That this is the true legislative meaning of the terms under consideration is scarcely less manifest in other provisions of the statute.

The use of the terms in this sense is not only in conformity with popular usage, but it is technically accurate. To front, is to be in a confronting or opposed position; to face toward; to meet.

A somewhat extended examination seems to warrant the observation that there is but one exception to the numerous cases in which, either by express holding or by clear implication "to front" and "to abut" have been adjudged to be equivalent phrases within the meaning of the assessment acts. The act under which extensive street improvements were undertaken in the city of Columbus (73 Ohio Laws, p. 153) was held to be unconstitutional; but it was also held that those who promoted the improvement were estopped to assert its invalidity, and that as to them the act should be enforced according to its terms. Section 24 of the act provided that the city council should "not have the right to authorize any improvement unless the owners of two thirds of the feet front of the property abutting on any street or avenue to be improved shall petition the city council for the privileges of this act."

In Columbus v. Sohl, 44 Ohio St. 479, this court held that the petition presented to the council in that case was sufficient, although the record showed that to reach that result it was necessary to count the lengthwise frontage of all the petitioners, even of those whose lots were vacant. The 14th section of the act provided that the cost of the improvement should be "assessed equally per front foot upon the property fronting or abutting on the improvement," and this court adjudged that assessments upon the entire long frontage of corner lots were valid even though they exceeded the value of the lots after the improvement was made. The provisions now under consideration (§ 2264), were before this court in Lima v. Cemetery Assn. 42 Ohio St. 128. It was held that a cemetery fronts upon an alley. The conclusion is based upon the obvious consideration that all lands front all the highways by which they are bounded. How that case could have afforded any other reason for the conclusion reached, does not appear.

In Cincinnati v. Senanogood, 46 Ohio St. 296, this court determined a question arising out of the amendment of section 2269 above shown. The question was whether the assessment for the improvement of a street upon which a corner lot fronts lengthwise is valid for the entire length of that frontage as provided in the act 80 L. R. A.

of March 11, 1887, or whether it should be restricted as required by the act of March 27, 1884. The court reached the conclusion that the extent to which the property could be assessed was determined by the statute in force at the time of the passage of the improvement ordinance. The contention of counsel and the decision of the court are vanity unless, under the act of 1887, the assessments now before us are valid.

The report by Sayler, J., in Shehan v. Cincinnati, 25 Ohio L. J. 212, shows that in that case the superior court, taking the same view of the statute and of Cincinnati v. Senanogood, as it has taken in rendering the judgments now under review (considered with these cases and reversed) adjudged that the assessment was valid upon the entire long frontage of a corner lot. At about the same time that court, under the same statute, rendered a similar judgment in Elder v. Cincinnati. The judgment which it then rendered was affirmed by this court May 28, 1892, 27 Ohio L. J. 875.

In Des Moines v. Dorr, 81 Iowa, 89, the validity of an assessment upon the entire long frontage of a corner lot was upheld. The court disposed of the point now considered as follows: "These premises were situated at the intersection of Sixth and Walnut streets, being a corner lot with 22 feet front on the latter street, and 180 feet fronting on the former. It will thus be seen that the lot had two fronts, as every corner lot necessarily has, because its face is opposite to and fronts on two different streets."

The same conclusion was reached in Morrison v. Hershire, 82 Iowa, 271, the court saying: "Some of them are corner lots, and are so situated that the streets bounding each one of them upon its end and side are improved. These lots, in fact, front on two streets—have a double frontage, and are therefore properly so assessed."

The same conclusion was reached in Lawrence v. Killam, 11 Kan. 499, under a statute providing that "the assessment shall be made on all lots and pieces of ground abutting on the improvement according to the foot front thereof."

In People v. Adams, 45 N. Y. S. R. 270, the frontage of a corner lot was thus determined: "A corner lot faces or fronts on two streets; it has a frontage on both streets, though the house built upon it may have its principal door for egress and ingress facing only one street."

It would exhaust patience to cite all the cases in which this view of the words and phrases now under consideration has been taken. A few more of them are Bonsell v. Lebanon, 19 Ohio, 418; Springfield v. Green, 120 Ill. 274; Wilbur v. Springfield, 123 Ill. 490; Scott County v. Hinds, 50 Minn. 204; Michener v. Philadelphia, 118 Pa. 535; Joyes v. Shadburn, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 892; Weeks v. Milwaukee, 10 Wis. 258; Tracy v. Chicago, 24 Ill. 500; Bacon v. Savannah, 91 Ga. 500.

It is apparent that the legal meaning of these terms had been judicially settled before they were used in the statute before us. Here is no occasion for the application or discussion of rules of interpretation supposed to be of an equitable nature. The constitutional validity of the statute is confessed and the meaning of its provisions is entirely clear. Its enforcement according to its obvious intent is required by that subordination to the law which is due from all courts and especially from those that are not otherwise subordinate. Nor do the conclusions reached by the majority in these cases leave much occasion for pointing out the confusion that is to ensue. These observations, perhaps, sufficiently intimate the opinion that the judgments of the superior court of Cincinnati should be affirmed, those of the circuit court of Lucas County reversed; and that Haviland v. Columbus should be overruled.

Burket, J., dissenting:

I base my dissent in all of these cases upon the following considerations:

These cases, with others, were brought here for the purpose of having this court again consider the principles of the Haviland Case, and if possible overrule that case, and therefore I feel at liberty to here consider the question anew.

In that case I contended, and I now contend, that the matter of assessments upon corner lots for street improvements is governed alone by the Constitution and statutes on that subject. That there is no statute warranting the rule of the Haviland Case, and that corner lots are liable to be assessed by the foot front on their entire length and breadth, subject to the restriction that the assessment cannot exceed the amount of the special benefit, as was held in the Chamberlain Case, 34 Ohio St. 551, and also subject to the restriction of § 2288, Rev. Stat. as to double assessments within a period of five years, and subject further to the 25 per centum limitation, when that limitation is applicable, subject still further to such other limitations in special cases as are provided by statute.

The majority having again affirmed the principles of the Haviland Case, the question must be regarded as settled, and to be followed by this, as well as the lower courts, unless changed by the general assembly as to future assessments.

CCROSS APPEALS from the Chancery Court in a proceeding to charge plaintiff's claims against Frederick A. Mr. Cortlandt Parker for respondents.

Magie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The decree appealed from charged upon lands of Caroline M. Babcock the sum of $921.50, with interest from January 10, 1889, in favor of William P. Standish, and directed that unless that sum, with costs, should be paid within a stated time, said lands should be sold to raise what was thus charged thereon. Caroline M. Babcock, who was one of the defendants below, appeals from the decree, on the ground that it was erroneous to charge her lands with any part of that sum. William P. Standish, who was complainant below, appeals from the decree, and contends that it was erroneous in not charging on said lands a larger sum. These appeals have been argued together.

To make intelligible the conclusions I have reached upon the case presented, a brief statement of the pleadings, showing the issues between the parties, is necessary. The bill was filed by Standish against Caroline M. Babcock and Frederick A., her husband. It charged that Frederick A. Babcock, Joseph W. Moyer, and Standish, in 1884, entered into a written agreement of partnership in the business of purchasing and selling coal lands in Schuylkill county, Pa.; that, under that agreement, lands were purchased and sold at a profit, and the proceeds of the sale were received by Frederick A. Babcock; that, in 1890, Standish filed a bill in our court of chancery, against Babcock and Moyer, for an accounting and settlement of the partnership affairs, and it was thereon decreed, on October 10, 1892, that Babcock was indebted to Standish in $4,941.73, said sum being Standish's share of said profits; that said profits arose from the purchase and sale of lands in said county which were bought in 1884, and sold to one Frisbie on January 8, 1889, for $15,000, which sum was then paid to said Babcock; that on January 10, 1889, said Babcock, out of said sum so received, paid off a mortgage which then encumbered lands of his wife, amounting to $3,500, of principal and the interest then due thereon. The bill also charged that the decree remained unsatisfied, and that Frederick A. Babcock had property which could not be reached by execution, and there was a prayer for discovery against him. As to Caroline M. Babcock, the prayer was that the sum paid by her husband in satisfaction of the mortgage on her lands should be made a charge and lien on said lands in favor of Standish, and that they might be sold to raise and pay him that amount. The bill did not call for answers without oath. Caroline M. Babcock, by her answer, denied knowledge or information justifying belief whether the agreement of partnership set out in the bill was ever entered into, or whether, under it, lands were purchased and sold at a profit, or whether the proceeds of any such sale were collected and received by her husband. She admitted that Standish had filed a bill in the court of chancery against Moyer and her husband for an account and settlement of the affairs of the alleged partnership, but averred that it was also filed against her and one Edward M. Babcock, and, after having been duly tried, had been dismissed upon the merits as to her. She admitted on information and belief that such a decree as was set out in the bill had been made in that cause. She denied knowledge or information in respect to the purchase of land and the subsequent sale to Frisbie, or the receipt by her husband of $15,000 as the proceeds of that sale, and she left complainant to make proof thereof. She admitted that the mortgage on her lands had been paid off, but denied that it was paid by her husband, averring that, being under foreclosure, it was paid by her son Edward M. Babcock. By the answer, she further averred that the previous bill of Standish had charged that her husband had applied part of the money received by him from the sale to Frisbie to the satisfaction of the mortgage on her lands, and had prayed relief by charging as a lien upon her said lands the amount so paid, and by selling said lands to discharge such lien. She averred that, by her answer to that bill, an issue was presented upon those charges, which was duly tried, and a decree made thereon that the bill should be dismissed as against her, with costs. She thereupon claimed that the matter thus established by that decree was conclusively established as against Standish, and prayed to have the same benefit of this defense as if she had pleaded the decree in bar. To this answer was appended an affidavit containing the customary averments of affidavits to answers, and the further averments that the proceedings and decree in the former suit were correctly set forth in the answer, and that a copy of the decree annexed to the answer was true and correct. There was no affidavit or certificate of counsel such as is required to be annexed to a plea or demurrer (Rev. p. 109, § 27); but the complainant below filed a general replication, and the cause went to hearing upon those pleadings.

The evident purpose was to interpose the defense of res judicata. If the answer in that respect stood for a plea, the burden of proving its truth devolved upon the party pleading, for it is plainly an affirmative plea. 1 Dan. Ch. Prac. 718; Swayze v. Swayze, 37 N. J. Eq. 180. If it is to be deemed a defense set up by answer, it must be sustained by proof; for, if this answer was called for and put in under oath, it will not be evidence of new matter set up in defense. In either aspect, proof of the former suit, including the pleadings, which would show what issues were there tried or triable, and the decree thereon, was necessary to support the defense. The case before us discloses no proof whatever of this sort. The learned vice chancellor, who tried this case, indicates by his opinion that he conceived that he had before him the proceedings in the former cause, and that they showed that the dismissal therefrom of Caroline M. Babcock was ordered by the court ex mero motu, and without considering the issue presented by her answer, because she was not a proper party. If the record disclosed such a dismissal, it would probably fail to establish the truth of the plea or answer. If the record did not disclose the ground of dismissal, extrinsic evidence could make it clear. Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606, 24 L. ed. 214. But here we have not the record of the former cause, and, in its absence, there is nothing to support the defense of res judicata.

Although this defense was not made out by proof, it is also true that the proof which appears to have been made in this cause was insufficient to justify a decree in favor of Standish. By his bill, he asserted that, in equity, the lands of Caroline M. Babcock should be recharged with the burden from which they had been gratuitously relieved by her husband's use of partnership funds for that purpose, and made to satisfy Standish for his share as one of the partners. Under the answer, he was required to prove the partnership, the resulting profit, and particularly that the $15,000 received by Frederick A. Babcock was the result of the sale of partnership property. Without such proof, the equity here asserted was not established. But the case before us is barren of proof upon these points. While the decree in the former cause was not put in evidence, yet, as Caroline M. Babcock had set it out in her answer, and appended a copy thereto, Standish had a right to rely upon it as evidence against her, if it possessed evidential force in that regard. But it was not competent proof against her of the facts essential to his case; for, although she was originally made party to that suit, she was dismissed therefrom. She was not bound by the decree, and its adjudications on the essential facts do not estop her from contesting them, and requiring other proof. If she was a proper party in that cause, Standish could have appealed from the order dismissing her therefrom, and by its reversal would have bound her by the decree. But, after dismissal, the decree was as ineffective against her as if she had not been originally a party to the suit. As the decree is thus unavailable as proof, the case is left without proof on these essential points. Indeed, the only evidence upon the subject is that of Frederick A. Babcock, who, when called as a witness by Standish, repeatedly declared that the $15,000 which he received from Frisbie was the proceeds of the sale of railroad bonds and stock, and not of the coal lands. While it is true that he is estopped from this defense by the decree in the former cause, yet he is admissible to testify in defense of his wife, who is not estopped thereby.

The result is that there is no evidence to support the decree appealed from. But this result is by no means satisfactory. The learned vice chancellor, who advised the decree, evidently deemed that he had before him evidence that raised the legal questions which he decided. Indeed, his opinion indicates that he believed that he had before him, not only the pleadings and decree, but also the evidence taken in the former cause; for he states facts that nowhere appear in proof of this cause. If we assume, as he did, that it appeared that the $15,000 paid by Frisbie to Frederick A. Babcock was the price of lands belonging to the partnership, a question is presented decisive of the case. Although the charge of the bill was that Frederick A. Babcock had paid off the mortgage on his wife's lands out of the $15,000 received by him, the facts proved in this cause do not support this charge. The truth was that, shortly after the receipt of that sum, Frederick A. Babcock paid $6,000 of it to his son Edward B. Babcock; and the latter, almost immediately, applied enough of that sum to discharge the mortgage on his mother's lands. It is suggested by Standish's counsel that these circumstances point to fraud, and justify the inference of collusion to invest the discharge of the mortgage with an appearance of filial generosity, while in reality it was a scheme to divert partnership funds to an unlawful purpose. But the vice chancellor failed to draw any such deduction from any evidence before him, and our review of the evidence before us convinces us that in so doing he was not in error. The evidence that the payment of $6,000 to Edward was a payment upon a just debt, honestly due, is uncontradicted. The circumstances supposed to be suspicious are explainable by the near relationship of the parties, and will not justify an inference of fraud. There is ample corroboration of the ability of the son to make the advances to his father out of which arose the indebtedness upon which the $6,000 was paid. It must be considered as established that the payment was made upon a debt honestly due. We also think that the evidence before us plainly shows that the son received that payment without any knowledge that the money paid was or was claimed to be partnership funds; nor is there anything discoverable in the evidence which shows that he was put upon inquiry on that subject. His evidence is uncontradicted that he supposed the money thus paid him was from the proceeds of the sale of some railroad bonds and stock made by his father.

The question, then, is whether Edward B. Babcock can retain money paid to him by his father upon an honest debt, and received by him without knowledge or notice that the money belonged to a partnership of which his father was one. The solution of this question is not affected by the subsequent application of part of this money by way of a gift to his mother; for, if Edward had acquired a right thereto, he could dispose of it at his pleasure. The question was solved by the court below by the application of the well-settled doctrine of the law of partnership that each partner has a lien on partnership property for the payment of partnership debts, and upon the surplus after such payment for his share. 1 Lindley, Partn. § 852. It was considered that it followed from this doctrine that one partner might follow money belonging to the partnership into the hands of a creditor of an individual partner who had received it in payment of his debt, without knowing that it was partnership money, and might require such creditor to restore the money so received to the partnership, or at least to account for his share thereof; and this decree, if made upon the facts deemed to have been before the vice chancellor, can only be supported upon that proposition. There can be no doubt that one partner cannot give away partnership property or things procured by partnership money, and that the donee will be deemed to be a trustee for the partnership, and required to account for such gifts. Shaler v. Troubridge, 28 N. J. Eq. 595; Partridge v. Wells, 80 N. J. Eq. 176, 81 N. J. Eq. 862. Nor can one partner give a partnership obligation in payment of his individual debt without the consent of the other partners, and it has been held in this state that the creditor who thus accepts partnership obligations from one partner has the burden cast on him to prove the consent of the other partners. Mecutchen v. Kennady, 27 N. J. L. 290; Dob v. Halsey, 16 Johns. 84, 8 Am. Dec. 293. Nor can a partner transfer or create a lien upon partnership property for the payment of his individual debt to a creditor who has knowledge that the property so transferred or pledged is partnership property. Maitlack v. James, 18 N. J. Eq. 126; Clements v. Jessup, 36 N. J. Eq. 569. And this doctrine will apply to partnership money paid by one partner to his individual creditor, if the latter knows that the money belongs to the partnership. Piercy v. Fynney, L. R. 12 Eq. 69; Kendal v. Wood, L. R. 6 Exch. 243; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1250; Davis v. Smith, 27 Minn. 890; Dob v. Halsey, ubi supra. In the opinion delivered in the supreme court in Mecutchen v. Kennady, ubi supra, Chief Justice Green indicated his approval of the doctrine declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in Rogers v. Batchelor, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 221, 9 L. ed. 1063. That doctrine was that a partner could not apply partnership property to the payment of his individual debt, so that the title of the partnership thereto would be divested, even if the individual creditor was ignorant that the property received by him belonged to the partnership. Mr. Justice Story, who delivered the opinion in that case, put the doctrine upon the ground that the true question was whether the title to the property had passed from the partnership to the individual creditor. The reasoning is that the implied agency of one partner to dispose of partnership property extends only to its disposition for partnership purposes, and not to its application to the purposes of one of the partners. An individual creditor, receiving property upon his debt, may, by inquiry, discover the title of his debtor, who thus applies such property, and may in this mode be chargeable with the knowledge which would be acquired upon such inquiry. But if this doctrine, supported by such authority, be admitted to be correct (as to which no opinion need be expressed), the question remains whether it applies when a partner uses, not property, but money of the partnership, in the discharge of his individual debt. In my judgment, there is a marked distinction between the two cases. This results, not from the old notion that money has no "earmark," but because money has the quality of currency, passing from hand to hand in all bona fide transactions, without the necessity of inquiry on the part of him who receives as to the title of the party who pays it. When property thus passes, the recipient may be put upon inquiry as to its title; when money thus passes, no inquiry is required. In the former case the knowledge which inquiry would produce would charge the recipient; in the latter case nothing but actual knowledge will charge him. It was forcibly said by Lord Justice Fry in Northern Counties of England F. Ins. Co. v. Whipp, 26 Ch. Div. 482, that "the proposition that money obtained by fraud can be followed into the hands of persons who take it in satisfaction of a bona fide debt without notice is, in our judgment, devoid of support from principle or authority." Perry, Tr. § 837; Lewin, Tr. § 892.

The result is that, if this case appeared before us as it seems to have appeared to the vice chancellor, in my judgment his conclusion was erroneous, and the decree made thereon cannot be supported. It has been deemed best to state this conclusion, as the contrary view, expressed in the court below, will tend to greatly limit dealings with persons who are copartners. If a creditor of any individual partner cannot retain money paid upon his debt if the money so paid was in fact partnership money, although not known to be so by the creditor receiving it, dealings with individual partners will be seriously affected.

For the reasons above set forth, the decrees must be reversed, with costs.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

Dee BRISCOE, Appt.,
v.

J. R. ALFREY.

(.....Ark.....)

The owner of an unaltered jack is not liable for a filly killed by it, where it, without his knowledge or intentional or negligent permission, broke from the place in which it was kept, under Sand. & H. Dig. § 7301, making the owner of such an animal liable for all damages sustained "by its running at large."

(October 12, 1895.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Woodruff County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the killing of a filly by a jack belonging to defendant, which was alleged to have been unlawfully allowed to run at large. Affirmed.

¹ NOTE.—As to liability for owners on account of trespass by animals in general, see note to Bulphit v. Matthews (Ill.) 23 L. R. A. 55.

For doctrine of scienter as to injuries by vicious animals while trespassing, see Morgan v. Hudnell, (Ohio) 27 L. R. A. 862.

Statement by Wood, J.:

The action was brought under section 7801, Sand. & H. Dig., which is as follows: "If any seed horse or any unaltered mule or jack over the age of two years be found running at large, the owner shall be fined for the first offense $8, and for every subsequent offense not exceeding $10, to be recovered by civil action in the name of any person who shall sue therefor, one half to his own use and the other to the use of the county; and the owner shall also be liable for all damages that may be sustained by the running at large of any such seed horse, jack, or mule." The proof tended to show that a mule, the property of the defendant, was an unaltered mule over two years old, which, while at large, killed a filly, the property of the plaintiff. Also that defendant kept the mule in a strong stable surrounded by a strong high fence, and that the mule had broken out during the night without defendant's knowledge. The judgment below was for the defendant.

Mr. N. W. Norton, for appellant:

At common law scienter must be alleged and proved, before there can be a recovery for an injury by domestic animals.

This statute was intended to take the place of the common-law rule as to injuries done by the animals named, while at large. It is analogous to statutes existing in many states, making the owner or keeper of a dog liable for damages done by the dog.

Under these statutes no proof of scienter is necessary.

Mr. M. T. Sanders, for appellee:

The mule, having escaped without appellee's fault or negligence from the enclosure in which it was kept by him, was not running at large within the meaning of the statute.

The owner is not liable for an injury inflicted by a domestic animal allowed unlawfully to roam at large, in the absence of notice that it possessed a vicious disposition.

The care must be what a prudent and reasonable man taking into view the common course of things would deem to be required in the particular case.

Bishop, Non-Cont. L. § 439; Bissell v. Booker, 16 Ark. 314.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The statute does not place owners of the animals named beyond the protection of that universal rule which exempts men from liability for inevitable accidents. This is plain when all the provisions of the section quoted are considered together. It is not to be supposed that the legislature demanded an impossibility, and imposed a penalty for inability to avoid the inevitable. No human prescience could forestall the various contingencies of escape to which such animals are liable. Yet, if the unfortunate owner is to be held responsible civilly at all hazards, the anomalous result would be to inflict upon him a penalty for something which might be impossible for him to avoid. The ownership of the animals named is not forbidden, but expressly recognized, and the imposition of such burdens as would tend directly or indirectly to prevent or discourage the ownership and use of such animals was never contemplated. By the somewhat rigorous results to follow to the owner in case of his failure to use proper care in restraining the animals designated, the legislature evidently only designed to enforce upon him the strict observance of that ancient maxim, Ne utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. What degree of care is required? Only that which a prudent man under similar circumstances would exercise to prevent animals of the kind mentioned from running at large, taking into consideration their natural habits and propensities. It is the intentional or negligent permission of the owner for his animal to run at large which subjects him to the civil and penal consequences prescribed by the statute. Whether the owner has exercised such care as the law requires if the facts are disputed is a question for the jury. The following authorities are cited to support the views we have expressed. Bishop, Non-Cont. L. §§ 1220 et seq.; Wolf v. Nicholson, 1 Ind. App. 223; McBride v. Hicklin, 124 Ind. 499; Rutter v. Henry, 46 Ohio St. 272; Leavenworth, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Forbes, 37 Kan. 448; Fallon v. O'Brien, 12 R. I. 518, 84 Am. Rep. 718; Fremont v. Raley (Tex.) 27 S. W. Rep. 200; Klenberg v. Russell, 125 Ind. 581; McLeaine v. Lantz, 100 Pa. 586, 45 Am. Rep. 400,—all cited by appellee's counsel.

Counsel for appellant has called our attention to statutes and decisions of other states in which the owners of dogs are made liable absolutely for damages done by them. The status of the dog before the law is sui generis. Bishop, Non-Cont. L. § 1323. The vicious dog, in general, and the sneaking sheep killer, in particular (to which several of the cases cited refer), are under the law's especial condemnation. Without entering upon a discussion of the reasons therefor, it suffices to say that no legislation or decision with reference to injuries by dogs do we regard as analogous to that of the other purely domestic animals of the kind enumerated in our statute.

The instructions of the trial court were in accordance with this opinion, and there was no error in its ruling admitting certain testimony to which objection was made.

Its judgment is therefore affirmed.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

J. I. ROSE, Admr., etc., of Sidney Wortham, Deceased, et al.,

v.

Sallie WORTHAM et al.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. Life insurance taken by a man before marriage is to be deemed "effected by a husband" within the provisions of M. & V. Code, §§ 3185, 3335, giving the benefit of such insurance to the widow, children, and next of kin free from claims of creditors.

2. The term "legal representatives" in a policy of life insurance, as a description of the beneficiaries, does not give the executor or administrator any beneficial interest in the recovery so as to defeat the right of widow, children, and next of kin under M. & V. Code, §§ 3185, 3335, to take the proceeds free from claims of creditors.

(November 2, 1895.)

APPPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court of Campbell County in favor of the widow and child of deceased in a bill of interpleader to determine the right to money arising from a life insurance policy.

Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Williams, Henderson, & Davis for appellants.

Messrs. Henderson & Jourdman for appellees.

Messrs. Reid & Powers for the administrator.

NOTE.—Who are "legal representatives" within meaning of life insurance policies.

I. In general.

II. Other words combined with the words "legal representatives."

I. In general.

The above case of ROSE v. WORTHAM is supported by the majority of the decisions upon the subject, but there are several decisions upon the other side. Yet the different facts in the cases decided to a large extent explain the divergence of the decisions, since the intent of the insured is regarded as important if not controlling.

The words "legal representatives," in a life insurance policy taken by an old man who had a wife and children dependent upon him, while he had recently become insolvent, must be presumed to be intended by him to designate his wife and children, rather than his administrators for the benefit of his creditors. Griswold v. Sawyer, 125 N. Y. 411, reversing 55 Hun, 12.

The next of kin to the exclusion of the husband of a woman take the proceeds of a policy of insurance on her father's life made payable to her or her legal representatives when she was only four years old. Geoffroy v. Gilbert, 15 Misc. 60.

The words "legal representatives," in a policy of insurance, as a designation of those to whom it shall be paid, is held to mean heirs or next of kin rather than executors or administrators, where the words "legal representatives" appear in the answers in the application for insurance to show those for whose "benefit" or "use" the policy was taken. Schultz v. Citizens' Mut. L. Ins. Co. (Minn.) 61 N. W. 331.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question involved in this case is to whom the proceeds of a policy on the life of Sidney Wortham for $5,000 shall be paid,—whether to his widow and child or to his creditors. The chancellor held that the widow and child were entitled to the proceeds, after deducting certain expenses of collection, and the administrator and creditors appealed to this court, and assigned as error this holding of the chancellor. The cause has been heard by the court of chancery appeals, and they have affirmed the decree of the chancellor, and the administrator and creditors have appealed from that decision to this court.

The facts as found by the court of chancery appeals are that Sidney Wortham, on the 1st of January, 1889, being an unmarried man, became engaged to and contracted to marry the defendant Sallie, now his widow. The marriage was not consummated, however, till October 29, 1890. In the meantime, and on the 8th day of January, 1889, he took out a policy of insurance upon his life in the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company of Newark, N. J., for $5,000, directing it, in answer to a question propounded, to be made payable to "himself or his estate." On the 18th of January, 1889, the policy was issued payable to the "legal representatives of the assured." The premium was to be $75.55, payable semiannually. Sidney Wortham, the insured, died November 25, 1892, leaving his widow and one child, and his estate is

A certificate payable to "legal representatives," while the constitution of the association contemplates aid to widows, orphans, and heirs, is held to be for the benefit of the wife and child of a member instead of his estate; especially where there was evidence that he said he intended to take a policy for their benefit. Murray v. Strang, 28 Ill. App. 608.

The word "representatives" in the articles of association of the Odd Fellows Mutual Benefit Society, is held to be used, not in any technical or limited sense, but as including any person whom the member may designate, or whom the by-laws designate if he fails to make a designation, as the person to whom money shall be paid. It is therefore held that he may designate as beneficiary a person who is not a member of his family. Walter v. Hensel, 42 Minn. 304. The court says in this case: "There is nothing in the statute or articles and by-laws of the society requiring that the word should be construed, or indicating that it is used, in any such limited or technical sense, or anything indicating that the society is anything more or less than a mutual life insurance company on the assessment plan."

So, a provision that if a member of a relief association has no legal representatives such sum as they would have been entitled to shall become the property of the association, is held to refer to those persons who were enumerated in the charter and by-laws as the beneficiaries; namely, the widow, orphan, heir, assign, or legatee of the member. Masonic Mut. Relief Asso. v. McAuley, 2 Mackey, 70.

But it is held in People v. Phelps, 78 Ill. 147, that a policy payable to "legal representatives" makes the proceeds a part of the assets of the estate of the totally insolvent. Both before and after his marriage he paid the premiums on his policy as they fell due. He frequently stated to his wife that he intended she and their child should have the proceeds of the policy, and be the beneficiaries thereunder. This evidence was not objected to. The proceeds of the policy were paid after his death to his administrator, who holds the same subject to the decision of this controversy as to ownership of such proceeds. The decision of this question involves the construction of the statutes brought forward in the compilation of Milliken & Vertrees as sections 8185 and 8385, and which are as follows:

"Sec. 8185. A life insurance effected by a husband on his own life shall inure to the benefit of the widow and next of kin, to be distributed as personal property free from the claims of his creditors."

"Sec. 8385. Any life insurance effected by a husband on his own life shall, in case of his death, inure to the benefit of his widow and children and the money thence arising shall be divided between them according to the law of distribution, without being in any manner subject to the debts of the husband, whether by attachment, execution, or otherwise."

It is insisted for the creditors that it is only such life insurance as is effected by the husband as husband, during the existence of the marital relation, that is thus referred to and regulated, and that an insurance effected before the marriage relation begins is not contemplated by these statutes, and does not fall within their provisions. In Sutherland on Statutes and Statutory Construction it is said, in substance, that the presumption is that the lawmakers have a definite purpose in every enactment, and that purpose is an implied limitation on general terms, and a touchstone for the expansion of narrower terms used in the statute. The cardinal purpose of the act must control, and words and phrases must be read in such sense as will harmonize with the subject-matter and general purpose of the statute. Mr. Kent, on the same subject, says in substance: In the exposition of a statute the intention of the law-maker will prevail over the literal sense of the terms, and its reasons and intention will prevail over the strict letter. Not only may the meaning of words be restricted by the subject-matter of an act, but, for like reason, they may be expanded. The intention of the act will prevail over the literal sense of its terms. The particular inquiry is not, What is the abstract force of the words used? but, In what sense were they intended to be used as found in the act? This sense is to be collected from the context, and a narrower or more extended meaning is to be given, according to the intention thus indicated. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 219, 240, 241, 248. Accordingly, in Silver v. Ladd, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 219, 19 L. ed. 138, the term "single man" was held to include an "unmarried woman" in the construction of the Oregon donation act of Congress. In Ragland v. Justices of Inferior Ct. 10 Ga. 65, 71, a minor with his parents living was held to be an orphan, in order to make the statute in question fully answer its obvious purpose and intention. In Richardson v. Duncan, 2 Helsk. 220, it was held by this court that an "ass" was within the meaning of the law exempting from execution a horse, mule, or yoke of oxen in the hands of a person engaged in agricultural pursuits. So, in Webb v. Brandon, 4 Helsk. 288, it was held that an "ox wagon" was embraced under the words insured, if there is nothing to show that those words were used with a different meaning.

Life insurance payable to "legal representatives" of the insured, and which his application asks to be paid to his "estate," cannot be recovered in an action by his widow in her own right, although he left no children and the object of the insurance association was declared to be to aid the "families or assigns" of the members. The court says the words "legal representatives" must be given their ordinary meaning. Sulz v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assn. 145 N. Y. 568, 28 L. R. A. 379.

Policies payable to the "legal representatives" of the insured, one of them specifying "for the sole use and benefit of his estate," are held in Fox v. Senter, 33 Me. 295, to pass by will as part of his "remaining property" given to his wife if living.

The term "legal representatives" in a life insurance policy was held to mean administrators, in Armstrong v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 11 Fed. Rep. 573. But the Supreme Court of the United States, reversing this case on other grounds, says: "The term 'legal representatives' is not necessarily restricted to the personal representatives of one deceased, but is sufficiently broad to cover all persons who, with respect to his property, stand in his place and represent his interests, whether transferred to them by his act or by operation of law. It may, in this case, include assigns as well as executors and administrators." Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 20 L. ed. 997.

A clause in a policy making it payable to "legal representatives" is held to apply only in case the policy is not assigned by the insured, and not to limit his power to assign it where such power is contemplated by the policy. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Flack, 8 Md. 341.

So, the words "legal representatives," describing the persons to whom life insurance is payable, are held not to exclude an assignee of the policy to whom it was assigned as security for a debt. Robinson v. Hurst, 75 Md. 59, 20 L. R. A. 761.

Somewhat analogous to the present subject is the decision that a statutory provision that life insurance "shall inure to the separate use of the husband or wife and children" is held to give all to the widow in case there are no children, although there is another provision that the insurance shall not be subject to debts but "in other respects be disposed of like other property left by the deceased." This provision is held not to mean necessarily that the insurance shall go to the same class or classes of persons as will take under the statute. Rhode v. Bank, 53 Iowa, 375.

A policy for wife and children "or their representatives" was held to be for the benefit of the last survivor of them to the exclusion of a niece of the insured. Robinson v. Dewall, 79 Ky. 82, 42 Am. Rep. 208.

II. Other words combined with the words "legal representatives."

Where life insurance was payable to "heirs or assigns," and the insured was unmarried and childless, it was held that those persons who were the next of kin according to the statute of distributions of the statute exempting an "ox cart" or a "two-horse wagon."

The evident object and purpose of the acts in controversy was to provide for the widow and children, and, in default of them, for the next of kin, of the assured upon his death, in the event he did not direct in the policy, or by assignment, or by his will, or in some other mode, that other persons should be the beneficiaries thereunder. Harvey v. Harrison, 89 Tenn. 476. That he might so direct cannot, under our decisions, be questioned. But, in order to do so in the policy, he must use apt words for that purpose, indicating his intention that the proceeds should be paid to parties other than the wife and children or next of kin, or else the proceeds will pass under the statute. Without now attempting to decide upon the use of particular words and phrases as indicating this intention, we are content to hold that the language used in this policy, designating the payees as "the legal representatives of the assured," does not indicate an intention to direct the proceeds to any other persons than those entitled under the law, to wit, the widow and children or next of kin, but under this language the proceeds will pass, as the statute directs, to the widow and children, or, if there be no widow or children, then to the next of kin under the law, who are, in the sense in which the terms are here used, "the legal representatives of the assured." It cannot be held that the term "legal representatives" was intended to mean the executor or administrator of the deceased, so as to give them a beneficial interest in the recovery, but was intended to designate those who, under the law, succeed to the personal estate of the deceased. It was intended by the statutes to provide a fund for the widow and children and next of kin, which, upon the assured's death, should go to them free from the claims of creditors; and, like other exemption laws, they have been liberally construed to carry out the general purpose. Collier v. Latimer, 8 Baxt. 420, 35 Am. Rep. 711; Jackson v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 82; Harvey v. Harrison, Id. 470. It is difficult to see why the widow and children of a party who took out his life insurance before he married should not stand upon the same footing and have the same rights as the widow and children of a party who obtained such insurance after he was married, when there is no indication in the policy that the assured intended it to go otherwise. It will be noticed that the act does not say when the insurance should be "effected," whether during the marital relation or previous thereto, and an easy and natural interpretation will embrace that "effected" before as well as that after the marriage occurred. Again, life insurance is made "effectual" by the payment of premiums at fixed intervals, and the insurance for any particular time is "effected" when the premium for that time is paid. In case of this policy it was "effected" every six months for the ensuing six months. The fact that the proceeds of life policies are paid to and collected by the executor or administrator of the assured does not in any way make the proceeds assets of the estate for the payment of debts, but they go to the widow and children or next of kin, free from the debts, whether the estate is solvent or insolvent. Harvey v. Harrison, 89 Tenn. 470; State v. Anderson, 16 Lea, 338.

It is urged that the North American Guaranty Company has a special equity as against the proceeds of this policy from the fact that it became surety upon the decedent's bond as would take the proceeds free from the debts of the insured. Hubbard, P. & Co. v. Turner (Ga.) ante, 568.

This distinguishes Rawson v. Jones, 52 Ga. 458, which had held that if there is nothing to show any contrary intent, a policy payable to "heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns" will be payable to the estate for distribution by legal representatives.

But the words "families, heirs, or legal representatives," in the act of incorporation of an insurance organization, were held to include those who would take property as in case of intestacy, and were given effect where no certificate had been actually issued to a member in good standing. Bishop v. Grand Lodge E. O. of Mut. Aid, 112 N. Y. 627, reversing 43 Hun, 472.

Insurance payable to "heirs or representatives" will go to the heirs or next of kin, as, for instance, to an only child, where it appears that the benefit was intended for his family. Loos v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 41 Mo. 538.

The words "heirs and legal representatives" as used in the by-laws of a life insurance company describing the beneficiaries, are regarded as equivalent to "next of kin," and the fund is held not to be a part of the assets of the estate of the insured. Hodge's Appeal, 8 W. N. C. 209, 9 Ins. L. J. 709. In this case it was paid to his father and mother, as there was no wife or child.

But it has been held that a ten-year endowment policy payable to the insured himself, or in case of his prior death to his "heirs or representatives," is, in case of his death, payable to his administrator as assets, and is not within a statutory provision exempting from debts of a decedent life insurance expressed to be for the benefit of another person. Wason v. Colburn, 99 Mass. 842. The court said: "The term 'representatives' legally indicates administrators, and we cannot construe it as excluding them."

It was said in Tompkins v. Levy, 87 Ala. 268, that when a policy of life insurance is made payable to "executors and assigns," coupled with the word "heirs," it inures to the benefit of distributees or next of kin.

But the case does not decide in reality whether the words used would give the proceeds to the administrator as assets subject to the debts of the insured or not. The question decided was that upon the death of a wife during the life of her husband, which was insured by a policy payable to her, "her heirs, executors, or assigns," and the premiums therefor paid by him, the policy becomes payable to his estate.

The examination of the cases shows that the intention of the insured is regarded as the important element in determining the meaning of the words "legal representatives" when those words are used to describe the beneficiaries of his life insurance. Since the words are clearly shown to be somewhat ambiguous his intention ought to be controlling, and it would seem to require little to raise the presumption that he intended the proceeds to go to his family if he has any.

a railroad station agent, and was compelled to pay something over $600 on account of his default as such agent; and because, when he made application to the company to become his surety on such bond, he stated that he had a policy upon his life, payable to his estate, and this was one of the considerations moving the company to go upon said bond. This is not material to the question now before us. If the company desired the security of this policy, they should have secured it by an assignment, or such other proper proceeding as was necessary to fix a lien upon it which the law could recognize.

We think there is no error in the decrees of the chancellor, nor in the able opinion of the court of chancery appeals, delivered by Judge M. M. Neil, and which we have used liberally in this opinion; and the decrees of that court and the chancellor is affirmed, with costs.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COM-PANY, Appt.

(4 S. D. 105, 430.)

- *1. The statute law of this state (Comp Laws, §§ 3881-3910), makes a telegraph company which offers to the public to carry telegraphic messages a common carrier of such messages.
2. Such statutory provisions were not superseded or repealed by section 11, article 17 of the Constitution of the state, imposing upon the legislature the duty of providing reasonable regulations, by general law, for giving effect to the right of a corporation organized for such purpose to construct and maintain lines of telegraph within the state.
3. While a common carrier may, in general, determine for himself the character and condition of what he will offer to and will carry, he cannot, by offering to carry under a qualified liability, constitute himself a common carrier with such liability only as he advertises to assume.
4. A common carrier is under a legal duty to accept and carry whatever is offered to him, at a reasonable time and place, of a kind that he undertakes or is accustomed to carry, subject to the full liability of a common carrier, unless such liability is restricted by a valid agreement between such carrier and his employer.
5. Such agreement, restricting the carrier's liability except as "to the rate of hire, the time, place, and manner of delivery," can only be manifested by the signature of the passenger, consignee, or consignee, or person employing such carrier. Comp. Laws, § 3888.
6. Such modification of the common carrier's liability depends upon, and results from, the agreement of the parties, and the carrier cannot legally exact such agreement as a condition precedent to receiving or carrying the offered freight or message.
7. As a common carrier, a telegraph company cannot legally refuse to accept and transmit an offered message because the person offering will not sign an agreement that such carrier shall not be liable for damages in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within sixty days after the message is filed with the company for transmission.

8. While such an agreement, when freely made, is binding, the carrier cannot exact it as a condition precedent to the discharge of his duty as such common carrier.
9. In the afternoon of January 4, respondent offered appellant, for transmission, a message confessedly unobjectionable, except that it was not written on or attached to one of appellant's message forms. Respondent declined to sign or agree to the stipulations printed on such blank, and for that reason appellant refused to receive or send his message. Respondent then wrote a letter to the party to whom he desired to send the message, but still later, about 7 o'clock in the evening, went to the office of appellant, and sent a message upon one of its blanks, substantially like the one previously refused. Held, that appellant's refusal to send the first message constituted a refusal, within the meaning of section 3910, Comp. Laws, and that the sending of the second message was neither a cure of the wrong upon the part of appellant, nor a waiver of it on the part of respondent.
10. Where, upon undisputed facts, no other verdict than the one returned could have been properly rendered, this court will not examine an alleged error in allowing the jury to separate temporarily without being admonished by the trial court not to converse among themselves, or with others, upon the subject of the trial, as it is evident that no prejudice resulted therefrom.
11. When a petition for a rehearing states new matter which may materially affect the merits of the main controversy, and which was not considered by the appellate court at the time of the rendition of the opinion, a rehearing will be granted for the purpose of considering such new matter.
12. In this state a telegraph company is a common carrier. Comp. Laws, §§ 3881-3910.

The subject of the reasonableness and effect of a 80 L. R. A. condition as to presenting claims for damages within sixty days is discussed so fully in the report of the above case that no attempt to annotate it will be made.

upon a compliance with, reasonable rules and regulations, designed to protect its interests, and promote the safe and convenient transaction of business, when the same contravene no consideration of public policy, and in no manner affect its liability under the statutory or common law.

14. The statutory obligation and common-law liability of a telegraph company to accept, safely transmit, and promptly deliver a message is in no manner modified, limited, or intrinsically affected, by a regulation in all respects reasonable, which requires the sender to present in writing a claim for damages within sixty days after the message is filed with the company for transmission; nor does such regulation shorten the time within which an action for damages may be commenced.

(June 28, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Minnehaha County Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the statutory penalty for the defendant's refusal to send a telegraph message, and also to recover the damages caused by such refusal. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. George H. Fearons, with Messrs. Bailey & Voorhees, for appellant:

Appellant was legally entitled to require compliance by respondent with its reasonable rules and regulations before it was obliged to transmit the message in controversy, and was entitled to require the message to be written upon, or attached to, its message blank.

Appellant's rule 1 is as follows: "Each message for transmission will be written upon the form provided by the company for that purpose, or will be attached to such form by the sender, or by the person presenting the message as the sender's agent, so as to leave the printed heading in full view above the message."

Rule 1 was such as appellant had the right to enact, and having enacted it, respondent was compelled to observe it.

If this is a reasonable regulation, then respondent had no right to refuse to comply with it, and he has no just cause of action against appellant for requiring observance of it.

Every stipulation on the message blank in controversy is supported by a vast weight of judicial authority.

The first stipulation is in regard to repeating messages.

On Rehearing.

As to matters which do not limit its statutory duties or liabilities as a common carrier, it can make its own regulations for the conduct of its business, and such regulations, if reasonable, will be upheld by the courts.

Gleason v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 82 Wis. 85, 14 Am. Rep. 716.

The foregoing illustrations demonstrate that a common carrier has the right, regardless of the common-law or statutory liability as a common carrier, to enact regulations for the conduct of its business, and to refuse carriage unless such regulations are observed by its patrons.

The sixty-day clause does not limit the statutory liability of a common carrier, and is a reasonable regulation; and the telegraph company, a common carrier, has the undoubted right to make its observance a condition precedent to the carriage of the message.

Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 86 U. S. 21 Wall. 264, 22 L. ed. 556.

The uniform holding of the courts has been that, in the absence of extraordinary circumstances, a clause similar to the sixty-day clause constitutes a reasonable regulation which the carrier has a right to enforce.

The act of July 24, 1866, was a valid exercise of the constitutional powers of Congress and abrogated any power which might formerly have been possessed by a state or territory upon the subjects covered by the act.

Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 480, 26 L. ed. 1087; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pendleton, 123 U. S. 847, 30 L. ed. 1187, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 306; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, supra.

If, therefore, the territorial statute of January 12, 1866, conflicts with the act of July 24, 1866, it was repealed by implication, and no subsequent enactment could give it validity, and it consequently was not in force at the time of the admission of the state of South Dakota.

Under the Constitution of the United States, Congress possessed no power to delegate to the territory of Dakota the authority to enact the statute upon which this action is based. Therefore the provisions of the Civil Code concerning common carriers never became a law of the territory of Dakota.

The purported statute in controversy attempts to enact a code of laws governing common carriers.

By it carriers of messages, which include telegraph companies, were declared to be common carriers. This was in derogation of the common law under which, it is well settled, telegraph companies are not common carriers.

After the first hearing of the case Kellam, J., delivered the following opinion:

On the 4th day of January, 1892, the respondent offered to the appellant at its office in the city of Sioux Falls a written message confessedly unobjectionable in matter, and requested that it be transmitted in the usual way to the party to whom it was addressed, and then and there offered to pay the usual compensation therefor. The message was written on ordinary white writing paper. The company declined to send the same unless written upon, or attached to, one of its message blanks. This the respondent refused to do unless the stipulations contained in such message blank should be first erased, so that he would not be bound thereby. Under these circumstances the message was refused by the company. Upon these facts, which appear to be undisputed, respondent brought an action against the appellant company to recover actual damages, and $50 in addition thereto, under section 8910, Comp. Laws. The section reads as follows: "Every person whose message is refused or postponed, contrary to the provisions of this chapter, is entitled to recover from the carrier his actual damages, and $50 in addition thereto." Upon the trial the respondent proved his actual damages, and had a verdict for 25 cents actual and $50 statutory damages. Upon this verdict judgment was entered, a new trial refused, and the company appeals.

While other assignments of error, which will be hereafter noticed, were presented and argued, it is evident that the major question is the right of the appellant company to insist upon the message being received and sent subject to the stipulations contained in the message blank, and, if the person offering the message refuse to agree thereto, to decline to receive or transmit the same. If the law sustains the company's right to so insist, or to refuse the message, then, upon the facts in this case, respondent should not have recovered, for it is uncontradicted that the message was refused upon the distinct ground that the respondent positively declined to have it sent subject to the stipulations printed upon the message blank.

By the statute law of this state (Comp. Laws, § 3881), "every one who offers to the public to carry persons, property, or messages is a common carrier of whatever he thus offers to carry." That the word "messages," as here used, was intended to include telegraphic messages, is evident from the closely following sections, wherein a "carrier by telegraph" and a "carrier of messages by telegraph" are expressly named, and their duties as such defined. From the adoption of the Civil Code in 1872, until the legislative session of 1873-74, the state of California had the same statutory provisions, but at the session named the above-quoted section was amended by inserting an express exception of "telegraphic messages." During the short time such original provision was there in force, we do not find any reported case in which it was considered. Prior to the adoption of such Code provision the supreme court of that state had held in Parks v. Alta California Tel. Co. 18 Cal. 422, 78 Am. Dec. 589, that the defendant company, as a general telegraph company, was a common carrier; but the decisions of the courts have been, with great unanimity, against this view, and under the amended statutes it is now so held in California. Hart v. Western U. Tel. Co. 66 Cal. 579, 56 Am. Rep. 119. Appellant, however, advances the proposition that these provisions of the old Civil Code, being the sections of the compiled laws, above cited, which declare telegraph companies to be common carriers, are superseded and repealed by, because inconsistent with, the Constitution. This contention is founded largely upon section 11, article 17, of the Constitution: "Any association or corporation organized for the purpose, or any individual, shall have the right to construct and maintain lines of telegraph in this state, and to connect the same with other lines, and the legislature shall by general laws, of uniform operation, provide reasonable regulations to give effect to this section. No telegraph company shall consolidate with, or hold a controlling interest in the stock or bonds of, any other telegraph company owning a competing line, or acquire, by purchase or otherwise, any other competing line of telegraph." We think appellant claims too much for this section. It simply declares the right of an association, corporation, or individual to construct and maintain telegraph lines within this state, and to connect them with other lines, and then forbids the consolidation of competing lines. To carry into effect this general right to construct and maintain, and this prohibition against consolidation, the legislature is charged with the duty of providing suitable and reasonable laws and regulations, of uniform operation; regulations by and under which the right to construct and maintain may be used and exercised, and the prohibition of consolidation be enforced. We are not convinced that there is anything in the constitutional section which would forbid the legislature now, if it had never been done before, to impose upon telegraph companies the character and duties of common carriers. But, even if we understand this constitutional section to mean that the legislature should provide reasonable regulations for the conduct of the current business of telegraph companies, we should not think it had the retroactive effect of repealing former legislation, even though assailed as unreasonable. It is a general rule that neither constitutions nor statutes should be so construed as to have a retroactive effect, unless such intention is clearly expressed. Cutting v. Taylor, 8 S. D. 11, 15 L. R. A. 691; Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 62, 63; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 463, 464; Albyer v. State, 10 Ohio St. 589; People v. Gardner, 59 Barb. 198; Ex parte Burke, 59 Cal. 6. Although peculiar to our state, and the statute itself an exceptional one, I think we must recognize its effect to be to make, in this jurisdiction, a telegraph company "a common carrier of whatever it thus offers to carry," and its duty to receive and transmit respondent's message must be tested by its rights and duties as a common carrier. An individual or corporation becomes a common carrier of just what it offers to carry. Its duty to the public springs from its offer to the public, and must be measured by it; so that the carrier who only offers to carry grain in canvas sacks cannot be required to carry grain in bulk. But while the carrier may thus, in general, determine for himself the character and condition of what he will carry, he cannot, by offering to carry for the public under a qualified liability, constitute himself a common carrier with such a liability, only, as he advertises to assume. As a common carrier it was appellant's legal duty, if able to do so, to accept and transmit respondent's message, if offered at a reasonable time and place, and if it was of a kind that it undertook or was accustomed to carry. Comp. Laws, § 3882. The ability of appellant to receive and transmit the message; that it was offered at a reasonable time and place; and that the message itself, except as to the paper on which it was written, was of a kind that it was accustomed to carry, are not disputed.

The dominant question in this case, upon the merits, being whether the stipulations upon the message blank, or any of them, so far restricted appellant's liability as a common carrier as to justify respondent's refusal to consent to them, as a condition of having his message accepted and sent by appellant, we have thought it just to both parties to examine them severally, expressing our opinion upon each, so far as they are involved by the facts in this case. It is not claimed that either of the regulations or stipulations printed upon the message blank, and which respondent was required to assent to, offended against the rule of impartiality, which appellant, as a common carrier, was bound to observe. Respondent, however, strenuously insists that the stipulation on the printed blank would, if assented to by him, have the effect of relieving the company from a liability imposed upon it by law, as a common carrier, and consequently he ought not to be compelled to agree to it, as a condition of having his message sent.

The first matter objected to is as follows: "To guard against mistakes or delays, the sender of a message should order it repeated; that is, telegraphed back to the original office for comparison. For this, one half the regular rate is charged, in addition." So much is only explanatory and advisory. Then follows: "It is agreed between the sender of the following message and the company that said company shall not be liable for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery, or for nondelivery, of any unrepeated message, beyond the amount received for sending the same; nor for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery, or for nondelivery, of any repeated message, beyond fifty times the sum received for sending the same, unless specially insured; nor, in any case from unavoidable interruption in the working of its lines, or for errors in cypher or obscure messages." Then follows the rates for sending insured messages. The order in which the rates, terms, and conditions are stated upon which the company would receive and transmit this message are, of course, not important. The essential thing to know is, Did they tally with the duty of the company, as a common carrier. As such common carrier, it must insure, subject to conditions and exceptions hereinafter noticed, the correct transmission of the message, for which it was entitled to a just and reasonable compensation. This, by the printed form, it offered to do, and stated the compensation. There is no claim that the compensation named for such service was not just and reasonable, and no such question was raised. The effect of the printed condition is the same as though the rate for an insured message—that is, the compensation for assuming all the duties of a common carrier—had been first stated, and then had followed an offer that for a less compensation it would send the message without incurring the full liability of a common carrier. It left the respondent free to exercise his election as to which offer he would accept, and determine for himself whether he would pay the company for insuring the correct transmission of the message, as a common carrier, or pay less, and assume a part of the risk himself. A common carrier may have two rates for the transportation of goods,—one covering its full common-law liability, the other, a special or limited liability,—so long as the shipper has a choice between them, at reasonable rates. He cannot be denied the right to have his goods carried by the carrier under its common-law liability, but if he desires, and neither statute nor public policy forbid, he may enter into a special contract with the carrier, limiting its common-law liability. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dill, 48 Kan. 210. It is matter of common knowledge that the sending office marks upon the message form the rate or compensation paid, and thus is preserved, for the protection of both parties, some evidence, at least, of the election of the sender, and the resulting contract. It was entirely competent for the appellant to limit by special contract its obligation as a common carrier. Section 8886, Comp. Laws. The respondent was not obliged to make such a contract unless he chose. It was a matter of agreement between them. Parties who use telegraph lines are usually economical of their time. In most cases it is important that messages go at once. There is generally little time or opportunity for negotiation. As an expeditious and direct means of bringing both parties to a definite understanding, the company provides and furnishes to the public message forms containing its proposal of terms. The sender of a message may elect either. One of its offers covers its duty and liability as a common carrier. The sender may pay the tariff fixed for that service, and hold the company to its liability as a common carrier. We are unable to perceive how the offer of the company to qualify its full liability as a common carrier, and accept a less compensation therefor, if the sender so desires, can affect the rights of either. The offer only becomes binding when accepted and signed, and the sender is under no compulsion. He may pay for and get the full liability of a common carrier, or pay less, and get a limited liability. The causes or conditions named in the stipulation as excusing full performance of the company's obligation, and as a common carrier, are "unavoidable interruption in the working of its lines," and "errors in cypher or obscure messages." An "unavoidable interruption" is one that cannot or could not be avoided; and while the courts have not been strictly at one in their views as to what, in modern times, should be regarded as equivalent to "the act of God or the public enemy," of the old authorities, our statute (sec. 8899) expressly makes "any irresistible superhuman cause" sufficient ground for avoiding the common carrier's liability, and section 8890 definitely fixes the measure of a telegraph company's duty in the transmission of messages to be the exercise of the "utmost diligence." We should be unwilling to rule, as a matter of law, particularly in view of the peculiar nature of telegraphic communication, that the utmost diligence could prevent or successfully guard against an "unavoidable interruption in the working of its lines." It may sometimes be a question for the jury whether the facts in a particular case bring it within the rule, but, where the interruption is proved to be broadly unavoidable, we think the company would not be liable. Whether, strictly, as a common carrier, appellant could exact, as a condition of the acceptance and transmission of a cypher or obscurely written message, that the sender should release it from liability for an incorrect sending, we need not now determine, for the refused message was confessedly neither.

It was further provided, as one of the stipulations to which respondent should consent, as a condition of sending his message, that "no responsibility regarding messages attaches to the company until the same are presented and accepted at one of its transmitting offices." This would seem to be quite consistent with the provisions of our statute making the carrier's duty to commence when whatever is to be carried is offered "at a reasonable time and place;" but that, like the stipulation as to cypher and obscurely written messages, is not a question in this case, for it is undisputed that the message was offered at the proper office of the appellant, so that such stipulation could not restrict or affect appellant's liability to respondent in this case.

Another stipulation of the message blank was that "the company will not be liable for damages or statutory penalties in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within sixty days after the message is filed with the company for transmission." Appellant here insists that this condition does not propose, nor is its effect, to limit in any way its responsibility as a common carrier, but is rather in the nature of a reasonable regulation, which appellant has a right to make, and which respondent, without any special contract on his part, was bound to observe, and cites cases in support of that view, notably that of Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 264, 23 L. ed. 556. That case came before the court on plaintiff's demurrer to defendant's plea averring an express agreement upon the part of the plaintiff shipper that defendant should not be liable for loss or damage unless claim therefor was made within ninety days, and the question presented and decided was whether such an agreement, when made, was binding on the plaintiff. As to the necessity for an agreement in order to so qualify its liability, the court says: "Certainly it ought not to be admitted that a common carrier can be relieved from the full measure of that responsibility which ordinarily attends his occupation, without a clear and express stipulation to that effect obtained by him by his employer;" thus treating the stipulation in question not as a reasonable regulation, which it was competent for the carrier to make, and binding on the shipper without his consent, but as an agreement depending upon the consent of both parties. The court held that such an agreement was not such an attempted restriction of the carrier's responsibilities as would be invalid, but being reasonable, and fully assented to by both parties, it was binding; but that is not equivalent to saying that the carrier could compel the shipper to enter into such a contract, or require it as a condition of accepting his shipment. The very fact that such limitation of liability is the subject of agreement between the parties implies that either party may refuse to make such agreement. However such agreement may be proved elsewhere, our statute provides that here it can only be manifested by the signature of the consignor, etc. Comp. Laws, § 8888. In Hartwell v. Northern Exp. Co. 5 Dak. 468, 8 L. R. A. 342, our territorial supreme court rejected the defense of the carrier that the claim of loss upon which the action was founded was not presented to the company within the time specified in its receipt, upon the distinct ground that under the controlling statute just referred to there was no special contract so providing, or binding upon the parties. It was a rule or regulation of the company, and as such was printed in the receipt delivered to the consignor, but the court held that it did not operate to make the liability of the company different in any respect from what it would otherwise be, because, not being signed by the consignor, it was not a special contract, as required and defined by the statute. Now if, without such special contract, the liability of the carrier is not thus limited, and with it is, can the carrier refuse the offering of a shipper of "whatever it is accustomed to carry," unless he will so contract to limit the carrier's liability? We think not. The carrier's duty is to receive and carry subject to the full measure of liability, unless restricted by mutual agreement; and except as to "rate of hire, the time, place, and manner of delivery," such an agreement can only be shown by the signature of the shipper or sender. In Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, pp. 256, 257, the learned author, after recognizing and discussing the right of a common carrier to modify and restrict its liability by special agreement with its patron or employer, says: "But the contract must be freely and voluntarily made. The carrier cannot refuse to take goods for carriage under the common-law liability, if the consignor should refuse his assent to a limitation." To the same effect, see New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 47 U. S. 6 How. 344, 12 L. ed. 465. Nor can a carrier require of a shipper a waiver of any of his rights as a condition precedent to receiving and carrying his freight. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Pagan, 72 Tex. 127, 2 L. R. A. 75. To sustain such a stipulation, where fairly made, is only to concede the right and power of the parties to make it, and comes far short of meaning that the carrier may exact the making of it as a condition precedent to the discharge of his duty as a common carrier. The statute was evidently intended to settle within this jurisdiction the question of how, and to what extent, the general liability of a common carrier may be limited; and by providing, as it does, that it can only be accomplished by a special agreement, it has deliberately left it with either party to consent, or to refuse to consent, to such an agreement. The right to exercise such freedom of will by the respondent in this case would be denied and destroyed if he were compelled to consent under penalty of having his message refused. It has been suggested that respondent could found no right of action upon refusal of appellant to transmit his message unless he would agree to the stipulation, because, if made under such compulsion, it would not be enforceable against him, and therefore harmless; but such conclusion would be consistent with neither the duty of the appellant, nor the right of the respondent. This right and this duty were correlative, and each was a measure of the other. Whatever respondent had a right to have sent, it was appellant's duty to send. If it was respondent's right to have his message transmitted without agreeing to this condition, it was appellant's duty to transmit it without imposing such condition; and it could not justify a refusal to send on the ground that the stipulation sought to be exacted as a condition precedent might, by proper effort on his part, be avoided by respondent, because made under compulsion, or because void and nugatory (if such statute should be held to apply to such a case), under section 8582, Comp. Laws.

Following the line of these views, we are of the opinion that appellant could not, as a common carrier, legally require respondent to enter into the agreement which we have just discussed, and so that it could not legally refuse to receive and transmit his message because he declined to make such agreement. Of course this decision will not be understood as touching the question of the right of the company to make and enforce reasonable general regulations for the convenient and orderly transaction of its business, and for the proper protection of its interests, consistent with its duties as a common carrier. The appellant did not object to respondent's message because it was written on respondent's letter head, instead of on a message blank, and so inconvenient for filing or preservation in accordance with the practice of appellant. Respondent offered to use the blank if appellant would erase the contract which he would otherwise be required to assent to in using it. The issue between the parties was distinctly as to the right of appellant to require assent to the stipulations restricting its liability as a common carrier, and this decision covers only that question. Its refusal to receive and transmit respondent's message, under the facts proved, constituted a refusal within the meaning of section 8910, Comp. Laws. Such refusal gave respondent a cause of action, and his right of action was not destroyed or affected by the fact that he afterwards sent substantially the same message. If to refuse the first message was an actionable wrong to respondent, persistence in it by appellant, to the extent of compelling respondent to submit to it, and to send another message on appellant's terms, did not cure or undo the first wrong. The testimony seems to show that respondent offered and attempted to have his message sent in the afternoon, between 2 and 4 o'clock; that it was refused under the circumstances above recited; that he then wrote a letter to the party to whom he desired to send the message, but subsequently, and that evening about 7 o'clock, feeling doubtful of its reaching the party in time, he went to the office and sent upon one of the appellant's blanks a message of very nearly the tenor of the message previously refused. There was nothing in this to waive the wrong of the refusal, or affect respondent's legal right to complain of it.

Finally, it is assigned as error that during the trial the jury was allowed to separate for a few moments without being admonished by the court, as required by section 5051, Comp. Laws, not to converse among themselves, or with others, upon the subject of the trial. Whether, in any case, this fact alone would constitute reversible error, it is not now necessary to determine. The facts were not in dispute, and the law, as we understand it, applied to the conceded facts, plainly required the verdict which the jury rendered. Under such circumstances the appellant could not have been prejudiced.

The judgment of the county court is affirmed.

All the Judges concur.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed, in response to which, on December 9, 1893, Bennett, P. J., delivered the following opinion:

This case was before us at a former term, and an opinion was filed June 26, 1893, which is published in 4 S. D. 105. The only point upon which the appellant takes issue with the court in its opinion is that portion of it which holds that the stipulation found on the message blank of the company, which each patron of the company is required to sign before a message will be sent, that says: "The company will not be liable for damages or statutory penalties in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within sixty days after the message is filed with the company,"—limits the common-law liability of a common carrier, and could not require respondent to enter into this agreement before receiving and transmitting his message; the appellant's contention being that this condition in the message contract does not purport, nor is its effect, to limit its responsibility, but is merely a regulation of its business, which it has a right to make. This contention was fully argued on a former hearing, and very fully considered by the court in the opinion prepared by Justice Kellam; and, were this the only reason urged for a rehearing, we should be inclined to refuse it. But appellant's counsel calls our attention to another question, which was alluded to in the oral argument, and but lightly referred to in his brief, which may have some material bearing upon the merits of the case, and which was not considered by the court. The question is, that section 8910, Comp. Laws, upon which respondent bases his action, is not now, and never has been, in force in this state. In support of the proposition he cites us to title 65, U. S. Rev. Stat. as amended by 19 Stat. at L. 252, by which enactment counsel for appellant contend that the section of the Compiled Laws above referred to has been repealed and abrogated, so far as the appellant is concerned; and our attention is called to a large number of decisions in support of this contention. In view, therefore, of the importance of the case, not so much so as to it alone, but its effect upon other cases which we are informed are now pending between appellant and respondent, and in order that a full determination may be had of all questions in controversy in this action, we shall grant a rehearing as prayed for; and therefore direct the clerk of this court to place the case upon the calendar of this term, with directions that the counsel for the appellant shall prepare his briefs upon the questions raised in his petition for a rehearing, and serve it upon the counsel for the respondent within twenty days after notice of this order, and thereupon the respondent shall have twenty days after such service to prepare his brief, and serve it upon appellant's counsel. Should appellant deem it necessary, he shall have ten days in which to file and serve a reply brief. After the expiration of this time the cause shall stand for hearing at such time as the convenience of the court and the attorneys for the respondent and appellant will permit. The same number of briefs on each side shall be filed in the office of the clerk of this court as is required by our rules upon an original hearing of a cause.

Fuller, J., on October 29, 1895, delivered the opinion of the court:

This case, now before us on rehearing, is reported in 4 S. D. at page 105. There is no dispute about the facts, which are fully stated in the former opinion, and the only question of law engaging our attention, concerning which we are inclined to take a different view, will be disposed of in determining the right of a telegraph company to decline to accept a message for transmission for the sole reason that the sender will not consent to the following stipulation: "The company will not be liable for damages or statutory penalties in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within sixty days after the message is filed with the company for transmission."

The right of a common carrier to make and insist upon a substantial compliance with reasonable rules and regulations, designed to protect its interests and promote the safe and convenient transaction of business, when the same do not affect its liability, has been so uniformly recognized by all the courts that any citation of authorities would be redundant; and, although sections 3886 and 3888 of the Compiled Laws authorize and would sustain an express agreement limiting the obligations of a telegraph company to accept, transmit, and deliver a telegram, a regulation exacting such an agreement as a condition precedent to the acceptance of the message is repugnant to the spirit of the statute, and would be condemned as fraudulent, oppressive, and contrary to every consideration of public policy. We are therefore called upon to consider and determine whether the regulation complained of was reasonable, and whether, by its acceptance, the company's common-law liability or statutory obligation was limited or modified. The message which plaintiff refused to write upon one of the ordinary blanks furnished by the defendant to its patrons, because its agent and operator declined to erase, among other stipulations, the clause requiring any claim for damages or statutory penalties to be presented in writing within sixty days, was addressed to a client of the plaintiff residing at a neighboring railway station, and omitting date, signature, etc., was written in the following language, upon a sheet of white writing paper: "Come down in morning. Want to see you as to your case."

It is prima facie apparent from the nature of this message, and from the proximity of the parties interested in the subject to which it relates, that, ordinarily, sixty days would be a reasonable time within which to apprise the company of any damages occurring from a neglect of duty in transmitting or delivering the same; and if, from any cause, it should become unreasonable in its application, the courts would not sustain its enforcement. The stipulation relates to and impliedly concedes that the company is bound to pay any damages which may be sustained by reason of its inexcusable neglect to perform every duty required by law; and its obligation to accept, safely transmit, and promptly deliver the message is in no manner modified, limited, or intrinsically affected thereby. The defendant was ready and willing to receive and transmit plaintiff's message, subject to all the liability imposed by the statutory or common law; but in view of a multiplicity of similar transactions, and in order to be able to determine whether the damage, if any should be sustained, was occasioned by some superhuman, irresistible cause, or the negligence of officers or agents, it had been taught by common experience to require as a condition precedent, but not as a limitation of liability, that it should be notified and advised of any claim for damages within a reasonable time. Such a regulation is beneficial to the patrons of the company, as it tends to insure prompt adjustment of claims for damages, and is entirely consistent with sound business principles; and from the very nature of the service to be performed, and from the probable difficulty in ascertaining facts concerning which no notice has been given until after years have elapsed, it evidently tends to avoid vexatious litigation, promote the ends of justice, and subserve the welfare of the people generally. True it is that cases may be found where a similar regulation has been construed to constitute a limitation of liability, and some courts have held that the clause has the effect of a statute of limitations; but the reasoning of the opinions in which such a conclusion has been reached is, in our opinion, unsound, and we decline to follow the decisions.

The statutory time within which an action for damages may be instituted against a telegraph company is in no manner shortened by requiring a mere claim therefor to be made within a reasonable time. The action may be brought at any time within the statutory limitation. Insurance companies, regardless of distance and facilities for communication, habitually require, as a condition precedent, notice of a death or fire to be given forthwith, and even sworn proof of loss to be furnished at the home office of the company within thirty, sixty, or ninety days; and it will hardly be claimed that such a requirement limits the time within which an action may be brought under the statute, or that the stipulation is inconsistent with considerations of sound public policy. Before presenting authorities in support of our position, we emphasize, by repetition, that the defendant would be clearly liable for damages and the statutory penalty for refusing to accept and send plaintiff's message to its proper destination if the regulation to which he refused to assent and conform was an unreasonable rule, or limited either the liability of the company or the time within which an action might be commenced. The legislative intention, as expressed in every statute of limitation, is to prevent the indefinite postponement of the time within which an action may be brought; and the evident design, purpose, and effect of the regulation complained of is not only to insure better service to the public, by enabling the company to promptly investigate any alleged dereliction of duty on the part of its agents, but to promote an early settlement of just demands, and make it possible to resist, in courts of justice, groundless, false, and fraudulent claims for damages; and, while some of the authorities from which we shall quote incidentally mention the provision requiring notice to be given within a specified time as a limitation of liability, they have forcefully rejected the doctrine in unambiguous declarations, and by deciding their cases in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

It has been held that "a printed stipulation at the bottom of an express company's receipt for a package, that the company shall not be liable for any loss unless written claim therefor shall be made at the shipping office within thirty days from that date, is valid, and must be complied with." Southern Exp. Co. v. Hunnicutt, 54 Miss. 566, 28 Am. Rep. 885. In Hartwell v. Northern P. Exp. Co. 5 Dak. 463, 3 L. R. A. 342, the jury was instructed that "no written claim was necessary, and that, if they found that the plaintiff made a claim to the company's agent at the point where the trunk was shipped within the required time, and that the company had knowledge of the loss, they would be authorized in finding a verdict for the plaintiff;" and the court held that "the defendant had no reason to complain of the charge," and says: "Under the issues as submitted to the jury, they must have found that the claim was made within ninety days." Although the question whether such a regulation constitutes a limitation of the action or of the liability of a common carrier does not seem to have been regarded by counsel for either party as essential to a decision of the case, the learned judge who wrote the opinion in discussing the proposition, at page 476, 5 Dak., says, concerning our statute of limitations: "The language of the statute confines its prohibition of limitation to enforcement of rights, and is especially intended to cut off all limitations of time for commencement of actions. The provision of this receipt is perhaps rather a condition precedent than a limitation; and, as it is not necessary to this case to determine whether the limitation in this receipt comes within the prohibition of this statute, we shall leave this question for adjudication by the court whenever it shall be fully presented in a case involving this precise point."

Concerning the regulation under consideration, the supreme court of Indiana says: "Here there is no attempt to limit or impair the operation of the statute; nothing is taken from the duty imposed on the telegraph company, nor is that duty lessened or circumscribed in any particular. The duty is left undiminished, but a limitation is fixed within which a claim for loss or injury resulting from a breach shall be made. It is one thing to limit a duty, and quite another thing to prescribe a time for making a claim based on the nonperformance of that duty. The cases cited in the original opinion fully sustain the power of the telegraph company to make reasonable rules and regulations, and a rule embodied in the contract that the claim shall be presented within sixty days is unquestionably a reasonable one."

In a broad sense, the word 'damages' means that which is assessed in the plaintiff's favor as the amount of his recovery, and the statutory penalty is in this sense 'damages.' Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Jones, 95 Ind. 235, 48 Am. Rep. 718.

From 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, at pages 798 and 799, we quote the following: "The stipulation contained in the usual contract of sending, to the effect that the company will not be liable for damages in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within a certain length of time after the message is filed with the company for transmission, does not tend to limit the liability of the company for the consequence of its negligence, and is not unreasonable, where the time allowed is not too short to enable the party claiming damages to become aware of the injury and to present his claim properly. The reasons for this rule are obvious, and it has been upheld where the time was limited to sixty days, to thirty days, and to twenty days, after the filing of the message for transmission, though the rule as to the reasonableness of any particular length of time may change with peculiar circumstances."

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Dougherty, 54 Ark. 221, 11 L. R. A. 102, the views of the court upon the proposition are expressed as follows: "We know of no principle of the common law that would prohibit it. It was not a contract to cover the negligence of the telegraph company. It was a stipulation against the delay and neglect of the plaintiff in presenting his claim, and it does not appear unreasonable. By reason of the character of the business, and the great number of messages sent over the lines of a telegraph company, and the importance of early information of claims to enable the company to keep an account of its transactions, and the impossibility of recalling them all and accounting for them from memory after the lapse of a considerable period of time, it does not appear that a stipulation that a claim for damages should be presented in writing within sixty days from the time the message is sent is unreasonable. . . . Such a condition is not only not a stipulation against the negligence of the company, but it implies that a liability may be incurred for negligence; and it requires that one who seeks to recover damages for such negligence shall present his claim in writing within sixty days or be held to have waived it."

In Kansas a stipulation that "no claim for loss or damage on live stock will be allowed unless the same is made in writing before or at the time the stock is unloaded," was held to be in contravention of no statute, and repulsive to no consideration of public policy, and the court said: "The contract pleaded does not pretend to relieve the defendant from the consequences of his own negligence. It only stipulates that the shipper shall on his part perform certain duties." Goggin v. Kansas P. R. Co. 12 Kan. 416.

In Sherrill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 109 N. C. 527, the court goes on to say: "The stipulation that the company will not be liable unless the claim is presented 'in writing and within sixty days,' is not a stipulation restricting the liability of the telegraph company for negligence. Massengale v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 17 Mo. App. 257. If it were, it would be void, as was held in Thompson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 N. C. 449; Smith v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 88 Ky. 104; Gillis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 61 Vt. 461, 4 L. R. A. 611, in which last case numerous authorities are cited. But this stipulation is rather against the neglect of the plaintiff in not making known his cause of complaint within a reasonable time. It is a reasonable requirement, enabling the company to inquire into the nature and circumstances of a mistake in or of the delay or nondelivery of the message, while the matter is still within the memory of witnesses. In view of the number of telegrams constantly passing over the wires, some such stipulation is absolutely necessary to protect the company from imposition. It is not a statute of limitations restricting the time within which action may be brought."

In Wolf v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 62 Pa. 88, 1 Am. Rep. 887, the court, speaking through Justice Agnew, said: "This condition has no relation to the duty of the telegraph company, its operation being confined to a duty to be performed by the employer before he can maintain an action for a neglect of the company's duty, to wit, to give notice of his claim within sixty days. Similar provisions in policies of insurance have been held to be good. . . . In relation to the duties which concern the public, the unreasonableness of the rules adopted by these companies must, therefore, be scanned with an eye to their public policy. But, clearly, it is not unreasonable that a telegraph company should require notice of claims for its defaults within a reasonable time, before being held to answer for the alleged default. From the very nature of its business this may be essential to its protection against unfounded claims. These companies have often to wrestle with the elements themselves, in the storms which prostrate their lines or prevent their working, and are not to be held to a harsher rule than common carriers, who are excused by the act of God. Within sixty days the cause preventing the transmission of a message on a particular day might be easily ascertained and shown, which, after the lapse of several years, could not be discovered or proved. It is urged that the employer might not discover the failure to send his message forward within this time. How far this fact would displace the condition it is not proper now to say; but the reason is inapplicable to this case, where, from the nature of the message, its failure to reach its destination must be known, and was known, immediately by the employer. Another reason justifying the reasonableness of the provision for notice of the claim is found in the multitude of messages transmitted requiring a speedy knowledge of claims to enable the company to keep an account of its transactions, before, by reason of their great number, they cease to be within their recollection and control. If authority be needed, in addition to these reasons, it will be found in the case of Lewis v. Great Western R. Co. 5 Hurlst. & N. 867."

In Cole v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 38 Minn. 227, the court says: "It cannot be contended that a regulation requiring the sender of a message to present his claim for damages in writing promptly to the company is an unreasonable one. Considering the character of its business, such regulations would be necessary for its own protection, and to enable it reasonably to ascertain the facts in the case, and to secure and preserve the proper evidence. It is not a regulation intended to shield the company from the consequences of a neglect of duty on its part, but prescribing a duty to be performed by the plaintiff before he should be entitled to maintain his action."

The following cases are to the same effect: Sherrill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra; Smith-Frazier Boot & S. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 49 Mo. App. 99; Heimann v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 57 Wis. 562; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Meredith, 95 Ind. 93.

In Primrose v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 154 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 888, the reasonableness and validity of such rules and regulations are discussed by Justice Gray, of the United States Supreme Court.

Concerning the ordinary regulation which relieves the company from liability for its negligence in transmitting an unrepeatable message, Mr. Justice Earl, in Kiley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 109 N. Y., at page 235, says: "That a telegraph company has the right to exact such a stipulation from its customers is the settled law in this and most of the other states of the Union and in England."

It appearing that the stipulation under consideration has been upheld and enforced as a reasonable regulation limiting no liability, in jurisdictions where by express statutory enactment all contracts to limit such liability are declared to be null and void, the right to exact, as a condition precedent, compliance with reasonable rules which in no manner pertain to the carrier's liability for negligence, is not affected by the provision of our statute which authorizes a contract limiting the liability of a common carrier.

In a leading case (Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 264, 22 L. ed. 556), Mr. Justice Strong, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, says: "The question, then, which is presented to us by this record is, whether the stipulation asserted in the defendant's plea is a reasonable one, not inconsistent with sound public policy. It may be remarked, in the first place, that the stipulation is not a conventional limitation of the right of the carrier's employer to sue. He is left at liberty to sue at any time within the period fixed by the statute of limitations. He is only required to make his claim within ninety days, in season to enable the carrier to ascertain what the facts are, and having made his claim, he may delay his suit. It may also be remarked that the contract is not a stipulation for exemption from responsibility for the defendant's negligence, or for that of their servants. It is freely conceded that, had it been such, it would have been against the policy of the law and inoperative. Such was our opinion in New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 857, 21 L. ed. 627. A common carrier is always responsible for his negligence, no matter what his stipulations may be. But an agreement that in case of failure by the carrier to deliver the goods a claim shall be made by the bailor, or by the consignee, within a specified period, if that period be a reasonable one, is altogether of a different character. It contravenes no public policy. It excuses no negligence. It is perfectly consistent with holding the carrier to the fullest measure of good faith, of diligence, and of capacity, which the strictest rules of the common law ever required." Page 268, L. ed. 558. "It purported to relieve the defendants from no part of the obligations of a common carrier. They were bound to the same diligence, fidelity, and care as they would have been required to exercise if no such agreement had been made. All that the stipulation required was that the shipper, in case the package was lost or damaged, should assert his claim in season to enable the defendants to ascertain the facts; in other words, that he should assert it within ninety days." Page 272, L. ed. 560.

If we are correct in our conclusion that, under the circumstances of this case, the requirement under consideration, though beneficial to the company, neither limited its liability nor the time for commencing an action, and was reasonable, and, by securing promptness in presenting a claim for damages, tended to enable plaintiff to hold defendant to the strictest accountability, the force and effect of the foregoing authorities, as applied to this case, is not diminished by the fact that consent had been obtained by the signing of telegrams written on blanks containing the printed regulations, or by the delivery and acceptance of a receipt for the property transmitted, which in law has been construed to constitute an assent to the provisions thereof. Our conclusion therefore is that our former decision should be disaffirmed, and the judgment appealed from is reversed.

Kellam, J., dissenting:

I adhere to the original decision and opinion. In my judgment, the error of the present opinion is fundamental. Its theory and the scope of the question involved, as viewed by the court, are indicated at the outset as follows: "Although sections 3886 and 3888 of the Compiled Laws authorize and would sustain an express agreement limiting the obligations of a telegraph company to accept, transmit, and deliver a telegram, a regulation exacting such an agreement as a condition precedent to the acceptance of the message is repugnant to the spirit of the statute, and would be condemned as fraudulent, oppressive, and contrary to every consideration of public policy." It is thus evident that the court understands that the duty to "accept, safely transmit, and promptly deliver" embraces all the "obligations" of the telegraph company as a common carrier, which a regulation of the company is not equally efficacious to control as an express agreement of the parties; in other words, that the precise manner in which a company shall perform its statutory duty is so important that nothing short of an express agreement can change or modify it, but that its obligation to respond in damages for a violation of its duty is of such minor importance that it may legally exact, as a condition precedent to the performance of its duty, that the party offering the message shall expressly and unqualifiedly agree that it shall not be liable at all unless such party shall perform another condition precedent, not required by the law, but by a demand of the company. I had always supposed that a stipulation prescribing conditions under which there should be no liability, when without such stipulation there would be full liability, was a stipulation limiting liability. "Liability" and "obligation" are correlative terms. The obligation must measure the liability, and whatever cuts off or excuses liability reaches back and affects the obligation, for the obligation of the carrier, like that of any other person, is only to meet his liability. The mistake of the foregoing opinion, in my judgment, is in misinterpreting the scope of our statute and the judicial decisions which it was meant to codify, and in making it refer, not to the general obligation of a carrier, but only to the particular manner in which he performs his service of carriage.

The opinion proceeds to demonstrate—unnecessarily, I think, for nobody disputes the proposition—that this very provision, when made the subject of an express agreement between the parties, has often been held enforceable as reasonable; and so it is argued that, because it is a reasonable stipulation for the parties to make, it is one which the company may require a party to assent to and make before it will undertake to perform the duty imposed upon it by law. Such logic has not often, and probably never, been applied to other cases. A provision in a mortgage for an attorney's fee for foreclosure is held to be reasonable and enforceable when the parties have so agreed; but I think a court, finding a party under obligation to give a mortgage, and so decreeing, would be slow to say that the mortgagee might exact such a stipulation simply because, if voluntarily made, the court would uphold it as reasonable. Why not leave both parties on an equal footing in the determination of the question of what is and what is not reasonable, and not compel one of them, in form at least, to stipulate away his right to raise the question, regardless of excusing facts, as a condition precedent to having his message sent? Section 8910, Comp. Laws, entitles every person whose message is refused contrary to law to $50 in addition to his actual damages. In Kirby v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 4 S. D. 463, this court was very positive and explicit in characterizing this $50 as a penalty, "imposed upon the carrier as a pecuniary punishment for his failure to comply with the provisions of the statute." But this court finds no difficulty in holding that the company may exact an agreement in advance, and as a condition upon which, only, it will receive a message, that it shall not be liable for this penalty, imposed as a punishment on grounds of public policy, unless the sender shall comply, not with some provision of the law, but with a particular regulation which it has made. Here, as before, the question is not, What would be the effect of such an express agreement if voluntarily made? but, Has the company the right to exact such an express agreement before it will receive a message?

I make these suggestions in the belief that the present opinion, except in form, does not reach the question in controversy; certainly, none of the cited cases decide it. They all go upon the question of what stipulation or agreement, when duly made by the parties, will be sustained as reasonable. None of them touch the question of the right of the carrier to exact a formal execution of such an agreement upon the part of the sender before it will receive and send his message. I cannot but regard the quotation appearing in the prevailing opinion, taken from Kiley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 109 N. Y. 285, as at least an infelicitous expression by a very learned judge. If it was meant to declare the legal right of the company to exact the making of such a contract by the sender before his message would be received, then it is sufficient to establish the remark as dictum that no such question was in the case. The contract had been expressly made between the company and the sender, and the court was only determining the legal effect of such a contract when made by the parties. The opinion starts out by saying: "The telegram was written on one of the ordinary blanks of the company. Immediately above the telegram were the words, 'Send the following message subject to the above terms, which are hereby agreed to.'" The court, finding that the parties had voluntarily made a contract, proceeded to construe the stipulation found in such express contract. Of the cases cited by Judge Earl as supporting the text, it is remarkable that not a single one of them treats of the right of the company to exact the making of such an agreement on the part of the sender, as a condition precedent to the sending of a message. In all of them, except Kirkland v. Dinsmore, 62 N. Y. 171, 20 Am. Rep. 475, the agreement had been voluntarily and expressly entered into, and the courts held that the stipulations of such contract were enforceable, because they were such as the parties might reasonably make. Kirkland v. Dinsmore held that an express company delivering to a shipper a receipt for goods, which he accepts without objection, has a right to infer an assent on the part of the shipper to the reasonable conditions of such receipt, thus making a contract between them. But in this jurisdiction the law is otherwise, by express statute. It is the settled law that a railroad company, as a common carrier, may make reasonable regulations for the conduct of its business; but I am not satisfied that it is settled law that the railroad company may refuse to sell a passenger a ticket unless he will in advance enter into an agreement that the ticket is accepted by him subject to certain conditions or regulations of the company. It may be said that such an agreement would not change the rights or liabilities of either party, because the company's regulations, if reasonable, would be enforced without an agreement, and, if unreasonable, would not be enforced with an agreement. Why not say the same thing in the case of the telegraph company? The majority opinion says: "We are therefore called upon to consider and determine whether the regulation complained of was reasonable." I respectfully insist that that question is not before us. So far as I know, nobody questions the right of the company, as a common carrier, to make reasonable regulations for the conduct of its business, nor, so far as I know, is any body questioning the reasonableness of this particular regulation. The law itself imposes upon the company, as a common carrier, certain duties. It also confers upon it certain rights, and among them is the right to make reasonable regulations for the management of its business, and it says these regulations, so far as reasonable, are binding upon those who do business with it. This being all that is necessary to protect the rights of both parties, the law goes no further. It does not allow either party to require from the other the execution of an additional contract with reference to such regulations. If such contract is not to, and does not, change the rights and obligations of either party, then it is useless. It is what the statute denominates an "idle act," which cannot be required of either party. Comp. Laws, § 4719. If, on the other hand, such agreement is designed to affect what would otherwise be the rights or obligations of either party, then surely one party cannot compel the other to assent to it, for mutual voluntary assent is the life of every agreement.

I do not suppose it would be claimed that one party, more than the other, has the right to insist upon the execution of a contract by the other before he would perform on his part. Suppose, then, this company should discontinue the use of the contract feature of its blank, and should simply print its regulations at the head of its message blank; could one offering a message for transmission require the company to execute an agreement with him that it would transmit and deliver the message and respond in damages, if any occurred, in compliance with its printed regulations? I apprehend the ready answer of the company to such a demand would be this: "There are our regulations. If reasonable, they are equally enforceable by and available to both parties, and as well without as with an agreement. An executed written agreement would not change the rights of either party, and we decline to make it." Except for the decision of this court as now announced, I would have supposed such an answer adequate, and to justify the company in its refusal to execute a further contract. The right of the company to demand such a contract before it will undertake the duties imposed upon it by law once conceded, where is it to stop? May it include within its terms only such of its regulations as it considers of particular advantage to itself, omitting others which the sender of the message may desire to have it contain? Is it left with the company to dictate the terms of the agreement? Suppose the sender should say to the company: "You have another regulation with reference to the prompt and free delivery of messages, which does not appear in this agreement. I want that put in." May the company refuse, and still require the sender to sign the agreement as it has prepared it, as a condition of having its message sent? If so, such a discrimination between the parties would seem to me to furnish an apt illustration of making fish of one and fowl of the other. One of two things must certainly be true,—either the making of the agreement changes the rights of the parties, or it does not. If it does, one party cannot insist upon its being made against the consent of the other, for then it would not be an agreement. If it does not, then the making of the agreement is an idle act, which is never required. With these suggestions, I adhere to the former, original opinion.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Abel C. VAIL, Respt.,
v.

BROADWAY RAILROAD COMPANY of Brooklyn, Appt.

(147 N. Y. 377.)

A passenger riding on the platform of a street car is not a passenger "on any railroad" who assumes the risk of injury, under the provisions of the New York general railroad law of 1850, § 46, as that was not intended to apply to street railways.

(November 26, 1895.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Brooklyn City Court affirming a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas S. Moore, for appellant:

It is not negligence per se, under the authorities, to stand on the front platform of a street car, independent of the statute (Nolan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 63, 41 Am. Rep. 345, but it is not by any means the law that a person in that place is relieved from the necessity of showing due care or of proving facts and circumstances from which it may be inferred.

Wexton v. Troy, 139 N. Y. 281; Reynolds v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 248; Wietrowski v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 124 N. Y. 425.

Under the statute this company is freed from liability for the injury sustained by the plaintiff in this case.

Chapter 906 of the laws of 1867 provides that the requirements of section 81 of the railroad act of 1850 shall not apply to street or horse railroads except as therein provided,—a clear implication that otherwise it would apply, and that the act generally did so apply.

Re Washington S. A. & P. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 447.

The care to be taken by a common carrier of its passengers is certainly very great, but some limitations are reasonable in the case of street railroads as well as in the case of steam railroads.

Among such reasonable limitations is a provision that when the carrier has provided sufficient accommodation for its passengers within the vehicle, if a passenger refuses to avail himself of it and takes up a dangerous and exposed position on the outside, he should bear any injury resulting, as an assumed risk.

Co.* 97 N. Y. 259; Connolly v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 114 N. Y. 104.

Mr. Thomas E. Pearsall, for respondent:

It is not negligence per se for one riding upon the front platform of a street car to omit to take hold of the iron bar or rail to prevent being thrown from the platform.

Ginna v. Second Ave. R. Co. 67 N. Y. 596. It is not contributory negligence per se to ride on the front platform of horse cars.

Nolan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 63, 41 Am. Rep. 345; Dixon v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 100 N. Y. 170; Ginna v. Second Ave. R. Co. supra; Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 86 N. Y. 135, 93 Am. Dec. 495; Sheridan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 86 N. Y. 89, 93 Am. Dec. 490; Germantown Pass. R. Co. v. Walling, 97 Pa. 55, 39 Am. Rep. 796; Burns v. Bellefontaine R. Co. 50 Mo. 189; Meesel v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 90 Mass. 284; Maguire v. Middlesex R. Co. 115 Mass. 239.

And this rule is not affected by there being room inside of the car.

Nolan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. supra. Laws 1850, chap. 140, § 46, cannot fairly be said to have any application to horse cars, and the fact that the defendant's act of incorporation in general terms makes the provisions of the general railroad act applicable to its company does not strengthen its case on this point.

Laz v. Forty Second Street & G. S. F. R. Co. 14 Jones & S. 448; Butler v. Glens Falls, S. H. & Ft. E. Street R. Co. 17 N. Y. S. R. 565, affirmed, 121 N. Y. 112; Weymouth v. Broadway & S. A. R. Co. 2 Misc. 507, affirmed, 142 N. Y. 681.

The front platforms of street cars have never been held a place of great danger by our courts; nor have they been considered so by the courts of foreign jurisdiction.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff recovered a verdict against the defendant for his damages sustained in consequence of a serious personal injury while riding in one of the defendant's cars as a passenger on the 20th of October, 1892. It is conceded that there was evidence of the defendant's negligence in the case sufficient to require its submission to the jury. It is quite clear also that upon the question of the plaintiff's negligence contributing to the injury, so far as that question depends upon general principles, and not upon special statutes, the case was one for the jury. The plaintiff was, at the time of the accident, riding upon the front platform of the car, smoking cigar, which he had when entering it from the street.

The only question in the case which this court has the right to review is whether the action was defeated by the provisions of § 46 of the general railroad law of 1850. Laws 1850, chap. 140, § 46.

That section reads as follows: "In case any passenger on any railroad shall be injured while on the platform of a car, or any baggage, wood, or freight car, in violation of the printed regulations of the company, posted up at the time in a conspicuous place inside of its passenger cars then in the train, such company shall not be liable for the injury; provided said company at the time furnished room inside its passenger cars sufficient for the proper accommodation of the passengers."

The fact that the defendant has omitted to plead this statute as a defense would ordinarily be a sufficient answer to the point. When a railroad company, in an action to recover damages by a passenger, sustained in consequence of a breach of the duty which the corporation owes to him as such, claims immunity under some provision of a statute, it should plead all the facts upon which the immunity claimed rests. Weymouth v. Broadway & S. A. R. Co. 2 Misc. 507, 142 N. Y. 681. But as this question was not raised at the trial, we prefer to dispose of the objection upon broader grounds. The question is whether this statute was ever intended to have any application to a street railroad. It is quite certain that the companies themselves have not so regarded it, since it is a matter of common knowledge that they receive passengers every day when there is no place for them except upon the platforms, and have for years. The construction which such corporations themselves have for many years given to this statute should not be entirely disregarded when seeking for its true meaning and when urged as a defense by one of the companies to an action in which it admits its own negligence. It may be conceded that the general language used is broad enough to cover the case, but words and language must, in the construction of a statute, always yield to what appears to have been the intention of the lawmakers. The literal meaning of words or phrases should never be permitted to pervert the purpose of the law, or to defeat the end which the legislature had in view, or to enlarge the operation of the law and extend it to subjects not within the legislative mind, or the evils intended to be remedied. When the intention of the law can be ascertained the courts will not allow this intention to be thwarted or perverted because the proper words were not used, but all will be made to conform to reason and good discretion. 1 Kent, Com. 462; People v. Potter, 47 N. Y. 875.

The general purpose of the act of 1850 was to provide for the operation of steam railroads. It is perfectly manifest and has always been conceded that many of its provisions can have no application whatever to street railroads. In the nature of things a provision of this character, intended primarily to prevent accidents and injuries to passengers on trains operated by steam and running at a high rate of speed, is not applicable to a street railroad, the cars of which are drawn through city streets at the rate of a few miles per hour. The danger to passengers standing upon the platform of steam cars when in motion is great and obvious, while that to passengers on the platform of street cars is almost nothing, as is fully demonstrated by the practice of the general public and the companies themselves. Moreover, the words employed in construing the section indicate quite clearly that what the legislature had in mind was riding on the platform of steam railroads. The section speaks of "trains," and of "baggage, freight, and wood cars," terms which can have no application to the defendant. The notice required was to be posted in the cars "then in the train," an expression which never was in popular use with reference to street railroads. The use of the words "any railroad" cannot be permitted to control the meaning of the law, in view of the notorious fact that at the time of its enactment, or since, there is not the slightest reason to believe that the legislature apprehended any evil or danger from riding on the platform of street cars. To hold at this day that a passenger riding on the platform of a street car, under the circumstances urged by defendant, is doing so at his own risk, because in violation of the statutes, would be to impose upon the public and the railroads themselves duties and obligations that have not heretofore been generally supposed to exist. Such a construction would unnecessarily extend the operation of the statute to cases and to a state of things manifestly not within its original scope or purpose.

We do not think that the incorporation in the defendant's charter of all the provisions of the general railroad law, with the exception of two sections mentioned, strengthens the defendant's position. All that was intended by that was that such portions of the general law as were applicable to street railroads should become a part of the charter.

It was not intended by reference to the general law in the act incorporating the defendant to give to the section in question any other or broader application than that which was in the mind of the legislature when originally enacting it.

The law can mean nothing more when specifically made a part of the defendant's charter than it does as it appears upon the statute book, or as it came from the legislature in the first instance.

It appeared that one of the rules of the defendant corporation, in force at the time of the accident, was to the effect that "smoking on the closed cars is prohibited except on the front platform." It might well be held, we think, that this corporate regulation was intended to and did modify the notice posted in the car, and so operated as a waiver of any immunity conferred under the provisions of the general law referred to. The true construction of the provision of the act of 1850 referred to was sharply involved in the case of Butler v. Glens Falls, S. H. & Ft. E. Street R. Co. 17 N. Y. S. R. 565, and from the disposition of the case afterwards made in this court it is quite evident that it was held that it did not apply to a street railroad. 131 N. Y. 112.

For these reasons the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

NATIONAL TELEPHONE MANUFACTURING COMPANY

v.

John E. DU BOIS et al., Appts.

(.....Mass.....)

1. Courts of equity are not open to a foreign corporation as matter of strict right, but as a matter of comity.
2. Jurisdiction will not be taken on service by publication of an action by a foreign corporation having a place of business in the state, to recover a debt, contracted in another state and not reduced to judgment, from a nonresident whose only property in the state consists of his interest as partner in a firm whose property, assets, books, vouchers, papers, and accounts are all, with few exceptions, in another state, where the principal business of the firm is carried on and two of the partners live.

(January 1, 1896.)

APPPEAL by defendants from an order of the Superior Court for Suffolk County overruling demurrers to the bill and motions to dismiss in a suit brought to reach assets of defendant DuBois which were alleged to be in possession of one of the other defendants as his copartner. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Johnson, Clapp, & Underwood, for appellants:

Under Pub. Stat. chap. 151, § 2, the court has power only to apply in satisfaction of the debt "the interest of a copartner in the partnership property."

The interest of a copartner is his proportion of the partnership assets after they have been realized and converted into money, and all the debts and liabilities have been paid and discharged.

1 Lindley, Partn. 2d Am. ed. *340; Pierce v. Jackson, 6 Mass. 242; Tobey v. McFarlin, 115 Mass. 98; Maxwell v. Cochran, 136 Mass. 73.

In the case at bar the interest of defendant Dubois could not be reached under Pub. Stat. chap. 151, § 2, cl. 11, as it was not property within this state.

Carver v. Peck, 181 Mass. 291.

A part of the partnership property cannot be seized to pay the indebtedness of an individual partner.

Tobey v. McFarlin, supra; Allen v. Wells, 23 Pick. 450, 38 Am. Dec. 757; Pond v. Kimball, 101 Mass. 105; 2 Lindley, Partn. (authorized Am. ed.) 358, notes; Claggett v. Kilbourne, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 346, 17 L. ed. 213; Gibson v. Stevens, 7 N. H. 352.

In this state seizure by an officer of the goods of a copartnership for the satisfaction of the debt of one partner is wrongful and an act of trespass.

Sanborn v. Royce, 183 Mass. 594; Fay v. Dugan, 135 Mass. 242; Parsons, Partn. 4th ed. §§ 112 et seq.; Rogers v. Batchelor, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 221, 9 L. ed. 1068.

This court has no jurisdiction over the interest of the defendant DuBois in the partnership of DuBois & Van Tassel Brothers, to apply it in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim, because:

1. No decree in personam can be rendered against the principal defendant, as he has not been served with process and has not appeared and waived the want of jurisdiction.

Needham v. Thayer, 147 Mass. 536; Spurr v. Scoville, 8 Cush. 578; McCann v. Randall, 147 Mass. 81.

2. The only means by which the court could acquire jurisdiction is by a proceeding quasi in rem against the interest of said John E. DuBois in the copartnership.

Inasmuch as the plaintiff's claim is not in judgment, under Stat. 1884, chap. 285, the court must first enter a judgment establishing such claim, before it can examine into the question of the right of the defendant DuBois in the alleged copartnership.

Draper v. Holting, 168 Mass. 127.

The jurisdiction of the court to enter a judgment establishing such claim must be based upon the court's first having obtained possession or control over the interest of the defendant.

Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Freeman v. Alderson, 119 U. S. 185, 30 L. ed. 372; Elliott v. McCormick, 144 Mass. 10; Needham v. Thayer, 147 Mass. 536; Boswell v. Otis, 50 U. Scoville*, 8 Cush. 578; Felch v. Hooper, 119 Mass. 52.

All the cases in which creditors' bills to reach and apply property under this statute have been maintained may be grouped into three classes:

1. Where the principal debtor is within the jurisdiction of the court and has been served with process, so that the court can compel him to transfer the property by means of its personal decree, irrespective of the location of the property.

Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire Alarm Co. 149 Mass. 24, 151 Mass. 515, 8 L. R. A. 309; Anthracite Ins. Co. v. Sears, 109 Mass. 383; Carver v. Peck, 131 Mass. 291.

2. Property actually within the state in the custody or control of some person having power of disposal over it, or accountable for it to the principal defendant.

McCann v. Randall, 147 Mass. 81; Davis v. Werden, 18 Gray, 306; Silloway v. Columbia Ins. Co. 8 Gray, 199.

3. Simple contract obligations due to non-resident debtor defendants, where the party owing is within the jurisdiction of the court.

Lord v. Harte, 118 Mass. 271; Bragg v. Gaynor, 85 Wis. 468, 21 L. R. A. 161; Pinney v. McGregory, 102 Mass. 187; Clark v. Blacking- ton, 110 Mass. 378; Felch v. Hooper, 119 Mass. 52; Desper v. Continental Water Meter Co. 187 Mass. 252; Merrill v. Beckwith, 168 Mass. 508.

In cases where the defendant is personally not before the court, there must be some person having custody or control over the property within the jurisdiction of the court.

Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Abbott, 127 Mass. 558; Desper v. Continental Water Meter Co. supra; Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire Alarm Co. 151 Mass. 515, 8 L. R. A. 309.

The interest of a copartner in the partnership property is not tangible property situated anywhere; it is a mere personal right, and has no situs other than that of the owner.

Fourth Nat. Bank v. New Orleans & O. R. Co. 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 624, 20 L. ed. 82; Otis v. Boston, 12 Cush. 44; Bemis v. Boston, 14 Allen, 866; Carver v. Peck, 131 Mass. 291; Desper v. Continental Water Meter Co. 187 Mass. 254; Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire Alarm Co. 149 Mass. 24.

The interest of the partner Du Bois is not in the custody or control of any person within this state, or who is personally before the court.

The filing of the bill does not constitute an attachment of property sought to be reached, even where the property is within the state.

Fish v. Fiske, 154 Mass. 302; Squire v. Lincoln, 187 Mass. 399; Powers v. Raymond, Id. 458.

This statute is framed to enable residents of Massachusetts to collect debts contracted by them within the state against persons having property within the state, refusing to pay their debts.

Pierce v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 145 Mass. 56; Smith v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 14 Allen, 336; Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire Alarm Co. 149 Mass. 27.

Mr. William H. McInnes, for appellee:

Stat. 1884, chap. 285, § 2, expressly provides that by a bill in equity brought under Pub. Stat. chap. 151, § 2, cl. 11, the interest of a copartner in the partnership property may be reached and applied in payment of the plaintiff's debt.

No language occurs in any of the statutes giving jurisdiction in equity in proceedings against absent defendants, which makes the obtaining of an attachment, or even of a temporary injunction, necessary to the jurisdiction. On the contrary, the omission of language to any such effect is in sharp contrast with the provisions of Pub. Stat. chap. 164, § 1.

Stat. 1851, chap. 206; Stat. 1858, chap. 34; Pub. Stat. chap. 151, § 2, cl. 11; Stat. 1884, chap. 285; Pub. Stat. chap. 141, § 22.

The contention that even if a temporary injunction had issued the property would still be out of the control of the court, and therefore that the court would still have no jurisdiction, goes to the extent of saying that the Statute of 1831, chap. 206, which applied only to foreign debtors, was entirely nugatory.

See Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire Alarm Co. 151 Mass. 518, 8 L. R. A. 309.

The courts of this commonwealth have always regarded this bill as a process in the nature of an equitable trustee process or an equitable attachment.

Chapman v. Banker & Tradesman Pub. Co. 128 Mass. 478; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Abbott, 127 Mass. 558; Tucker v. McDonald, 105 Mass. 424; Maxwell v. Cochran, 186 Mass. 78.

When there is a res within the commonwealth which it is sought to reach under the statutes expressly provided therefor, such suit is a proceeding in rem and the courts have jurisdiction.

Felch v. Hooper, 119 Mass. 52; McCann v. Randall, 147 Mass. 81; Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire Alarm Co. 151 Mass. 518, 8 L. R. A. 309.

That the complainant is a New Hampshire corporation cannot deprive the court of jurisdiction, as by comity such an artificial person is permitted to sue in this state.

Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 463, 6 Am. Dec. 88; Roberts v. Knights, 7 Allen, 449; Smith v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 14 Allen, 836; Peabody v. Hamilton, 106 Mass. 217; Johnston v. Trade Ins. Co. 182 Mass. 432; Bailey v. Hemenway, 147 Mass. 826.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in this case is a New Hampshire corporation, with a place of business in Boston, whose claim had not been reduced to judgment, and does not relate to a contract made in this state. The claim is for labor, materials, and disbursements performed, furnished, and made in the state of Pennsylvania. The principal defendant is a resident of Pennsylvania, with no property here except his interest as partner in a firm whose property, assets, books, vouchers, papers, and accounts are all, with some few exceptions, in DuBois, in the state of Pennsylvania, where its principal business is carried on, and where one of the other two partners lives, with the principal defendant. The service is by publication. The courts of equity in this state are not open to the plaintiff as matter of strict right, but as matter of comity. Smith v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 14 Allen, 836, 839. And if it appears that complete justice cannot be done here, or that the amount involved is small, and the defendant will be subjected to great and unnecessary expense and inconvenience, and that the investigation required will be surrounded, if conducted here, with many and great, if not insuperable, difficulties, which all will be avoided, without especial hardships to the plaintiff, if suit is brought against the defendant in the state where he lives, and where the alleged debt was contracted, and where personal service can be made on him, we think that our courts should decline to take jurisdiction. Pierce v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 145 Mass. 56; Bank of North America v. Rindge, 154 Mass. 203, 13 L. R. A. 56; Post v. Toledo, C. & St. L. R. Co. 144 Mass. 341, 59 Am. Rep. 86. All of these circumstances are found in this case. The amount of the claim is $72.75, which, of itself, prior to the passage of Stat. 1884, chap. 285, would have prevented the court from taking jurisdiction. Chapman v. Banker & Tradesman Pub. Co. 128 Mass. 478. We do not think that statute was intended to encourage foreign corporations in bringing suits like the present, or to take away the power of the court to deal with them as equity and justice might require. The alleged debt was contracted in Pennsylvania, and had not been reduced to judgment when this suit was brought, either there or anywhere. There has been no personal service in this proceeding. According to the agreed facts, it is manifest that the principal defendant will be subjected to great and unnecessary expense if compelled to come here, and that the investigation required to ascertain his interest will be surrounded with difficulties which all will be avoided without any apparent hardship to the plaintiff, if it brings its suit in Pennsylvania. It is true that the agreed facts find that "it would appear from an examination of the books, vouchers, and papers, at the offices in Pennsylvania and in Boston, that the interest of the said John E. DuBois [the principal defendant] . . . was in excess of the amount sought to be recovered in this suit, including costs and any possible cost of liquidating the affairs of the partnership in Massachusetts;" and for the purposes of the suit it is also agreed that the assets in Pennsylvania greatly exceed the entire indebtedness of the firm. But it is expressly stipulated that nothing contained in the agreed statements is to be regarded as a waiver on the part of any of the defendants of the question of jurisdiction. The objection to jurisdiction was seasonably taken, and, without adverting to other grounds that have been urged by the defendants, we think that for the reasons stated the bill should be dismissed; and it is so ordered.

Bill dismissed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Minnesota, ex rel. H. W. CHILDS, Attorney General,

v.
John B. SUTTON.

(.....Minn.....)

*Article 4, section 9, of the Constitution

*Headnote by BUCK, J.

of this state provides as follows: "No senator or representative shall, during the time for which he is elected, hold any office under the authority of the United States or the state of Minnesota, except that of postmaster." Held, that, under this constitutional provision, the disability of a member of the legislature to hold office does not cease until the expiration of the full period of time for which he was elected.

NOTE.—As to incompatibility of offices, see Attorney General v. Marston (N. H.) 13 L. R. A. 670, and 80 L. R. A.

PETITION for a writ of quo warranto to oust respondent from the office of inspector of boilers. Ouster decreed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. W. Childs, Attorney General, and George B. Edgerton, for relator:

If we are to be governed by the natural force of language, the word "time," as used in the section, comprehends the whole constitutional term.

The legislature sought to remove from the incumbent an inducement for causing a vacancy in the office for which he had been elected.

Ellis v. Lennon, 86 Mich. 408; Waldo v. Wallace, 12 Ind. 569; Shelby v. Alcorn, 86 Miss. 273, 72 Am. Dec. 169; Sublett v. Bedwell, 47 Miss. 266, 12 Am. Rep. 338; Smith v. Moore, 90 Ind. 294; Story, Const. §§ 867-869.

A constitutional ineligibility cannot be cured at the polls.

Messrs. Davis, Kellogg, & Severance, for respondent:

What the constitutional convention had in mind was to render it impossible for a senator or representative, while such, to fill any other office. That is, the sole purpose of the section was to prevent the holding of the office of senator or representative and at the same time some other position in one of the co-ordinate branches of the state government other than the legislative.

The right of resignation of an office is an absolute right and any office holder has the right to resign any time he sees fit.

From the earliest times it has been the law in Minnesota that where a constitutional provision has been practically construed, and such construction has been continuously acted upon, the courts will not construe the provision otherwise if it can be avoided.

Carson v. Smith, 5 Minn. 78, 77 Am. Dec. 539; Faribault v. Misener, 20 Minn. 396; State v. Benedict, 15 Minn. 198; Ames v. Lake Superior & M. R. Co. 21 Minn. 241; *State v. The proper construction of the section under consideration has engaged the attention of the attorney general's office, of the supreme court, of the executive, and of the people at different times for over thirty years, and the construction has been uniform and in favor of the position of the respondent.

As to the effect of resignation to relieve from disability to hold office during the time for which an office was elected, the above case is believed to be 30 L. R. A.

Buck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the general state election held on the 6th day of November, 1894, the respondent, John B. Sutton, was elected to the office of representative of the twenty-third legislative district for the term commencing on the first Monday of January, 1895, and ending on the first Monday of January, 1897. Pursuant to such election, he duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of his duties as such member at the commencement of the session for the year 1895, and in that capacity served until the 2d day of May of that year, when he resigned his office as such member. The legislative session during which he served as a member terminated prior to his resignation. On the 4th day of May, 1895, Sutton was appointed to the public office of inspector of boilers for the fourth congressional district in this state, which office is one of great public importance and responsibility, it having been created by an act of the legislature prior to Sutton's election as a member thereof. Upon his appointment to the office of inspector of boilers, Sutton qualified and entered upon the performance of the duties of the office, and as such officer he has continued to and now occupies and holds said office, claiming the right so to do by virtue of his appointment. This proceeding is by a writ of quo warranto to oust and exclude the respondent, Sutton, from further acting as such inspector of boilers, upon the ground that he is prohibited by the Constitution from holding such office until the expiration of the time for which he was elected as representative. The clause relied upon by the attorney general to sustain his contention is art. 4, § 9, of the Constitution, and reads as follows: "No senator or representative shall, during the time for which he is elected, hold any office under the authority of the United States or the state of Minnesota, except that of postmaster; and no senator or representative shall hold an office under the state, which had been created or the emoluments of which had been increased during the session of the legislature of which he was a member, until one year after the expiration of his term of office in the legislature." In treating of constitutional provisions, we believe it is the general rule among courts to regard them as mandatory, and not to leave it to the will or pleasure of a legislature to obey or disregard them. Where the language of the Constitution is plain, we are not permitted to indulge in speculation concerning its meaning, nor whether it is the embodiment of great wisdom. A Constitution is intended to be framed in brief and precise language, and represents the will and wisdom of the constitutional convention, and that of the people who adopt it. It stands, not only as the will of the sovereign power, but as security for private rights, and as a barrier against legislative invasion. It has been well said that "the Constitution, which underlies and sustains the social structure of the state, must be beyond being shaken or affected by unrec-one of first impression, although it was held in Smith v. Moore, 90 Ind. 294, that refusal to accept an office prevents the application of such provision.

essary construction, or by the refinements of legal reasoning." People v. Rathbone, 145 N. Y. 484, 28 L. R. A. 834. The rule with reference to constitutional construction is also well stated in the case of Newell v. People, 7 N. Y. 9, as follows: "If the words embody a definite meaning, which involves no absurdity, and no contradiction between different parts of the same writing, then that meaning apparent upon the face of the instrument is the one which alone we are at liberty to say was intended to be conveyed. In such a case there is no room for construction. That which the words declare is the meaning of the instrument, and neither courts nor legislatures have the right to add to or take away from that meaning. This is true of every instrument, but when we are speaking of the most solemn and deliberate of human writings, those which ordain the fundamental laws of states, the rule rises to a very high degree of significance. It must be very plain nay, absolutely certain, that the people did not intend what the language they have employed, in its natural signification, imports, before a court will feel itself at liberty to depart from the plain reading of a constitutional provision."

In the case at bar it is not necessary for us to speculate upon the intention of the framers of the Constitution in adopting the provision in question. A bare reading of this provision suffices to enable us to ascertain and understand its meaning, and we need not search for light through the uncertainties of extraneous interpretation or construction. It is a part of the organic law of the state that no senator or representative shall, during the time for which he is elected, hold any office under the authority of the state of Minnesota. Is there any uncertainty or ambiguity about this language? Has it any of the characteristics which demand a construction to be placed upon it by the judiciary of this state, other than that which is transparent from the language itself? The respondent, Sutton, became a representative of the legislature of the state of Minnesota on the first Monday in January, 1895, and the time for which he was elected continues until the first Monday in January, 1897. He was not merely prohibited from holding any office during the time which he might serve, but during the time for which he was elected. The difference is obvious, and the language too sweeping to be disregarded. The respondent could not nullify the constitutional prohibitory clause, "during the time for which he is elected," by his resignation of the office of representative. The time for which he was elected was the entire constitutional term of two years, and, whether he resigned during that time or not, he was not permitted to hold any other office, under the authority of this state, during such entire term. Evidently, it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, by the language used, to prevent, so far as possible, trafficking in public offices, and, so far as appropriate language, with definite and well-understood meaning, is concerned, they did so. But this clause is absolute in its express terms that no members of the legislature, during the time for which he was elected, shall hold any other office under the authority of the state of Minnesota. Hence, whether a member holds an office either by trafficking for it, or by an appointment conferred upon him, without solicitation and without bargaining for it, he still comes within the constitutional prohibition. It is not merely a question of whether he obtained the office in an honorable manner, but the prohibition is so far-reaching as to prohibit its being held, no matter what the conditions are upon which it was obtained.

It is due to the respondent that we should say distinctly that there is nothing in the record whereby anything dishonorable in obtaining this office can be imputed to him, or to the one appointing him. Undoubtedly he is holding this office under an erroneous view of the meaning of the constitutional provision above referred to, but nevertheless against its express prohibition.

There are several other constitutional provisions bearing upon this question of holding office which we may, perhaps, examine with profit. A member of the legislature is forbidden to hold any office under the state, the emoluments of which had been increased during the session of the legislature of which he was a member, until one year after the expiration of his term of office in the legislature. There can be no serious question raised as to the right of a member of the legislature to resign his office; but, if he does so, it cannot enlarge his right to hold another office, in violation of this constitutional prohibition. The disability only ceases at the expiration of the full period of time for which he was elected. This prohibition against holding other offices also applies to the judiciary. Const. art. 6, § 11, provides that "the justices of the supreme court and the district court shall hold no other office under the United States nor any other office under this state. And all votes for either of them for any elective office under this Constitution, except a judicial office, given by the legislature or the people during their continuance in office, shall be void." As the judges have no legislative power, the rule applied to them is different, but not less rigid. Even a vote cast for them by the people or the legislature, for any office except a judicial one, is absolutely void; and bartering by them for other official positions would be utterly useless. But this prohibition as to votes for them only applies during their continuance in office. When their terms cease, the disability no longer exists, and during their terms, having no legislative power, the temptation to traffic in official positions is wanting; and, when their terms expire, they stand upon equal footing with other citizens, so far as concerns their right to hold office.

We are not unmindful of the fact that there is a long line of opinions given by the attorney general of this state which are not in harmony with the views herein expressed upon the main question here involved, but, however able those opinions may be considered, yet, when the act of the respondent in holding the office of inspector of boilers, under the circumstances, clearly contravenes an express power of the Constitution, we feel it our imperative duty to so hold and determine; and, while there may have been others holding offices under similar circumstances, one or more violations of a constitutional provision, we need hardly say, is no justification for any further violation of that instrument. Perhaps there is some apparent excuse and justification for the respondent's appointment and holding this office, in view of the opinions to which we have referred, and in view of the language used by the court in the case of Barnum v. Gilman, 27 Minn. 466, 38 Am. Rep. 804. Great reliance is placed by the respondent's counsel upon this case to sustain his position, and there is language used which seems to justify the meaning which counsel claims for it; but, in view of the fact that the syllabus in that case makes no reference to this constitutional question, but does expressly state another ground upon which the case was decided, and in view of the further fact that the language used in the opinion seems to place the decision substantially upon another ground, we must regard what was there said in reference to the constitutional provision here under consideration as obiter. There are other statements, however, in that opinion, which we regard as sound law, viz.: "Ineligibility to hold an office, and ineligibility to an election to it, are not identical. One may be disqualified from holding an office at the time of his election thereto, and yet be eligible to an election to it; and if, before he is required to enter upon its duties, the disability is removed, he may also take and hold it." To illustrate this position, suppose a member of the house of representatives of the last legislature should, at the general election in the month of November, 1896, be elected to the office of governor of this state, his eligibility to the latter office could not be successfully challenged, because the time for which he was elected a member of the legislature would expire before the commencement of his official term as governor. In such case it could not be said that he was holding another office during the time for which he was elected a member of the legislature. It is therefore the holding of another office, and not the election to it, which is prohibited during the time for which a member of the legislature was elected.

We are of the opinion that the respondent, in holding the office of inspector of boilers, as charged in the writ of quo warranto, comes within the prohibition of the Constitution (article 4, § 9), and it is therefore adjudged that said respondent, John B. Sutton, is guilty of unlawfully holding and exercising the office of inspector of boilers for the fourth congressional district in this state. And it is further ordered and adjudged that said John B. Sutton be ousted and excluded from said office of inspector of boilers, and that judgment be entered accordingly.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

AGRICULTURAL INSURANCE COMPANY of Watertown, New York, App't.,

v.

James K. HAMILTON, to Use of J. Thomas C. HOPKINS et al.

(.....Md.....)

1. A dwelling house is vacant or unoccupied in the sense in which those terms are employed in a policy of insurance, when it is not used as a fixed abode, although employees occasionally sleep there and some provisions are kept in the house, which is visited to obtain them.
2. The forfeiture of an insurance policy as to the risk upon a dwelling house by virtue of a provision that the entire policy shall be void for vacancy or nonoccupancy, avoids it also as to personal property in the house.
3. The fact that loss is by indorsement made payable to mortgagees as their interest may appear does not prevent a breach of condition of the policy from making it void as to the mortgagees as well as to other parties.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Harford County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

NOTE.—For severability of insurance policy, see Wright v. Fire Ins. Asso. (Mont.) 19 L. R. A. 211, and note; also Trabue v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. (Mo.) 23 L. R. A. 719.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank C. Gorrell and Thomas H. Robinson for appellant.

Messrs. J. T. C. Hopkins, William H. Harlan, and S. A. Williams for appellees.

McSherry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 11th of June, 1899, the appellant, a fire insurance company, wrote a policy of insurance upon the dwelling house, barn, and personal property of the appellee, insuring the same against loss by fire for the term of three years. Upon the expiration of this policy in 1892 a second one for the same amount, for another term of three years, and covering the same property, was issued by the same company. At the time the first policy bears date, and continuously on from then until the month of December, 1892, the dwelling house covered by the policy was actually occupied by the appellee and his family as a place of abode, but in December, 1892, he and his family moved out of the house and went into and occupied another dwelling some few hundred yards away and located on the opposite side of a public highway.

He took with him nearly all his furniture, though he left in the house from which he moved a few beds and some trifling household articles, a trunk containing clothing, and some provisions stored in a pantry. He and his family ceased to live in the house mentioned in the policy. On the 27th of December, 1893, the house from which he moved and which was insured under the policy issued by the appellant, was totally destroyed by fire. Due proof of loss was filed, but the company refused to pay the loss, and based its refusal upon a ground which will be stated later on. Thereupon suit was brought on the policy. When both policies were issued the property was subject to a mortgage held by Messrs. Hopkins and Harlan, to whose use the suit was entered just before the trial in the court below, and across the face of both policies there was written in red ink the words "Loss, if any, payable to mortgagees as interest may appear." Among other terms and conditions contained in the policy sued on it is expressly provided that "this entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added hereto, shall be void . . . if a building herein described, whether intended for occupancy by owner or tenant, be or become vacant or unoccupied and so remain for ten days."

For nearly three months after the appellees removed from the insured dwelling no person occupied the house at all, and on March 6, 1893, permission was granted to the insured to remove the household furniture, family provisions, wearing apparel, and organ as insured under the policy, into another dwelling "the insurance to cease at the former and apply at the latter location from" the date just named; but there was no agreement, memorandum, or assent indorsed upon or added to the policy that the dwelling house from which the appellee had previously removed should remain vacant or unoccupied at the risk of the insurer. During a portion of the time from March, 1893, down to the fall of the same year, two and sometimes three of the workmen employed by the appellee upon his farm and in his canning business slept in the house described in the insurance policy, but they did not occupy it during the daytime, and did not cook or eat their meals there. Within a week before the destruction of the house by fire a man in the service of the appellee spent one night in the house; and occasionally whilst the hands slept there one of the sons of the appellee also slept in the house. During the whole period of time intervening between December, 1892, when the appellee moved out of the house and December 27, 1893, when the house was burned, the appellee's wife went daily to the house to get provisions stored and kept there.

For a portion of this time a large number of cases of canned goods, manufactured by the appellee, were stored in the house; and at the time of the fire, in addition to the trifling articles of household furniture, the clothing and provisions that were there, some fifty odd bushels of wheat were stored in one of the first-floor rooms. There is no proof as to how the fire originated. When the evidence closed, numerous prayers for instructions were presented by the defendant, but as the fourth raises the controlling question in the case and embodies the ultimate ground upon which the company resists payment of the demand made upon it, we need neither examine nor consider any of the others. The fourth prayer is in these words: "That there is no evidence in this case that the dwelling house that was destroyed by fire, as testified to, was occupied as a dwelling, within the proper construction of the policy of insurance offered in evidence in this case, on the 27th day of December, 1893, or that it had been so occupied at any time within ten days preceding said fire, and that no agreement permitting the property to be vacant and unoccupied was indorsed or added to the policy of insurance offered in evidence, and their verdict must be for the defendant." This, together with several other prayers, was rejected. The verdict and judgment were against the insurance company, and it has brought up this appeal.

The distinct inquiry is thus presented for the first time in this court, as to what is the meaning of the terms "vacant or unoccupied," as applied to dwelling houses under fire insurance policies embodying a forfeiture clause of the kind we have said the policy sued on contains.

In Kelly's Case, 32 Md. 431, 3 Am. Rep. 149, and in Weaver's Case, 70 Md. 539, 5 L. R. A. 478, this court repudiated the principle of interpretation adopted in some cases, that insurance contracts are to be construed most strongly against the underwriter; and adopted the sounder view that the intention of the parties, as gathered from the whole instrument, must prevail.

What, then, is the obvious meaning of the terms "vacant or unoccupied" as applied to a dwelling house which, when insured, was inhabited or lived in? A dwelling house means a place of abode—a habitation—a house occupied or intended to be occupied as a residence. Occupation of a dwelling house primarily implies a living in it, and consequently a fair and reasonable interpretation of the words "vacant and unoccupied" when used to describe a dwelling house, would seem to be that the house is without an occupant—without some person living in it.

An actual use of the house as a place of abode or habitation is what the insurer contemplates and what the policy designs to secure. When the occupant of a dwelling house moves out with his family, taking part of his furniture and nearly all his wearing apparel, and makes his place of abode elsewhere, such dwelling house while thus deserted, must be regarded as unoccupied—that is, vacated—if the word be given its natural and ordinary signification. It is the very situation against the hazards of which the company clearly undertook to guard itself by an express stipulation and condition inserted in the very contract upon which the suit is founded. Obviously the word "unoccupied" as applied to a dwelling house in a fire insurance policy, signifies "not used as a residence;" and consequently a desig-ated tenement becomes unoccupied when it is no longer used for the accustomed and ordinary purposes of a dwelling or place of abode. Hence no matter what other use it may be devoted to, so long as it ceases to be a place of actual abode—a place really occupied as a residence or habitation—it is vacant or unoccupied according to the plain import of those words, and according, too, to the sense in which they are manifestly employed in the contract of insurance. It is not a mere casual or occasional sleeping in a house that constitutes an occupancy of it. The element of a fixed abode is an essential ingredient of every concept of occupancy when applied to a dwelling house; and the term "unoccupied" is employed to express the directly opposite condition.

A political or a commercial residence does not necessarily involve an actual occupancy of a particular place. Such a residence is largely a question of intention; whereas an occupancy of a particular place as a dwelling is not a matter of intention at all, but purely one of fact, and is absolutely inseparable from an actual, obvious abiding or living there. The insurance policy has a manifest reference to a continuous physical condition of the house as a habitation, and not to the mental purpose or mere intention of the owner with respect to what he considers his residence. The prohibiting clause was designed to be descriptive of the thing insured in a particular that affects the hazard of the risk, and was not intended to have relation to the mere intent of the owner. If, therefore, the house be not used as a dwelling house in which people live and have their abode, it is unoccupied even though some of the owner's property may be stored there and even though occasionally some one may sleep there. If used for these last-named purposes it may be a place of storage or of temporary shelter but it is obviously no longer occupied as a dwelling house. This view is fully supported by numerous well-considered adjudications, to some of which we will now refer.

Thus, in Herrman v. Adriatic F. Ins. Co., 85 N. Y. 162, the plaintiff was living in the dwelling house at the time the policy was issued; he left the place in November leaving the dwelling furnished and in charge of his farmer, who occupied the farm house, a different structure, and members of whose family visited and aired the dwelling once a week. The plaintiff and his wife also visited it once a fortnight. Besides the furniture all the summer clothing of the plaintiff and his family was left in the dwelling. In the following April the dwelling with its contents was destroyed by fire. In an action upon the policy it was held that the dwelling house was not occupied within the meaning of the policy, which provided that if the house should "become vacant or unoccupied, and so remain for more than thirty days, without notice, etc., the policy would be void, and a recovery was not allowed."

In Moore v. Phoenix F. Ins. Co., 64 N. H. 140, it was held that a dwelling house in which no one lived, but in which a former occupant had left some trifling articles of furniture, not of such a character as to be valuable for use elsewhere, was "vacant and unoccupied" within the meaning of those terms as used in the insurance policy. In Feshe v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co., 74 Iowa, 676, it was held that a policy was avoided where the house, between the time that elapsed from the removal of the tenant, several days before the fire, until the day of the fire, was unoccupied except by the presence of the owner for a short time during each day for the purpose of cleaning it up. In Bonenfant v. American F. Ins. Co., 76 Mich. 653, it was decided that "occupancy of premises," within the meaning of a condition in a policy of insurance, implies an actual use of the house as a dwelling house, and the mere fact that the occupant may have left some one to look after it when he moved out with his furniture and vacated it will not save the furniture. In Sexton v. Hawkeye Ins. Co., 69 Iowa, 99, it was held that insurers were not liable for loss which occurred at a time when no one lived in the house, though some articles belonging to a recent tenant and some belonging to the insured were in it at the time of the accident, and the land on which the house was situated, and which was described in the policy, was occupied.

In Halpin v. Athena F. Ins. Co., 120 N. Y. 70, it was decided that where an insured manufacturing establishment is leased by the insured, and the tenant thereafter ceases business, leaving the building closed and in charge of one who lives in a house on the premises some distance from the factory and who is intrusted with the keys and visits the premises three or four times a week, the premises are unoccupied. In Continental Ins. Co. v. Kyle (124 Ind. 132) 9 L. R. A. 81, with copious notes upon which we have drawn largely, it was held that a building is vacant or unoccupied within the meaning of an insurance policy which declares that the insurance shall be void in case it becomes vacant or unoccupied where a tenant has moved out although for the purpose of letting new tenants come in, and they intended to move in the next day after the fire occurred, and had already made some repairs on the house but nothing had been left in it but two or three carpenter's planes. In Keith v. Quincy Mut. F. Ins. Co., 10 Allen, 223, which case arose under a policy of insurance on a trip-hammer shop, it was held that it was not sufficient to constitute occupancy that the tools remained in the shop and that the plaintiff's son went through the shop almost every day to look around and see if things were right. So a dwelling house and barn are "unoccupied" if the former is used by the insured and his servants for the sole purpose of taking meals there while working upon an adjacent farm and the barn is a mere storage room. Ashworth v. Builders' Mut. F. Ins. Co., 112 Mass. 423, 17 Am. Rep. 117; Reid v. Lancaster F. Ins. Co., 90 N. Y. 382. In Cook v. Continental Ins. Co., 70 Mo. 610, 35 Am. Rep. 438, the court said:

"When this policy was issued, the plaintiff kept what witness called a 'Ladies Boarding House,' and had eight girls with her. After she left the premises, there was no one living in it. She lived in Kansas City, and Southwick was by her instructed to sleep in the house, but he did not sleep in it after Wednesday night next preceding the Saturday night of the fire. His sleeping there at night was not an occupation of the house within the meaning of the policy. He did not occupy the house during the day. It is true there is more danger from incendiaries at night than in the daytime, but dwelling houses unoccupied during the day are in more danger from that class than when occupied, and the abandonment of the premises by plaintiff diminished the security against the destruction of the house by fire.

'Occupation of a dwelling house is living in it.' 'A mere supervision over it is not sufficient.' It was plaintiff's business, under the policy, to see that the house was occupied." See also Farmers' Ins. Co. v. Wells, 42 Ohio St. 519; Sleeper v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 56 N. H. 401; North American F. Ins. Co. v. Zaenger, 63 Ill. 464; Fitzgerald v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 64 Wis. 468; Stupetski v. Transatlantic F. Ins. Co. 43 Mich. 373, 38 Am. Rep. 195; Poor v. Humboldt Ins. Co. 125 Mass. 274, 28 Am. Rep. 228; Bennett v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 50 Conn. 420; American Ins. Co. v. Padfield, 78 Ill. 169.

These adjudged cases and many more that might be referred to announce, we think, conclusions entirely in accord with the natural and obvious meaning of the words contained in the restrictive condition to which we have alluded. That the dwelling house described in the policy sued on was vacant or unoccupied in the sense in which those terms are employed in the policy at the time the fire occurred seems to us to admit of no serious controversy, notwithstanding the fact that some of the employees of the plaintiff occasionally slept there, and notwithstanding the further fact that some of the provisions of the plaintiff were kept in the house and his wife daily visited the house for the purpose of getting provisions therefrom.

But it was insisted that the fourth prayer should not have been granted, because at least some of the personal property contained in the house was covered by the policy, and that the forfeiture of the policy as to the risk upon the house did not involve or carry with it a forfeiture as to the personal property. This position is wholly untenable. When the policy became void because of the non-occupancy of the house, it became void as an entirety. It was an indivisible and entire contract, and when by its express terms it became invalid, it became invalid for all purposes and to all intents. This stipulation in regard to the forfeiture is applicable to the policy as an entirety. This is settled in Maryland beyond contention or controversy. Bowman v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. 40 Md. 632.

Nor can the fact that the loss was by indorsement made payable to the mortgagees as their interest might appear at all affect the question before us. When a loss has happened that is covered by a valid policy, it is possible that a controversy may arise as to whether a payment has been rightly made to the insured when the policy has prescribed that the loss shall be payable to the mortgagees as their interest may appear. In such cases it has been held that the insured has no authority by an accord and satisfaction between himself and the company to defeat the right of the mortgagees from recovering the amount due under the policy. Hathaway v. Orient Ins. Co. 184 N. Y. 409, 17 L. R. A. 514. But here the validity of the policy is made to depend upon the insured continuing to occupy the premises, and no matter to whom the loss may be made payable, it cannot be recovered by any one if by the terms explicitly set forth in the policy no right of action can accrue at all upon the violation of some specific condition whose observance by the insured is made necessary to fix the insurer's liability.

As we think the circuit court erred in refusing to grant the appellant's fourth prayer, the judgment in favor of the appellee must be reversed, and as this view of the case is decisive against the right of the appellee to recover at all, a new trial will not be awarded.

1. A provision in a marine policy blank, upon which a fire insurance contract is written, for navigation by the vessel insured, does not so far conflict with a clause in a fire policy blank providing for insurance while the property is "located and contained as described herein" as to be waived by a rider attached to the marine blank waiving all provisions which conflict with the fire blank, although the description in the rider locates the property at a particular place.

NOTE.—Effect of riders or slips attached to insurance policies.

As to the construction of a policy of insurance, see notes to Kratzenstein v. Western Assur. Co. (N. Y.) 5 L. R. A. 799 (1890); Equitable L. Assur. Soc. v. Hazlewood (Tex.) 7 L. R. Upon the rights given by the attachment of a mortgage slip to an insurance policy, see note to Phenix Ins. Co. v. Omaha Loan & T. Co. (Neb.) 23 L. R. A. 679 (1894).

This note is confined exclusively to cases show-ance on a vessel, describing it as "laid up" in a harbor, and giving permission "to make repairs" and "sit out in the spring" and "move from dock to dock" to load and unload, do not prevent the policy from covering the vessel while on a voyage which is permitted by the body of the policy.

3. The construction to be given to an insurance policy will not be controlled by the fact that in correspondence relating to the loss the insured apparently sought to bring it within the policy as interpreted by the insured.
4. The cost of repairs to a vessel insured against fire at the time it sunk while burning need not be minutely proved to justify a recovery on a policy making the insurer liable only for the actual cash value of the property destroyed or the cost of replacing it.
5. A diver who has examined a vessel sunk while burning is not incapacitated to give his opinion that the vessel is a total loss by the fact that he regarded himself as not competent to estimate the cost of repairs necessary to replace it.

ing the effect of a rider or slip attached to a policy of insurance, and does not therefore include cases wherein the application, survey of the property, prospectus or pamphlet of the company, referred to in the policy, has or has not been considered as part thereof. Neither does it cover the vast number of cases wherein it has been held that conditions attached to a policy may or may not form a part thereof and be construed together with the policy, according as to whether they are or are not referred to in express terms in the policy, and thereby made a part thereof by virtue of such reference.

The question as to the effect of a rider or slip attached to a policy is, according to the authorities, to be determined by a special declaration contained in the policy, such riders or slips being considered as a part of the contract when they are connected with the policy, and so even if they appear anywhere upon its face, though not written in the body.

In such cases, as in others, the policy is the contract, and if outside papers are to be imported into it, this must be done in so clear a manner as to leave no doubt of the intention of the parties. Goddard v. East Texas F. Ins. Co. 97 Tex. 99, 60 Am. Rep. 1 (1896); Farmers' Ins. & L. Co. v. Snyder, 16 Wend. 481, 30 Am. Dec. 118 (1836).

And this is so for the reason that the policy as delivered and accepted is conclusively presumed, in an action at law, to express the entire contract of the parties. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Wilcox & G. Guano Co. 65 Fed. Rep. 724, 730, 25 U. S. App. 201 (1895).

And for the further reason that if the slip was attached to the policy when delivered to the assured, and by mistake failed to express the actual agreement, a court of equity is the only jurisdiction in which the policy can be reformed and corrected. Ibid.

So, the courts have held that written clauses and riders will prevail over the ordinary and printed forms of insurance contracts, and that as the contract is an instrument prepared by the insurer, all doubts or ambiguities are to be resolved against him, and further that the whole instrument must be considered, and so construed, as to give effect to the intent of the parties as indicated by the language implied. Gunther v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 84 Fed. Rep. 501 (1898).

Where the iron safe clause was contained in a slip attached to the policy, of which slip the assured declared he had no notice, the court stated that in order to constitute any statement or prom-

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Bay County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. D. Goulder and George Clinton, with Messrs. Shaw & Wright, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. T. E. Tarsney, with Messrs. T. A. E. Weadock and J. O. Weadock, for defendant in error:

The language of the policy, being that of the insurer, selected by it and intended for its benefit, must be clear and unambiguous, and any reasonable doubt as to its meaning must be resolved in favor of the insured.

The language of the policy must be construed with reference to the nature of the property to which it is applied, and must be presumed to have been used with reference to the purpose for which said property is ordinarily used, as well as the manner in which it is usually used.

Chandler v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 21 of the insured a warranty, it must be made a part of the policy either by appearing in the body of the instrument or by a proper reference in the policy to some other paper in which it was to be found. Goddard v. East Texas F. Ins. Co. supra.

Such a clause is in the nature of a condition precedent, and as such must form part of the contract between the parties. Ibid.

So, when there is a doubt as to the intention of the parties to treat the paper as a part of the policy, the courts give the benefit of the doubt to the assured, and construe the policy liberally in his favor. Ibid.; Gunther v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 84 Fed. Rep. 501 (1898).

In Landman v. Hartford Ins. Co. (La.) 19 Ins. L. J. 572 (1890), the defendant contended that the plaintiff warranted the keeping of books showing the condition and progress of the business, purchases, etc., which books were to be kept in an iron safe, and that the warranty was broken by failure so to keep. The plaintiff sought to meet such defense by showing that it was the custom of the insurer to keep the books of his business in an iron safe as stipulated, but that by accident or oversight on the particular occasion in question the precaution was omitted, and by contending that the iron-safe clause was not in the body of the policy, but upon a slip, and not referred to as among the failures which would work a forfeiture, and that such clause was a mere representation and not a warranty. The court, however, did not consider that the paper upon which the clause in question was found could be regarded as a mere slip for collateral attachment, the regular form of the policy having upon its face a blank space intended to be filled up by writing, with a description of the property and such other matter as might be deemed essential. The facts of the case showing that instead of writing within the space, the company pasted across the entire face of the policy a sheet of paper containing the essential description with certain concessions, setting forth both the three-fourths and the iron-safe clause, and terminating with a special declaration that the said sheet was "attached to and made the written part of the policy," which was duly signed by the company's agent. It was therefore held that the sheet formed an essential portion of the policy, its terms and stipulations entering into the body and life of the contract, and that if a distinction was to be drawn it was entitled to higher consideration, as the filling in or writing which belonged in a special manner

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's vessel having been burned in Detroit river, while on a voyage from Bay City to Cleveland, an action was brought and judgment obtained by him upon a policy of insurance, and defendant has appealed. The first and most important question raised by the record is whether the policy covered the vessel after leaving Bay City, and this depends upon a construction of the policy, which consists of the ordinary marine policy, with certain riders attached. It is conceded to indemnify against loss by fire only. Defendant claims that it was winter insurance, and covered the property only while the vessel was in the harbor of Bay City; while the plaintiff asserts that it was a fire policy, covering the vessel from the 4th of December to the 1st of May, and that by the express terms of the policy she might navigate the Lakes and Detroit river after April 1st. As to the contract as distinguished from the printed matter of the general form, and that the clause was in the nature of a warranty such as the company had the right to exact as a condition determinative of their entry at all into such a contract.

The case of Landman v. Hartford Ins. Co. supra, was distinguished by the court from that of Goddard v. East Texas F. Ins. Co. 67 Tex. 69, 40 Am. Rep. 1 (1884), upon the ground that that action did not cover the case then before the court, inasmuch as in the Goddard Case it was declared that the clause was upon a separate slip pasted to the policy, but it did not appear that the clause was upon a sheet, intended to constitute the very filling itself of the blank left in the printed form, and declared specifically to be such writing in, and containing matter which was the very life of, the contract; and upon the further ground that in the Goddard Case the insurer was ignorant of the existence of the clause, while in the case then before the court, the clause carried out a statement and formal promise and agreement signed by the assured, the knowledge of which was not denied; and upon the further ground that in the Goddard Case the books were intact, preserved and presented for the company's inspection, while in that case, material books were absolutely lost as a direct consequence of the plaintiff's failure to comply with the contract and warranty. In the above case the court further stated that even if the Goddard Case had been absolutely antagonistic, they would not have followed it, preferring the reasons of the judges of the first circuit of the court of appeals of that state (Louisiana), and of the judge of the first instance in the same cause as expressed in the case of Dreyfus & Co. and Loape v. Marx, consolidated No. 114, upon the docket of the circuit court, which case does not, however, appear to be officially reported.

In Davis v. Boardman, 12 Mass. 80 (1815), the following memorandum was annexed to the policy: "Should this vessel and cargo be insured in England, in time to attach, this policy is to be canceled on the assured's producing a copy of the policy, or the original, and paying $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent." The facts showed that the insurance was made in England by the plaintiff's agent there on the vessel only. The court held the underwriters liable as insurers of the cargo, the intent and effect of the memorandum being, that if the ship was insured in England, the insurance on the ship was to be void; and that if the cargo was insured in England, the insurance made on the cargo was to be void, the memorandum being co-extensive with the policy, the condition which was to annul the contract being applicable to both or either of its parts according to the event, the court acting upon the maxim reddendo singula singula.

In Haven v. Gray, 12 Mass. 71 (1815), the defendants assured for plaintiffs $11,000, upon a specified number of bales of cotton valued at $11,400, on board a certain ship at and from the United States to Europe, for the purpose of disposing of the outward cargo and procuring a return cargo, and at and from thence to the United States, the following memorandum being annexed to the policy: "It is understood that the risk is to attach to the proceeds of the articles mentioned in this policy in the return cargo." The vessel on its arrival at a foreign port, the markets being dull, consigned the cargo to a mercantile house, and took a return cargo on credit, before the outward cargo was sold. A total loss occurring upon the return voyage, the court held the underwriters liable provided it was shown that the return cargo was intended as a substitute for the outward cargo, and was considered as the proceeds of the same.

In Gloucester Mfg. Co. v. Howard F. Ins. Co. 5 Gray, 497, 66 Am. Dec. 373 (1855), the agent of the insurance company, having in his possession printed forms of policies of insurance signed by the officers of the company to be filled out, countersigned, and issued by him, before the delivery of the policy or the acceptance thereof, or the payment of the premium, added to the policy a memorandum, to the effect that the building insured was in the course of construction. The court held that such act was within the authority of the agent, and that the memorandum bound the company, even though, as shown by the application, the buildings were finished and the conditions of insurance, provided that applications therefor should be in writing and specify the construction, materials, character, and occupation of the building, and be looked upon as a part of the contract and a warranty, and even though the agent, whose duty it was to make monthly returns of the written parts of all insurance policies, did not make such return until after the loss occasioned by the fire.

Where the iron-safe clause was printed in a slip attached to and made part of the policy, it was held that the stipulations therein contained constituted a part of the policy, the court stating that the rule was that stipulations such as that contained in the iron-safe clause would be taken as embraced in, and constituting a part of, the policy, if they appeared anywhere upon its face, though not written in the body, and that the mere fact that stated, the policy was written upon a blank marine policy, which, if not qualified, would have insured the vessel against the other usual risks of navigation. It provided as follows: "The British America Assurance Company does make insurance, and cause five thousand dollars to be insured, upon the body, tackle, apparel, and other furniture of the steamer called the 'Burlington,' from noon of the 4th day of December, 1893 (the said vessel being warranted by the insured to be then in safety), to noon of the 1st day of May, 1894, unless sooner terminated or made void by conditions hereafter expressed. Warranted by the insured to be employed exclusively in the freighting or passenger business, or both, and not to carry quicklime in the lower hold, and to navigate only the waters, bays, harbors, rivers, canals, and other tributaries of Lakes Superior, Michigan, Huron, St. Clair, Erie, and Ontario, and River St. Lawrence to Quebec, usually navigated by vessels of her class, during the portion of the life of this policy between noon of April 1st and noon of November 30th; . . . and between noon of November 30th and noon of April 1st ensuing said vessel shall be laid up and safely moored, satisfactorily to this company." It was stamped: "This is a fire policy only."

If this were the only provision upon the subject, it is plain that plaintiff's contention that he had a right to navigate the vessel after April 1st without affecting his insurance is correct, but upon defendant's behalf it is contended that the riders and the circumstances under which the policy was obtained, and plaintiff's correspondence since the loss, exclude the plaintiff's construction, and show that it was the intention of the parties that the policy should be limited to such time as the vessel should remain in the harbor where she then was.

We will first consider the effect of the the agent of the company knew at the time of the issuing of the insurance that no safe was kept by the assured upon his premises did not amount to a waiver of the clause. Criger v. Standard F. Ins. Co. 49 Mo. App. 11, 16 (1892).

In Goddard v. East Texas F. Ins. Co. 57 Tex. 60, 60 Am. Rep. 1 (1886), the iron-safe clause was not written or printed upon the same paper with the rest of the instrument, nor was it referred to in the policy as forming a part of the contract between the assured and the insurance company, and the clause did not in any terms provide that it should constitute a warranty; it was pasted on the policy in the midst of a sentence which had no reference to the stipulations of the assured in such connection as to destroy the sense of the sentence, and the policy was complete without the attached paper, and expressly stipulated in other parts what were its warranties and conditions. The court therefore held that such clause did not amount to a warranty, but at most to a representation, and stated that if the insurers did not embody their warranties in the policy itself, or import them into that instrument by a proper reference to other papers in which they were contained, and the contract was capable of an interpretation which would make them mere representations, the company must expect them to be so construed.

But in Kelley-Goodfellow Shoe Co. v. Liberty Ins. Co. (Tex.) 28 S. W. 1027 (1894), the iron-safe clause was held to constitute a warranty, even though attached to a paper which contained most of the provisions of the policy in a separate slip of paper, which was only referred to and adopted as a part of the contract in another slip containing a description of the property insured, which was also attached, there being two slips, each stating that the iron-safe clause formed a part of the contract. In that case, therefore, before the assured could recover under the policy the court held that he must show that he had complied with the conditions imposed by such clause.

The case was appealed to the supreme court, but a writ of error was denied, and the judgment affirmed. Kelley-Goodfellow Shoe Co. v. Liberty Ins. Co. (Tex.) 29 S. W. XXI.

So, in American F. Ins. Co. v. First Nat. Bank (Tex.) 30 S. W. 384 (1895), the policy sued on was a printed form on which the agent added such references and descriptions as were necessary to form the contract of insurance, following the description of the property on which specific insurance was placed, with the expression that the policy issued in consideration of the stipulations therein contained and subject "to the three-quarters value and iron-safe clauses attached to, and made a part of, the policy." These clauses were on a printed slip attached to the face of the policy, by being pasted with mucilage, on the margin of the policy opposite the written clauses, which slip read as follows: "It is a condition of this policy that in the event of loss or damage by fire of the property insured this company shall not be liable for an amount greater than three fourths of the cash market value of the same, not exceeding the amount of the policy at the time immediately preceding such loss or damage," and "that the assured under this policy heroby covenants and agrees to keep a set of books, showing a record of business transacted, including all purchases and sales, both for cash and credit, together with the last inventory of said business; and further covenants and agrees to keep such books and inventory securely locked in a fire-proof safe at night, and at all times when the store mentioned in the within policy is not actually open for business, or in some secure place not exposed to fire which would destroy the house where said business is carried on; and in case of loss the assured agrees and covenants to produce such books and inventory, and in the event of a failure to produce the same, this policy shall be null and void, and no suit or action at law shall be maintained thereon for any such loss." The court below charged the jury that "the iron-safe clause" was not a warranty, and refused a special charge that such clause was a warranty, but upon appeal the court held that the clause referred to was a part of the contract of insurance, and was by its own terms made a condition necessary to be complied with before a recovery could be had.

And again, in the case of Home Ins. Co. v. Cary (Tex.) 31 S. W. 821 (1895), the iron-safe clause attached to a policy of insurance was held to amount to a warranty and construed as part of the contract of insurance, any breach whereof on the assured's part would avoid the contract, the iron-safe clause in that case being contained in a sheet which was expressly made a part of the contract, and was stipulated to be a warranty the failure to comply with which avoided the policy.

In the above case, in the largest sheet of paper, the slip containing the iron-safe clause was merely referred to, and the latter slip stated that it was attached to the policy, giving the number, but the court stated that it would be inaccurate to speak of either of these papers as constituting the policy, when neither was complete without the riders, in and of themselves. It is elementary that all parts of the policy are to be harmonized and given effect, if it can be consistently done, and that, unless the riders are irreconcilable with the printed clause quoted, such clause must stand. If they are inconsistent and irreconcilable the riders must control. The first rider upon the policy was as follows: "On the hull, and on the engines, boilers, machinery, tackle, small boats, apparel, and furniture, belonging to and while on board of the steamer Burlington, laid up and properly moored in the harbor of Bay City, Mich. Permission is hereby given to do painting, and to make necessary alterations and repairs, and to fit out in the spring, and to move from dock to dock for the purpose of loading and unloading cargo." Another rider was attached, reading as follows: "This policy covers against fire only, on the terms and conditions of the standard form fire policy of the state of New York, and anything in this policy conflicting therewith is hereby waived." The significant provisions of these riders, and those alleged to affect the question under discussion, are: (1) The language, "steamer Burlington laid up and properly moored in the harbor of Bay City, Mich." (2) "Permission to do painting and to make necessary alterations and repairs, and to fit out in the spring." (3) The privilege "of moving from dock to dock for the purpose of loading or unloading cargo." (4) The exclusion of all risks but fire. (5) The limitation to the terms of the standard form policy. (6) The waiver of provisions of the policy written, so far as they conflicted with the standard policy.

The fact that the first rider describes the property insured differently from the body of the policy has no especial significance. It is somewhat more specific in articles mentioned; it may be doubtful whether it is more comprehensive. The provisions numbered 4 and 5 clearly limit the risk to losses by fire.

other, and that together they formed the contract and must be so treated. Ibid.

Again, in American F. Ins. Co. v. Center (Tex.) 33 S. W. 554 (1895), the main contention was that the assured had failed to comply with the iron-safe clause in the several policies issued by the defendant companies, and that such clause amounted to a warranty on the assured's part which precluded a recovery under the policy. The assured contended that the clause was waived by the conduct of the agent of the company after the fire, but as to this latter issue the court made no finding. The iron-safe clause was of the same import in each policy, and in the American provided that the assured was to keep books showing a record of all business transacted, together with the last inventory of stock insured securely locked in a fire-proof safe at night, and at all times when the store was not actually open for business, or in some secure place not exposed to a fire which would destroy the business premises, and that the assured would produce such books and inventory in case of loss, or in case of failure so to do the policy was to be deemed null and void so that no action could be maintained thereon. In all the policies except one it was printed upon a slip of paper pasted on the face of the policy at the space usually left blank for the insertion of a description of the property insured, and upon such slip alone was the description of the stock of goods and also the amount of insurance. This slip was signed by the agent of the company as part of the policy and if removed from the policy showed no contract. In the body of the policy was a provision requiring the insured to exhibit to any person designated by the company all that remained of any property therein described, and to submit to examinations under oath by any person named by the company, and to subscribe the same, and to produce for examination all books of accounts, bills, invoices, and other vouchers or certified copies thereof, if the originals were lost, and permit extracts and copies thereof to be made, the policy concluding with the provision that it was made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations together with such other provisions, agreements, or conditions as might be indorsed thereon or added thereto; and that no officer, agent, or other representative of the company should have power to waive any of its provisions or conditions except such as, by the terms of the policy, might be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon or added thereto. The last inventory taken before the fire was destroyed for the reason that it was not kept in the safe as required, and no copy of it could be produced. The court held that the failure to so produce it, and thus comply with the provisions of the policy, amounted to a breach of the condition, and precluded a recovery under the policy, the clause in question amounting to a warranty.

In Pool v. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. (Wis.) 65 N. W. Rep. 54 (1895), the policy was to be void if the insured thereafter procured any other contract of insurance, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon, or added thereto, and there was a further proviso that the company was not to be liable to a greater proportion of any loss than the amount the policy therein should bear to the whole insurance upon the property, and that the policy was made and accepted subject to the stipulations and conditions therein "together with such provisions, agreements, or conditions" as might be indorsed thereon or added thereto, it being further provided that the provisions or conditions of the policy could only be waived by writing indorsed thereon or added thereto; and further that "any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy" must be so written thereon or attached thereto. There was a written statement, of even date with the policy, attached thereto, as forming a part thereof, signed by the company's agent, to the effect that "if, at the time of the fire the whole amount of insurance on the property covered by this policy be less than 80 per cent of the actual cash value thereof," then the defendant should, "in case of loss or damage, be liable for only such proportion of such loss or damage as the amount insured by this policy shall bear to the said 80 per cent of the actual cash value of such property." The court in considering this policy held that while such writing so attached did not expressly authorize such additional insurance without such consent, yet it did, by necessary implication, authorize the same, and make it an object for the plaintiff to take additional insurance until the 80 per cent of the actual cash value of the property should be obtained, and in case it should be obtained then the company was, in case of total loss, to pay the full face of the policy, and that therefore, the additional insurance having been taken by the company's agent, the policy was not void by reason of such additional insurance.

In Gunter v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 84 Fed. rep. 501 (1888), the contract (one of the ordinary printed forms of policy) contained provisions restricting its operation and saving the company from claims for loss arising under circumstances

They are irreconcilable with the provision of the marine policy as to other risks, and must govern in that respect, and plaintiff does not question this. There is more question over the effect of the limitation to the terms of the standard form policy. This standard form policy referred to appears to be the "standard fire insurance policy of New York," and a copy is included in the record. It is said to be identical with the Michigan form. Counsel for the defendant claim that this rider gives the same effect to the policy as though written upon a standard form blank, and that in such blank there is no provision for navigation during certain portions of the year, but, on the contrary, the printed part of the standard policy uses the following language, vis.: "To the following described property, while located and contained as described herein." It is said that this provision should be substituted for the other, and if that be done there is nothing to indicate that the vessel might leave the place where she was moored, except to go from dock to dock in that harbor for the purpose of unloading and loading cargo. These riders, like the policy, were signed by the underwriter, and we may dismiss the provision in relation to the waiver of inconsistent provisions by saying that it was the waiver of the company, and not of the plaintiff, made for the benefit of the plaintiff, and not the defendant. It was doubtless designed to cover the various provisions pertinent to marine risks, but which had no application to a purely fire risk. On the part of the plaintiff, no express waiver was necessary, for, by accepting this policy, he agreed to take insurance according to the terms of the standard policy, and cannot insist on anything in the policy taken that is necessarily in conflict with it. There is therefore no especial significance to the waiver unless its language implies that the provisions of the marine policy apply where they are not inconsistent with the standard policy. Had the standard policy blank been used, and the clause quoted from the same been followed which exposed them to some unusual hazard, such as the storage, use, keeping, or allowing on the premises temporarily or permanently for sale or otherwise of petroleum and other inflammable liquids which they were not willing to accept, without the written permission indorsed on the policy, excepting, however, the use of refined coal kerosene or other carbon oil for lights, if the same were drawn and the lamps filled by daylight. Riders were attached to the policy at the time it was issued, containing the customary privileges attached generally to policies, as follows: "Privileged to use kerosene oil for lights; lamps to be filled and trimmed by daylight only," and, "privileged to keep not exceeding five barrels of kerosene oil on said premises." In an action upon the policy, the facts showing that the fire was caused in consequence of the insured permitting his servants to furnish oil to a neighbor at a time when it was necessary to use a lighted lamp, the company were held not liable the policy being forfeited, there being nothing in the clause giving the privilege to keep five barrels of kerosene oil inconsistent with the restrictions as to drawing contained in the policy, the clause of the policy and the two riders standing perfectly together.

Where, by marine policies the insurers insured the plaintiff for one year against loss by fire, etc., on a certain tug in the "bays and harbor of New York, East and North or Hudson rivers, waters of New Jersey, Long Island sound and shores, and as far as New Bedford, and all inland waters as far south as Norfolk, Virginia, and all waters adjacent, connecting or tributary to any of the above waters," and subsequent to the date of the policy the following rider was attached: "Permission is hereby given the tug . . . to use port and harbor of Charleston, to go as far as the jetties at Charleston, but not to cover on trips either way between Norfolk and Charleston," upon a claim for loss by fire on the tug after leaving Norfolk on a trip to Charleston, the court held that the language of the rider was so explicit and unambiguous that it could not properly be narrowed by legal construction so as to make the policy cover any part of the trip to Charleston, even while within the inland waters of Chesapeake bay, though the rider did in some respects extend the scope of the insurance, by giving the privilege of the use of the port and harbor of Charleston, and the waters as far as the jetties. Mark v. Home Ins. Co., Mark v. Orient Ins. Co.,

Mark v. British-America Ins. Co. 88 Fed. Rep. 170 (1892).

In Phenix Ins. Co. v. Wilcox & G. Guano Co. 65 Fed. Rep. 724, 18 U. S. App. 81 (1896), action was brought to recover on a policy against loss by windstorms, cyclones, or tornadoes on property damaged by the cyclone of August, 1893. The material portion of the policy showed that the company insured the premises therein mentioned against loss or damage by windstorm, cyclone, or tornado, subject to the freshet clause, the words "subject to co-insurance clause," and the words "subject to freshet clause," being written and not printed upon the policy. Immediately over the words "subject to freshet clause" there was a printed slip pasted to the margin of the policy as follows: "It is hereby distinctly understood and agreed that this company is not liable for any loss or damage to the property herein insured which may occur by reason of freshets, floods, or high water; said insurance being limited to loss or damage by cyclone, windstorm, or tornado. Attached to and forming part of tornado policy,"—giving the number of the policy and the company in which insured, and signed by the agents. In the policy produced in evidence there was no slip attached over the words "subject to co-insurance clause" but the policy contained a clause providing for other insurance, and limiting the liability of the insurance company to a proportion of the loss in such case. The question was whether the insurance company was liable for the full amount insured, or only for such proportion of the loss as the amount of the insurance bore to the sound value of the property, the company's contention being that the slip was attached to the policy and limited its liability, and the company's agent testified that he had intended to annex to the policy a slip "average or co-insurance clause" which limited the responsibility in case of "fire" and that the whole matter was explained to the assured at the time of taking the policy and upon renewals thereof, but this was denied, although the evidence showed that such a slip was attached to the first policy. It was further shown that there were various co-insurance clauses attached to policies by different underwriters, some requiring the assured to become co-insurers for the deficiency if the insurance did not amount to a certain percentage of the whole value of the property, and others stating the different percentage, and it also appeared that by the provision in relation to navigation after the 1st of April, it would have been a valid policy, and would have covered the property while in other waters than the harbor of Bay City. There is nothing inconsistent with the standard policy, or contrary to the law, in such a provision. Who can doubt that such a provision in a policy covering a threshing machine, a circus outfit, or a steam vessel would be efficacious? Indeed, the mere issuance of a policy upon property which, from its nature and use, is not adapted to its remaining in a given place, has been held to constitute insurance against its destruction while abroad. Especially has this doctrine been applied to livery stock, farmers' property, and in one instance to a lady's dolman while in the hands of a furrier for repair. See May, Ins. §§ 401a-401c; Benton v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Mich.) 26 L. R. A. 241, and note. There is no necessary conflict between such provisions, and, had this clause providing for navigation been printed upon the rider, no dispute could arise over it.

This brings us to the consideration of the first provision. It is urged that it would have been easy for the underwriter to limit the insurance upon the Burlington while laid up and moored, etc., and that the omission of the word "while" indicates the intention to limit her to that place during the period of insurance, an inference which is said to be intensified by the third provision, as to moving from dock to dock. On the other hand, plaintiff suggests that the place of moving was descriptive merely. The trouble with the defendant's claim about this is that it nullifies the provision regarding navigation, which we have shown is not inconsistent with the standard policy. It seems to us that the language may not only be reconciled with the plaintiff's claim, but that the words had a meaning and purpose consistent with the navigation clause. If it be conceded that the general terms of the standard fire policy apply, these two riders become necessary, or, if not indispensable, at least useful to set at rest possible questions that might arise. The evidence shows that the underwriter did not care to take this risk. It was represented to him that she was in a safe place, properly moored in Bay City harbor, and the rider stated that she was there. Under the standard policy alone, this would have been nothing unusual, nor does it seem to us any more so under the clause quoted from the marine policy, which requires the vessel to be laid up and moored satisfactorily to the underwriter, if it was desired to indicate a place of mooring. Again, under the marine policy clause, there is nothing to indicate that the vessel might move from dock to dock previous to the 1st of April, and, if the plaintiff desired to unload after obtaining the policy or load in the spring before April 1st, it was prudent to have the clause inserted. We have little doubt that it was inserted at his instance, and it was as consistent with an intention to start upon a voyage April 1st under the clause in the marine policy as May 1st upon the defendant's theory. The provision as to repairs was made necessary by reason of the provision relating to repairs in the standard policy. There is evidence tending to show that, under a strictly marine policy, repairs, etc., might be made during the winter, but the standard policy provides that the same shall become void if mechanics are employed in building, altering, or repairing for more than fifteen days. This provision is done away with by the rider.

This leaves only the telegram from the plaintiff to be discussed upon this branch of the case. After the fire the plaintiff furnished proofs of loss, and the underwriter's agent wrote as follows, viz.:

"We have no insurance on steamer Burlington.

the clause which the insurance agent would have affixed to the policy, had he completed it as he intended, was a printed clause applicable to a loss by fire, and not a loss by cyclone, and further, it not being shown that there was any usage or custom upon the question, that the words "subject to co-insurance clause" had no definite meaning in themselves, but referred to some particular clause which the company's agent intended to affix. The court therefore held that the court below committed no error in stating to the jury that if the above clause had been attached which the insurance agent testified had been omitted, it was one which was applicable only to a loss by fire, and would not have affected the loss in that case, which was by cyclone; and further, that there was no error in instructing the jury that the contract, being of a doubtful meaning, was to be construed most strongly against the insurer.

In Kenyon v. Burthen, 1 Dougl. 12, note (1778), it was held that though a written paper was wrapt up in the policy when it was brought to the underwriters to subscribe, and shown to them at that time, or even though it was wafered to the policy at the time of subscribing, yet it was not in either case a warranty or to be considered as a part of the policy itself, but only as a representation.

So, where it was sought to prove that a written memorandum inclosed with the policy was always considered as a part thereof, the court found that 80 L. R. A.

it was a mere question of law, and refused to bear evidence in support of the theory, and held that such a paper did not become a strict warranty by being folded up in the policy. Fawson v. Ewer, 1 Dougl. 12, note (1778).

And in Bize v. Fletcher, 1 Dougl. 12, note (1778), where it appeared that at the time the insurers underwrote the policy a slip was wafered to it, which described the state of the ship and also gave particulars of the intended voyage, which particulars had not been complied with, it was held that this was only a representation, and the jury were directed, if they thought there was not any fraud intended, and that the variance between the intended voyage described in the slip and the actual voyage did not tend to increase the risk, to find for the plaintiff.

In Gadachens v. Thornton, 3 El. & Bl. 868 (1854), insurance was procured upon premises in California described in the policy as "brick building used as a dwelling house and store (described in the paper attached to this policy)" such paper being a minute description purporting to be a certificate, the description being accurate, up to a given date, after which the premises were altered. The alteration of the premises was not known to the company when the policy was signed, and later the premises were destroyed by fire. It was held the description in the policy amounted to a warranty and precluded the plaintiff from recovery. E. W.

ton burned in Detroit river. See your policy, which insures Burlington while laid up and safely moored in harbor of Bay City, Mich."

To this the plaintiff replied by telegram as follows:

"Burlington was moored safely at dock when you wrote insurance, but you gave permission to fit out in the spring, and to move from dock to dock for the purpose of loading and unloading cargo. Look at your contract."

It is argued from this correspondence that the plaintiff sought to maintain that he was within the contract, and that the vessel had the right to go from Bay City to Cleveland to load and unload cargo, thereby implying that he recognized the fact that she had not the right to navigate, unless under that provision. This language justifies both of these inferences, but this alone is not in our opinion sufficient to change the construction to be given the policy. We are therefore satisfied that each of the provisions in the rider had a specific purpose, and that such purposes were entirely consistent with the express provision in the marine policy, providing for navigation after April 1st, and therefore that the policy covered the vessel at the time of the fire. We have, then, a fire risk simply, under the standard policy, upon a vessel in Detroit river.

Counsel for the defendant assert that there was not sufficient proof to enable the court to determine the question of damages. The following provision is relied on, viz.: "This company shall not be liable beyond the actual cash value of the property at the time any loss or damage occurs, and the loss or damage shall be ascertained or estimated according to said actual cash value, with proper deduction for depreciation, however caused, and shall in no event exceed what it would then cost the insured to repair or replace the same with material of like kind and quality." It is contended that, as the assured would not be entitled to recover more than the cost of repairing or replacing the property damaged with material of like kind and quality, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove what that cost would be. The plaintiff's witnesses testified regarding the fire, but no one seems to have been able to give an estimate of the extent of the burning, except in a general way. They testify that the cabin burned, and the deck was burned through, but don't know how much the hold was injured. She was laden with lumber, and there was no means of telling accurately. When she sunk, she was thought to have broken in two, and although a diver examined her he was unable to tell definitely the extent of the injury. We think there was evidence to be considered upon this subject, and that a plaintiff cannot be required to make a minute examination during a conflagration, or to go to the bottom of the lake or sea to estimate the cost of repair of a vessel which sunk before she was entirely consumed. Defendant's claim, if the law, would render it impossible for a plaintiff to recover upon a purely fire policy, where the vessel sunk beyond the reach of divers. Even in shallow water, shipbuilding and diving are frequently separate callings, and we cannot suppose it practicable to always find a diver qualified to estimate the repairs required, if he would be able to ascertain what repairs should be necessary when at the bottom of the sea or lake. No authorities are cited in support of the defendant's claim, and we think none can be found which hold to so strict a rule as is here invoked.

The court found that "the vessel was practically destroyed, so much so as to be a total loss." It is urged that "the only evidence in the case which can in any degree support a finding of a total loss was the testimony of one Quinn, and was improperly admitted, against objection and exception." Quinn was the diver. He spent about three hours examining the vessel, and, as it happens, was a ship carpenter by trade. He said that he examined her thoroughly from where she started to burn. After describing how and where she was burned, he said: "She was in pretty bad shape." Then followed the question:

Q. From your experience and knowledge of vessels, and your personal observation of this one, to what extent would you say she was injured by the fire?

A. I should say she is a total loss, so far as any use in rebuilding is concerned.

He said she could be raised, but might come up in pieces, and the job might perhaps be done for $2,000. He did not know whether she was in shape to utilize when raised, but apparently thought it improbable. He could not estimate the cost of repair. After cross-examination he was asked the following question upon redirect:

Q. Is it your judgment, taking into consideration the condition in which you found the boat, and the necessary cost of raising her, independent of the cost of rebuild or repair, that the boat, in her present condition, is a total loss?

A. Yes, sir.

This was the answer excepted to. The objection was that the witness did not regard himself competent to estimate the cost of repairs. As will be seen, the cost of repairs was eliminated from the question as originally asked. We think that the court was not in error in permitting the witness to answer.

Upon the general question, whether there was proof that the loss was total, we think that there was evidence tending to show it, and it follows that it was for the circuit court to weigh, and we cannot review it.

We discover no error in the record, and the judgment will be affirmed.

McGrath, Ch. J., and Long and Montgomery, JJ., concurred.

Grant, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the construction placed by my brethren upon the contract of insurance upon which the plaintiff seeks to recover. It seems to me entirely clear that this was a contract for what is known as "winter insurance," and covered the property insured only when the boat was "laid up and properly moored in the harbor of Bay City." This construction follows from the further language of the contract: "Permission is hereby given to do painting, and to make necessary alterations and repairs, and to fit out in the spring, and to move from dock to dock for the purpose of loading and unloading cargo." No such language would be appropriate or necessary to cover a boat and its contents while engaged in navigation. There could have been no object in describing the "steamer Burlington laid up and properly moored in the harbor of Bay City," except it was to fix the locus in quo during the life of the policy. If it were the intention to insure the boat under all circumstances, it would only have been necessary to describe the property as the steamer Burlington and its contents. That the plaintiff so understood the contract is evident from his telegram to the defendant:

"Burlington was moored safely at dock when you wrote insurance, but you gave permission to fit out in spring, and to move from dock to dock for the purpose of loading and unloading cargo. Look at your contract."

It thus appears that the plaintiff recognized the contract as one for winter insurance only, and sought to maintain its validity by interpreting the permission to move from dock to dock to apply to the boat when engaged in navigation. I do not think that courts should place a construction upon a contract different from that which the parties themselves have placed upon it, in a case where it is susceptible of two constructions.

I think the judgment should be reversed, and no new trial ordered.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

Gotlieb STORZ et al., Pliffs. in Err.,

v.

Lena FINKELSTEIN et al., Admrs., etc., of L. M. Finkelstein, Deceased.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. No action can be maintained on a contract the consideration of which is either wicked in itself or prohibited by law.

2. Plaintiff sued the defendant for the purchase price of beer, to which the defendant, by way of counterclaim, pleaded payment for a license to sell beer, which, as defendant alleged, plaintiff had agreed to furnish, to enable defendant to make such sales. By reply, plaintiff alleged a custom, in accordance with which a retail traffic in beer had been carried on by defendant under and by virtue of a license held by the plaintiff, which traffic, in legal effect, was a violation of the statute of Nebraska regulating traffic in liquors. Held, that, for the purchase price of beer sold under these circumstances, plaintiff was not entitled to a recovery against the defendant.

(December 7, 1895.)

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the contract price of certain beer alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Lake, Hamilton, & Maxwell, for plaintiffs in error:

In order to avoid a contract which can be legally performed, on the ground that there was an intention to perform it in illegal manner, it is necessary to show that there was the wicked intention to break the law.

Waugh v. Morris, L. R. 8 Q. B. 208; Addison, Contr. Morgan's ed. 402.

While the intention to commit a crime, or to do an unlawful act, when nothing is done to carry that intention into effect, is not a crime, nor in any way punishable, yet the rule contended for here would impose a severe penalty or forfeiture upon one who did not even participate in the unlawful design, but simply knew of it, and that, too, for the benefit of the only party who entertained the wrongful intent.
